In State, Blaupied, v. Currier, 86 N. H. 622, the court refused an injunction, sought under the above-mentioned statute at the instance of twenty legal voters, as the defendant denied the alleged nuisance, and claimed a trial by jury to which he was entitled upon the question whether he made use of the building described for the illegal sale or keeping for sale of spirituous or malt liquors, wine, or cider. It will be observed that the above statute gives the right to proceed in equity to the solicitor of the county, or upon petition of not less than twenty legal voters of the town or city, but does not give the right to proceed in equity to the operation of a slaughterhouse and rendering establishment. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. C. McClure, for appellant:

It makes no difference in this case whether the stenches and smells are injurious to the public health or not. "It is sufficient if they are materially offensive, and render the use of that part of the highway within the sphere of its effects materially offensive or uncomfortable."

1 Wood, Nuisances, 3d ed. § 299.

In this class of cases the city can maintain an action the same as a private individual.

New Orleans v. Lambert, 14 La. Ann. 247; Pine City v. Munch, 42 Minn. 342, 6 L. R. A. 763; Hutchinson Twp. v. Filk, 44 Minn. 536.

Mr. T. M. Wilson for respondent.

the municipal authorities themselves; and it may therefore be doubted whether a municipality could proceed thereunder except by proceeding instituted in the manner pointed out, and not in the name of the municipal authorities.

The case of State, Rhodes, v. Saunders, 66 N. H. 30, 18 L. R. A. 648, was also brought by twenty legal voters under the above statute, and upholds the constitutionality of the statute, and also the jurisdiction of the court of chancery in such matters.

So, in Hartley v. Henrietta, 35 W. Va. 223, the plaintiff, on behalf of himself and all other citizens, under a state statute giving equity jurisdiction over nuisances in the sale of intoxicating liquors upon conviction of the owner or keeper thereof, sought an injunction to restrain the defendant from selling intoxicating liquors contrary to law, and to abate the sale thereof. The court held that under chapter 32, § 18, of the West Virginia Code, such proceedings could not be maintained until it was shown that the party so charged had been convicted of the offense named in the bill. Section 18 of the Code in question provides that all houses, buildings, and places of every description where intoxicating liquors are sold or vended contrary to law shall be deemed and taken to be common and public nuisances, and abatable as such upon the conviction of the owner or keeper thereof as thereafter provided, and the courts of equity have jurisdiction by injunction to restrain and abate any such nuisance upon bill filed by any citizen. The right to proceed in equity only accrues under such section after it has been shown by conviction that such place is a nuisance. In that case, however, the court was equally divided in opinion. The express question of the right of a municipality to proceed in equity, or the validity of the proceeding therein taken on behalf of all the citizens, did not arise in this case, the only question before the court being the right to so proceed prior to conviction.

b. Public amusements.

The question whether a merry-go-round is a public nuisance or not, restrainable by the municipal authorities, depends upon the place, the time, the circumstances, and the manner in which it is operated, and the effects it produces, and if the noise, crowd, and other effects of such riding gallery invade any public or private right, and materially interfere with and impair the ordinary physical comfort of anyone of normal sensibility, and ordinary mode of living in his home or place of business. Davis v. Davis, 40 W. Va. 464.

The petition and information of the common council in the above case was signed by fifty residents, supported by affidavits, suggesting the location of the alleged nuisance, and prayed that defendant be summoned to show cause why the same should not be declared to be a nuisance, and abated as both a public and a private nuisance. A summons, signed by the mayor, in the nature of a scire facias or rule to show cause, issued, giving the defendant notice of the injury and annoyance suggested and commanding him to appear and show cause against the abatement. The court held that such signature was sufficient, and it was not necessary for it to be signed by the members of the council, and therefore upheld the method of the procedure used, looking upon the same as short and simple and efficient for the purposes. The court further stated that it was not necessary in such case for the corporation to proceed by way of injunction in equity.

Where a merry-go-round is erected on a vacant lot in a populous part of a town near to dwellings, and is operated by steam with a whistle blowing every few minutes, and is accompanied by music up to ten o'clock and after in the night, and tends to prevent and disturb sleep, and is kept continuously for six days, drawing large crowds of noisy and boisterous people, the crowd hallooing until ten o'clock at night, the same is properly restrainable by the public authorities as a public nuisance after due inquiry, as it is a mere idle amusement, although perfectly legitimate in a proper place or at a proper time. Davis v. Davis, 40 W. Va. 464.

In the above case, however, there were two dissenting opinions by Justices Dent and Brannon, upon the ground that the same did not constitute a public nuisance, and that the act of the public authorities in relation thereto should be by means of regulation, and not an absolute prohibition.

The West Virginia Code of 1891, p. 426, chap. 47, § 28, defines the powers and duties of the council and, among them, the power to prevent injury and annoyance to the public or to individuals, and to abate, or cause to be abated, anything which, in the opinion of the majority of the whole council, shall be a nuisance, but does not prescribe the forms and methods of procedure, and the council is therefore allowed a wide discretion within the limits of reasonable fairness. Davis v. Davis, 40 W. Va. 464. It would therefore seem to be within the power of the municipal authorities to seek relief in equity in proper cases.

Public health and safety.

a. In general.

Municipal power over nuisances affecting safety, health, and personal comfort forms the note to Harrington v. Providence (R. I.) 38 L. R. A. 305.

Where health is exposed, if there is a nuisance, it should be abated, even though the remedy by injunction must be resorted to for its abatement. Board of Health v. Maginnis Cotton Mills, 46 La. Ann. 806, 814.

And upon the general question of equitable jurisdiction in nuisances relating to health and safety, the court in Rowe v. Granite Bridge Corp. 21 Pick. 344, 347, said that, where there is immediate danger to the health or safety of the community, and where it is obviously necessary that a nuisance should be immediately

Start, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action by the city of Red Wing to enjoin the defendant from operating a slaughterhouse and rendering establishment within the corporate limits of the city, and to require him to abate the same as a nuisance. Judgment was entered, upon the special verdict of the jury, dismissing the action on the suppressed, equity may interfere, until the slower process of indictment can be put in motion. This, however, was a private action to abate a public nuisance.

And in Atty. Gen., Raleigh, v. Hunter, 16 N. C. (1 Nev. Eq.) 12, the court, at the instance of the city, through the attorney general, perpetuated an injunction to restrain the defendant from operating his mill dam so as to injure the public health, even though he had been indicted for the same as a nuisance.

The power of a municipality to proceed by way of injunction to restrain a public nuisance injurious to health is further upheld in the case of Pine City v. Munch, 42 Minn. 342, 6 L. R. A. 763. In this case the court restrained the defendant from committing a nuisance in opening the gates and sluices of a dam in hot weather, and drawing the water from the pond, thereby converting the land into marshes and swamps, causing the vegetable matter therein to decay and become decomposed, thus producing malaria, sickness, and death.

In Bice v. Jefferson, 50 Mo. App. 464, 471, it is said that even if a municipality may resort to a court of equity to aid it in enforcing public duties to preserve the health and property of its inhabitants, in those cases which fall under some recognized head of equity jurisdiction, yet even those would seem to be an encroachment on the one settled general rule, denying to courts of equity the power to restrain the threatened violation of a municipal ordinance, unless the act threatened be a nuisance per se. In this case, however, the action was by a private individual, and the court refused the relief.

Section 28, New Jersey Laws 1887, Pamph. Laws, p. 80, provides "that any such local board of health, instead of proceeding in a summary way to abate a nuisance hazardous to the public health, may file a bill in chancery, in the name of the state, on the relation of such board of health, for an injunction to prohibit the continuance of such nuisance, and such actions shall proceed [in the courts of chancery] according to the rules and practices in such cases on the relation of individuals."

In State, Hamilton Twp. Bd. of Health, v. Neidt (N. J. Eq.) 19 Atl. 318, the bill was filed under the above act to abate a public nuisance hazardous to the public health. It was contended, upon the part of the defendant, that the plaintiffs had not proceeded so as to give the court jurisdiction, inasmuch as they had not given the notice required by the statute to the person creating such nuisance. The court held that, under the provisions of such statutes, notice was only required in those cases where the board of health sought to proceed in a summary manner, and that the provisions of the statute relating to notice did not apply to proceedings to abate the nuisance by way of injunction in equity.

Sections 28 and 29 of the New Jersey Public Laws of March 31, 1887, p. 80, giving power to a local board of health to enjoin nuisances, only apply to nuisances arising and maintained within the jurisdiction of such board, and 41 L. R. A.

merits, from which the plaintiff appealed. The special verdict was to the effect that the defendant used and maintained the slaughterhouse in question without any authority or license from the city of Red Wing, and conducted the business therein in such a manner as to be offensive, disagreeable, and annoying to persons residing in the vicinity of his premises, and to persons traveling along the public therefore where the nuisances arise without the territorial limits, their redress must be sought under the New Jersey statute of 1894, May 24. State, Vailsburgh Bd. of Health, v. East Orange Twp. 53 N. J. Eq. 498.

The New York statute of May 5, 1884, which gives county boards power, in their own name, to maintain a bill in equity for the abatement of either a public or private nuisance where it is apparent that the nuisance is of such a character that a private individual, living in the vicinity and affected by it, can maintain a like suit, does not clothe the local board of health with the functions of the attorney general in cases of public nuisances, but authorizes them in their own names to secure for individuals that protection which equity affords to those persons upon their own suit. Hudson County Bd. of Health & Vital Statistics v. New York Horse Manure Co. 47 N. J. Eq. 1.

Where action was commenced by the board of health for an injunction under N. Y. Laws 1885, chap. 270, but before the trial such act had been repealed by chap. 661 of the New York public health act of 1893, which took effect immediately, the effect of the repeal of such act upon the action was held to carry with it a repeal of the remedy also, and the suit for injunction was therefore dismissed. Schœpflin v. Calkins, 5 Misc. 163, following Hughson v. Rochester, 49 Hun. 45.

b. Burial grounds, etc.

Upon municipal control over nuisances relating to the burial of the dead, see note to Harrington v. Providence (R. I.) 38 L. R. A. 305, II. c.

Cemeteries and burying grounds are not only recognized as necessary, but are otherwise provided for, and protected, by humane laws, yet it may be that a burying ground in the limits of a city, where the population is dense, may become a nuisance: but cemeteries and burying grounds are not per se nuisances, nor is the naked averment that they are such, without the statement of sufficient reasons to render them so, sufficient to authorize proceedings for their abatement or suppression. Beglein v. Anderson, 28 Ind. 79, 80, wherein the city sought to abate or enjoin the cemetery as a public nuisance.

So, as a general rule, it may be said that equity will not interfere by way of injunction to restrain the location of a cemetery, where the purposes for which it is located are performed in a careful manner, although such relief might be granted in cases where the burying of the dead is done in a careless and improvident manner. Ellison v. Washington Comrs. 58 N. C. (5 Jones, Eq.) 57, 75 Am. Dec. 430.

A mere problematical averment, in a complaint by a municipality seeking to restrain a cemetery, that the establishment of a cemetery on the ground prescribed would materially retard the advance of improvements in all that portion of the city, can afford no ground for an injunction at the instance of the public authorities, and the mere fact that the act of incor-highway past them, by reason of the smells and stenches emitted therefrom, but such house and business have not been so conducted as to be injurious to the public health. This is, in its legal effect, the equivalent of a finding that the defendant is maintaining a public nuisance, although it is not injurious to the public health. Wood, Nuisances, §§ 299, 571; Gen. Stat. 1894,

poration of the city provides for the removal and abatement of nuisances to carry out and enforce sanitary regulations, and gives the common council jurisdiction 2 miles beyond the city limits, does not aid the public authorities in seeking such relief. Begeln v. Anderson, 28 Ind. 79, 80.

Under subdivision 5 of § 34 of the act of Indiana, Spec. Sess. 1865, p. 15, the common council have power to establish cemeteries or burial places within or without the city, and to provide for the sanctity of the dead, and to prohibit interments except in cemeteries theretofore established by law. Under this provision power is conferred on the city authorities to establish cemeteries outside of the city limits, and when this power is exercised the common council is authorized, by proper ordinance, to regulate and control such cemeteries. Such power does not, however, authorize the common council to prohibit the establishment of cemeteries or burial grounds by others without the corporate limits, nor give the city any jurisdiction or control over such when established, and such an act, therefore, only relates to interments within the city limits, and therefore where the city does not show that such a cemetery is a nuisance per se, it cannot enjoin its use by proceedings in equity. Begeln v. Anderson, 28 Ind. 79, 80.

In the above case the grounds upon which it was proposed to establish a cemetery were situated at least $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile beyond the city limits, and it was not easily seen how it could be or become a nuisance to the city with its then present limits were its population never so dense, and there was no averment in the complaint that the nuisance would result from the fact of the crowded state of the city's population, nor was it shown to be so even historically. The court held that, even though the city council had jurisdiction to declare the establishment of a cemetery within 2 miles, or any less distance, of the city limits to be a nuisance, and restrain or abate it as such, yet a complaint which failed to show the passing of any ordinance in reference thereto was defective, and therefore the injunction was refused. Begeln v. Anderson, 28 Ind. 79, 80.

So, in Lake View v. Letz, 44 Ill. 81, 84, the city authorities sought to restrain the defendants from establishing a cemetery within the limits of their town. The court refused the injunction upon the ground that it was not shown that such cemetery was necessarily a nuisance, or that it obstructed the public in the use of its streets, inasmuch as it might be so located and arranged, and so planted with trees, etc., and decorated, as to be not less beautiful than a landscape garden, and free from all reasonable objection, as the power to prohibit the establishment of cemeteries except by the authority of the trustees was not considered as failing within the power of removing and abating nuisances.

And in Lake View v. Rose Hill Cemetery Co. 70 Ill. 191, 22 Am. Rep. 71, a bill was filed by the city to restrain the county from using certain lands owned by it for over thirteen years, for the burial of the dead, in violation 41 L. R. A.

of an act of the state legislature, and of a subsequent act. The court refused to enjoin the use of the cemetery, upon the ground that it was not a nuisance per se, and a subject of legislative prohibition, although the legislature had the power to regulate the use of such cemeteries for the purpose of the interment of the dead in order to protect the public health. The act of the legislature subsequently passed did not profess to correct any abuses of the uses of the property, but was an arbitrary prohibition of its use in accordance with the provisions of a charter previously granted to such cemetery. There was no pretense that the cemetery as conducted was a nuisance, nor was there any charge that the health or comfort of the people in the vicinity had been, or would be, affected in the near, or even in the distant, future.

c. Hospitals, etc.

In Atty. Gen. v. Manchester [1893] 2 Ch. 87, an injunction was sought by the attorney general at the relation of a district local board, restraining defendant from establishing hospitals, for the reception of persons suffering from smallpox or other infectious diseases, so as to cause a nuisance to the inhabitants of the neighborhood. The court, however, refused the relief sought, as the plaintiff failed to show that there was a probability that the apprehended danger would in fact ensue, and stated that if, in such a case, the evidence showed that the maintenance of a smallpox hospital was on the whole more beneficial to the health of the public at large than the leaving of the persons suffering from the disease scattered in their own homes, it was a question whether some weight might not properly be allowed to such circumstances.

As to municipal control over nuisances arising from persons and things affected with disease, see note to Harrington v. Providence (R. I.) 88 L. R. A. 306, II. e.

d. Garbage, etc.

In Philadelphia v. Lyster, 3 Pa. Super. Ct. 475, the bill prayed for an injunction, at the instance of the city authorities to prevent defendant from collecting garbage in the city, carrying it through the streets, feeding it to the hogs, or spreading it upon the land in the city or adjoining thereto, and for general relief. An ordinance of the city made it unlawful for any person or persons, other than contractors with the city, to collect such material without having first obtained a permit from the board of health. The defendant admitted the ordinance, but denied the right of the board of health to determine the question, and also that the act complained of was a nuisance or prejudicial to public health, although he admitted that the garbage was collected without a permit, but contended that he collected it in a kind of wagon provided by the ordinance. The court refused the injunction, stating that the extraordinary powers claimed by the board of health had been misapprehended, as the power to declare the acts in question nuisances in fact and in law had not been delegated by the legislature to the board of health, and that therefore action to compel the abatement of a public nuisance which is not injurious to public health? It cannot do so unless its charter confers upon it authority to remove or abate public nuisances which affect the comfort and convenience of the public, but not the public health. But if it has such power under its charter it may maintain this action. The nuisance in question is the remedy for the unlawful acts alleged rested with the legislative branch of the city government, and if an adequate remedy had not been provided, that fact would not give a court of equity jurisdiction to supply a defect in the ordinance by injunction, in the absence of proof of an honest effort to enforce its provisions, and its inadequacy being demonstrated.

Although, in dealing with the evil complained of in a suit to restrain the acts of the defendant in removing his garbage from a city contrary to the provisions of the city ordinance, a large discretion is vested in the board of health, and while the board has the discretionary power to declare the keeping of garbage, offal, and refuse matter upon the streets, alleys, and the premises of individuals a nuisance, that discretion is not sufficiently far reaching to declare the act of a defendant in removing garbage from a city in carts or wagons of the construction claimed by the ordinance, and depositing it upon his own farm, to be a nuisance, when he has adopted the precise means for that purpose prescribed by the ordinance of the city. Philadelphia v. Lyster, 3 Pa. Super. Ct. 475, 480.

In Butterfoss v. State, Lambertville Bd. of Health, 40 N. J. Eq. 325, an injunction was granted at the instance of the public authorities to restrain the defendant from creating a nuisance, by depositing refuse from his business of a tomato canning factory into a reservoir which communicated with a covered sewer which ran into a natural stream, as the same was a source of foulness hazardous to the public health.

A contract entered into by a board of health for a garbage crematory will not be enjoined on the ground that a nuisance will be created, where it expressly provides for a plant the operation of which will not prove a nuisance. Deysher v. Reading, 18 Pa. Co. Ct. 611.

As to municipal control over nuisances affecting health in the removal of filth, etc., see note to Harrington v. Providence (R. I.) 38 L. R. A. 805, 11. b.

Upon the question of municipal control over nuisances affecting highways in the removal of garbage, see note to Hagerstown v. Witmer (Md.) 39 L. R. A. 640, 11.

e. Sewers and drains.

Where a board of health has power, by act of legislation, upon notice of a nuisance existing, to examine the same in a summary way, and order or cause the same to be abated, instead of proceeding in such manner, it also has the power to file a bill in the name of the state to prohibit the continuance of such nuisance, such power comprehending every nuisance or source of foulness hazardous to the public health. State, Trenton Bd. of Health, v. Hutchinson, 39 N. J. Eq. 218.

In Board of Health v. Maginnis Cotton Mills, 46 La. Ann. 806, 810, an injunction was granted at the instance of the public authorities to restrain the defendant from maintaining outlets from the privies and cesspools of its factory into the public gutters of the city, through which outlets fecal and other offensive, dead and injurious, matter flowed, thereby imperiling the public health and creating a nuisance. Where it was sought to restrain the defendant from partially draining a certain pond, and exposing its shores so as to endanger the public health and create a public nuisance, it was held that, as neither the remedy by indictment, nor the proceedings under the Massachusetts statutes for the abatement of nuisances by a board of health, was a complete remedy for the whole mischief, as neither could be invoked until a part of the mischief was done, and could not, in the nature of things, restore the pond, the land, and the underground currents to the same condition to which they were before, the preventive force of a decree in equity, restraining the illegal act before any mischief was done, was a more efficacious, complete, and proper remedy. Atty. Gen. v. Jamaica Pond Aqueduct Corp. 133 Mass. 361, 363. In this case, however, it does not appear that the proceedings were at the relation of the municipality.

A drain pipe, laid by permission of the common council upon certain conditions relating to its removal upon becoming a nuisance, upon notice to the owner, his heirs or assigns, and by the council in case of his refusal or neglect, may be enjoined by the city as a public nuisance, even though the city does not revoke such ordinance or permission. State, Trenton Bd. of Health, v. Hutchinson, 39 N. J. Eq. 218.

In Hutchinson v. State, Trenton Bd. of Health, 39 N. J. Eq. 509, the defendants sought to justify their acts in causing and maintaining a nuisance injurious to health by discharging, into a certain run through a certain pipe laid in the street, filth and offensive matter, under power given by the public authorities of the city, but relief by way of injunction was granted to the board of health properly organized under the state statute, the court upholding the right of a board of health to maintain the bill in the name of the state.

So, in New York Health Department v. Lalor, 38 Hun. 542, the court granted an injunction restraining the defendant from executing the plumbing and drainage from his houses in violation of the directions of, and the conditions imposed by, the board of health act of 1881, § 5, giving the court power, upon affidavit of the commissioner of health, to restrain by injunction any violation of the act, or any work upon or about buildings or premises whereon the violation exists, the power of the board being in the nature of a police regulation for the purpose of protecting the public health and preventing nuisances.

And in Gould, Brighton Bd. of Health, v. Rochester, 105 N. Y. 46, the court granted relief in equity to enforce an order of the board of health of a town calling upon the defendant city to abate a nuisance by reason of the discharge of sewage upon and over the lands of the town belonging to such board of health, thereby creating a nuisance, and restrained the same, as, under N. Y. Laws 1850, chap. 324, as amended by the Laws of 1882, chap. 351, the board of health could not summarily execute its orders abating a nuisance outside of its

"Sec. 5. The city council shall have full power and authority to make, ordain, adopt, establish, publish, enforce, alter, amend, or repeal all such ordinances, rules, and by-laws for the government and good order of the city and for the prevention of crime, as they shall deem expedient and in and by the same to declare and impose penalties and punishment by fine, imprisonment, or both, and for these purposes the said city council shall have authority by such ordinance, by-law, or resolutions.

"Subsec. 5. To compel the owner or occupant of any cellar, tallow chandler shop, soap factory, tannery, barn, stable, privy, sewer, or jurisdiction, although it might invoke the aid of a court of equity to abate a nuisance arising outside of its boundaries or jurisdiction.

Again, in Bell v. Rochester, 33 N. Y. S. R. 739, the action of the board of health of a town against a city, to restrain the discharge of sewage by such city upon the lands of the town, and praying an injunction to restrain such nuisance, was upheld, as an action in equity may be maintained to enforce the order of a board of health, and to restrain the continuance of a nuisance maintained by an adjoining town or city, upon the premises under or within the jurisdiction of such board of health, as, although such board would not have the power to go into the city and interfere with its premises and summarily enjoin or abate the nuisance, it could enforce its orders and prevent the nuisance.

And a board of health is entitled to a perpetual injunction restraining defendants from draining privies, sewer pipes, and closets into a brook, and from connecting any privies, closets, or sewer pipes with such brook, or with any pipes or drains leading into the said brook and from violating in any manner an order made by such board relating to the abatement of the nuisance, as the draining of such privies into a brook constitutes a public nuisance detrimental to life and to public health. New Brighton Bd. of Health, v. Casey, 18 N. Y. S. R. 251, 253.

The question of municipal control over nuisances affecting health arising from water-closets and privies, and drains and drainage, will be found in note to Harrington v. Providence (R. I.) 38 L. R. A. 306, II. c. d.

f. Trade or business.

The question of municipal power over nuisances relating to trade or business will be found in note to Ex parte Lacey (Cal.) 38 L. R. A. 640.

In Atty. Gen. v. Steward, 20 N. J. Eq. 415, 417, wherein the attorney general joined with the inhabitants in restraining the defendant's business upon the ground that it was a nuisance affecting the schools owned by the state, it is said that any trade or business however lawful, which from the place or manner in which it is carried on, materially injures the property of others, or affects their health, or renders the enjoyment of life physically uncomfortable, is a nuisance which it is the duty of a court of equity to restrain.

So, in State, North Brunswick Twp. Bd. of Health, v. Lederer, 52 N. J. Eq. 675, wherein the board of health of the township sought to restrain the defendant from exercising his business of a fat rendering establishment so as to create a nuisance, and to abate the same, it was held that the board of health in the township in which a nuisance exists or is carried on has the authority, and it is its duty, to abate such nuisance, either on its own motion or by the aid of the court, though it is only hazardous to the health of individuals residing in another township.

And, in People v. Detroit White Lead Works, 82 Mich. 471, 480, 9 L. R. A. 722, wherein the defendants were prosecuted for infringing a city ordinance declaring certain business carried on in a certain manner to be public nuisances, the court stated that it considered the course pursued in the earlier case of Robinson v. Baugh, 31 Mich. 290, wherein numerous residents sought to enjoin the carrying on of the business by bill in equity, a proper one as being much fairer to those occupied in a legitimate business than proceeding by way of indictment.

Under Mass. Gen. Stat. chap. 26, § 55, the board of health has the power to take all the necessary measures to prevent the exercise of any trade in violation of its order, and for that purpose it may, by special authority, bring a suit in the name of the city, and in such suit the bill may be properly signed by the mayor. Taunton v. Taylor, 116 Mass. 254, 262. In this case it was sought to restrain the exercise of an offensive trade in violation of an order of the board of health of the city.

A suit in equity to restrain a public nuisance consisting of an offensive trade, originally brought in the name of the selectmen as a board of health of the town, may be amended by substituting the inhabitants of the town as plaintiffs, after the term of office of such selectmen has ended. Winthrop v. Farrar, 11 Allen, 398.

In New Orleans v. Lambert, 14 La. Ann. 244, an injunction was granted at the instance of the municipality, restraining the defendant from operating a blacksmith shop, which created a nuisance and became dangerous to public health and safety, by reason of the noise, odor, and smoke therefrom, the ordinance of the city ordering such shop to be closed as a nuisance. In this case it was shown that the nuisance rendered living in the neighborhood inconvenient and unpleasant, and was a direct violation of a city ordinance.

In Com. v. Snyder, 2 Pa. Co. Ct. 260, the complaint charged the defendant with conducting his business of a butcher in the borough so as to constitute a public nuisance, and a true bill was found against him. A bill in equity for an injunction to restrain him from continuing the same nuisance was also filed, and a temporary injunction was granted, but it was subsequently dissolved, the affidavit failing to establish that the alleged nuisance was either existing or pending at the time the bill was brought. Both proceedings were pending, and the defendant sought to be discharged from the criminal prosecution until the bill in equity was disposed of. The court held that while a criminal prosecution and a common-law action growing out of the same transaction were both pending at the same time, the practice was well established to try the civil cause first, although even then it was entirely within the discretion of the court, yet that such rule was without reason or force when applied to proceedings in equity, whose courts were armed with full power to compel discovery without the aid of the common-law courts. It does not clearly appear in this case whether the party prosecuting and bringing the civil action was a private individual or not.

So, in Helcher v. Farrar, 8 Allen, 325, the selectmen of the town sought to restrain the other unwholesome nauseous house or place, to cleanse, remove, or abate the same from time to time as often as may be necessary for the health, comfort, and convenience of the inhabitants of said city."

"Subsec. 31. To remove and abate any nuisance injurious to the public health, and to provide for the punishment of all persons who shall cause or maintain such nuisance.

"Subsec. 32. To remove or abate any nuisance, obstruction, or encroachment upon the streets, alleys, public grounds, or highways of the city."

"Sec. 12. The power conferred upon the defendant operating his works in the manufacture of kerosene oil so as to create a nuisance, pursuant to an order of the selectmen requiring him to abate it. The court stated that there was no violation of principle in suspending the appropriation of private property to a particular use, alleged to be hurtful and injurious to others, until it could be ascertained judicially whether such allegation was well founded, and that it was upon that ground that courts of equity were empowered to issue injunctions to restrain the use of property, such process being only preliminary not concluding the rights of the parties, as, if the alleged offensive and noisome trade were carried on in the meantime, a great injury to health would be occasioned, and it would be impossible to prevent the evils which were most manifestly the object of Mass. Stat. chap. 26, which gave the board of health, or selectmen of the town, power over nuisances, and to suppress them. The court therefore upheld the order of the board of selectmen acting as a board of health, which prohibited the manufacture of such oils within the town as nuisances dangerous to public health, as valid and legal under § 52, chap. 26, General Statutes, and binding upon the defendant, although passed without previous notice.

And, in New Orleans v. Stafford, 27 La. Ann. 417, 21 Am. Rep. 563, an injunction was granted restraining the defendant from opening, conducting, carrying on, or continuing any private market or place of business for the sale of fresh meats, fresh fish, poultry, game, vegetables, etc., in the city, within the space or distance of twelve squares of any public market, under the jurisdiction and authority of the administrator of the commerce of the city, and otherwise violating in any manner the provisions of an act entitled "An Act to Regulate the Private Markets in the City of New Orleans, and for Other Purposes," passed on the 26th of January, 1874, which act abolished all private markets located within such distance of a public market. The court stated that the legislature had power to make such regulations under the police power, and that the authority sprang from the principle salus populi suprema est lex. The defendant had no vested private right to the privilege, even if he really possessed it, as it was acquired subordinately to the right existing in the sovereign to exercise the police power to regulate the peace and good order of the city, and to provide for and maintain its cleanliness and salubrity.

So, it is said that as a general rule, equity has jurisdiction to enjoin the erection and establishment of slaughterhouses in such a way as to become a public nuisance, either to individuals, or to the public. Reichert v. Geers, 98 Ind. 75, 49 Am. Rep. 736.

In Watertown v. Mayo, 100 Mass. 318, 12 Am. Rep. 634, the city authorities sought to restrain by injunction the defendant from occupying and using the building, or carrying on the business of slaughtering cattle and other animals therein, without the written consent of the selectmen, under Mass Stat. 1871, chap. 167, relating to slaughterhouses and noxious and offensive trades. The court held that the defendant's business, so carried on by him without the written consent and permission of the selectmen, was a plain violation of the provisions of the statute, and, therefore granted an injunction, as, by § 3 of the same, power was given to prevent by injunction the erection, use, or enlargement of buildings in violation of its provisions.

In Atty. Gen. v. Steward, 20 N. J. Eq. 415, 417, it was sought to restrain the defendants from erecting in the city a slaughterhouse and pork-packing house, and pens for keeping cattle and hogs, upon the ground that the same would be a nuisance. The attorney general joined with the inhabitants to enjoin the business as a nuisance to the state schools. The court refused the injunction so far as the alleged nuisance was said to affect, and be detrimental to, the owners of adjoining vacant lots, inasmuch as it was not shown that the business was intended to be erected thereon, and that the question whether or not the slaughterhouse intended to be erected was a nuisance injurious to the sale of such lots, for which the law would provide a remedy before the buildings were erected, was one of law, in which equity could not, in the first instance, interfere, especially where the party about to erect such slaughterhouse showed that the same would be conducted so as not to constitute a nuisance, equity withholding its jurisdiction until it became apparent that the same would constitute a nuisance.

So, in Grand Rapids v. Weiden, 97 Mich. 32, an injunction was granted at the instance of the city authorities restraining defendant from conducting a rendering establishment which, by reason of intolerable stench therefrom, permeated the neighborhood causing nausea, debility, and discomfort, and compelling people to shut their doors and windows in order to avoid it, and created an intolerable nuisance.

In the above case the alleged nuisance was in a growing section of the city, and arose from the trying of tallow, and from offal and bones stacked away for shipment, hair put into barrels, and accumulated blood thrown into a dirt pile which was removed once a week, numerous hogs being kept about the premises running in an inclosure and fed on a mixture of meat from the bones, and corn meal or bran, the only ventilation in the building on the premises being a small hole in the chimney. The court restrained the prosecution of the business in that section of the city after a given date, and required the defendant in the meantime to observe certain suggestions made with reference to the accumulation of offal, and the daily cleansing of the establishment, and the removal of all filth.

So, where it appeared that the odors and gases from a fat rendering establishment produced headache, nausea, vomiting, and compelled citizens to close their doors and windows both by day and at night, and interfered with them in the enjoyment of their meals, and of sleep, such establishment was held to be a nuisance for the abatement of which it was the duty of the board of health to take proper measures, the board of health seeking the aid of the court by virtue of the New Jersey statute, which extends its power so far as to inquire city council to provide for the abatement or removal of nuisances shall not bar or hinder suits or proceedings under any general law of this state."

It is obvious from the reading of these provisions that a distinction is made in nuisances, and that the city is not authorized to deal with all alike. Those which jeopardize the public health or obstruct the public streets and grounds, the city itself may proceed summarily whether the nuisance, sources of foulness, or causes of sickness hazardous to the public health exist or not, the interpretation given to the statute by numerous cases showing that the inquiry was limited to the determination of questions relative to the public health, and that in order to give the court jurisdiction there must be proof of danger, peril, or risk, or something equivalent thereto, to justify the court in lending its aid, and that when such a case was made manifest the statute prescribes what the court should do. State, North Brunswick Twp. Bd. of Health, v. Lederer, 52 N. J. Eq. 675.

In Schoepflin v. Calkins, 5 Misc. 159, action was brought by the board of health of the town to have the defendants' rendering works declared a nuisance, and their continued use restrained by injunction. The defendants objected to the enforcement of the order, upon the ground that it was invalid because no notice had been given, so that they might be heard in their own behalf before the order was made by the board for the abatement of such nuisance. It was insisted by the plaintiffs that such notice was not requisite for the reason that the action was an equitable one, and simply sought to restrain the continuance of a nuisance. The court held that the mere fact that the action was in equity did not affect the defendants' right to notice and opportunity to be heard, as, if the action was maintained, and the relief sought by it secured, its effect would be to render valueless, or substantially so, the structures erected by the defendants to carry on their business, and destroy their business, and that such far-reaching consequences could not be imposed upon them by an order of the board of health without notice to them, or an opportunity, before the order was made, to be heard as against the complaints upon which the board were acting.

Where the city sought to restrain the defendants from erecting a building in the city intended to be used as a hay press, but it was not alleged that the manufacture of pressed hay, within the compact parts of the city, was in itself a nuisance, the court refused the injunction. Hudson v. Thorne, 7 Paige, 261, 264.

So, in Green v. Lake, 54 Miss. 544, 28 Am. Rep. 378, it was sought to abate and perpetually enjoin the defendant from carrying on and continuing the use of his corn and flour mill, upon the ground that the same was a public nuisance, but, inasmuch as it was not shown that such mill was a nuisance per se, the court refused to perpetually enjoin the defendant in its use, and added, that before the court would abate a nuisance by way of injunction, it must be satisfied that the grievance was serious and well founded, and that no remedy short of the cessation of such use existed. In this case the business was claimed to be a nuisance to the whole community and the plaintiff with others sought to enjoin it as such, but it does not appear that the municipal authorities were parties.

In Daw v. Enterprise Powder Mfg. Co. 160 Pa. 479, it was sought to restrain the defendants from constructing a powder magazine near the settled portion of the borough adjoining a railroad, to be used for storing powder, dynamite, and other explosives, and inflammable substances. The defendants admitted the construction of such building, but denied that they intended to put it to such uses, or that the uses to which they intended to put it would in any manner endanger life or property or affect the neighborhood unfavorably in any way, and contended that the same was only to be used for storing blasting powder, which was not a high explosive, and also declared that no objection had been taken by the public authorities to other premises in the built-up portion of the city which were used for storing powder of the same kind. The court refused the preliminary injunction, stating that when the facts were developed the question could be more intelligently disposed of.

In Atty. Gen. v. Utica Ins. Co. 2 Johns. Ch. 371, 380, 390, the court refused an injunction, at the instance of the attorney general ex officio, restraining the defendants from carrying on a banking business contrary to the statutes, upon the ground that it was not such a mischief or public nuisance as the court would grant an injunction to restrain, even if it had jurisdiction over public nuisances, and stated that it must be an extremely rare case for the court of equity to interfere at all, much less preliminarily by injunction to put down as a public nuisance that which did not violate the rights of property, but only contravened the general policy, the exercise of the banking power not being a public nuisance, and, even if it were a nuisance, it would be a public offense over which courts of law had uniform and undisputed cognizance.

g. Buildings and other structures.

An injunction against the unlawful use of buildings as a nuisance is not beyond the jurisdiction of equity, on the ground that it is in the nature of a punishment for a criminal offense. State, Rhodes, v. Saunders, 66 N. H. 39, 18 L. R. A. 646.

So, where a frame building is erected in a closely built-up part of the town, and is in fact a nuisance, it may be abated by the public authorities, in a clear case, by proceeding in equity. Wilkes-Barre v. Frauenthal, 6 Kulp, 444.

Yet, in the case of First Nat. Bank v. Sarila, 129 Ind. 201, 203, 13 L. R. A. 481, it is stated that, as a rule, a court of equity will not, at the suit of the city, restrain by injunction the threatened violation of an ordinance of such city regulating the erection of buildings, for the purpose of greater security against damage by fire, and that the application of the restraining power to prevent the erection of buildings in violation of such ordinances should be confined to cases where the act sought to be restrained would be a nuisance in fact, and not one created solely by statutory enactment or municipal ordinance.

The following authorities also support the doctrine that equity will not interfere to enforce by injunction the observance of city ordinances prohibiting the erection of buildings not nuisances per se: Sheldon v. Weeks, 51 Ill. App. 314, 315; Waupum Trustees v. Moore, 34 Wis. 450, 17 Am. Rep. 446; Hudson v. Thorne, 7 Paige, 261; St. Johns v. McFarlan, 33 Mich. 72, 20 Am. Rep. 671; Williamsport v. McFadden, 15 W. N. C. 209.

to remove or abate, as provided in subsections 81 and 82. This power is conferred upon the city because of the character and consequences of such nuisances. The cases are extreme, and will brook no delay. When the public health is imperiled or public travel is obstructed by the existence of a nuisance, the city may act promptly, and not wait for the slow process of securing its abatement by enforcing the penalties of an ordinance. But as to nuisances which

And a state statute declaring the use of a building for either of several unlawful purposes to be a nuisance abatable in equity, does not introduce an exceptional mode of trial, or change the ordinary course of proceedings on questions properly triable by jury. State, Rhodes, v. Saunders, 66 N. H. 39, 18 L. R. A. 644.

In New York Fire Department v. Beaudet, 21 Abb. N. C. 164, plaintiff sought to enjoin the defendant from continuing work on premises alleged to be erected in violation of the plans and specifications approved by the fire department, by reason of a bay window projecting into the public street for the distance of about 2 feet, in violation of law, the injunction being asked for, pending an action to recover penalties for violation of the ordinance. The court held that, under § 81, chap. 566, New York Laws 1887, such injunction should be confined to restrain the progress of any violation named, and not so as to enjoin the future progress of the work.

So, relief was denied in Watertown v. Sawyer, 109 Mass. 320, wherein it was sought to restrain, by injunction, the defendant from occupying and using a building for slaughtering cattle contrary to Mass. Stat. 1871, chap. 167. The defendant alleged that the buildings were erected on the site of a former building used and occupied by him for the same purposes, before the passing of the statutes, and was not a public or private nuisance, as the old building was destroyed by fire, and the new one was erected in its place, which, although different in construction and arrangement, was no larger in extent and capacity. The court refused the injunction as the accidental destruction of the building by fire was no intention on the part of the owner to abandon the use to which he had devoted the premises, and did not, under the statutes, involve the forfeiture of the right to continue without license the same business on the same place in a new building of no larger capacity erected on the same site, the language of the statute being "building or premises not occupied."

So, if the building sought to be repaired or altered has existed for years, and the proposed alteration and repairing does not create a nuisance in fact, or occasion irreparable mischief or injury, and the case does not show that the proposed change either increased or diminished the danger of fire, equity will not interfere by way of injunction to restrain the same. Manchester v. Smyth, 64 N. H. 380. In this case plaintiff sought the extraordinary remedy of a perpetual injunction against the defendant's proposed erection and enlargement of his building in violation of a penal ordinance of the city against fire.

So, where a village ordinance prohibits the erection of wooden buildings within certain specified limits, imposes a penalty for violation thereof, and provides that the president and trustees of the village shall cause any person violating the ordinance to be enjoined by a court of competent jurisdiction, an injunction will not be granted to prevent the erection of wooden buildings in violation of the ordinance. And the provision in the ordinance directing the officers to proceed by injunction, in such a case, in no manner extends or enlarges the jurisdiction of the court, and the municipal authorities will be left to seek their remedy at law for a violation of the ordinance. Ogden v. Weiden, 40 N. Y. S. R. 235.

So, the court refused an injunction to restrain the defendant from erecting, within the fire limits, a wooden building in violation of a city ordinance, as the building was not completed, and the defendant and the contractors asserted positively that there was no intention to violate the ordinance,—especially as the evidence showed that when completed the outer walls and roof would be constructed wholly of incombustible materials, and raised a substantial doubt as to the facts essential to the jurisdiction. Wilkes-Barre v. Frauenthal, 6 Kulp, 444.

And, in Honesdale v. Weaver, 2 Pa. Dist. R. 344, the court refused relief at the suit of the chief burgess, assistant burgess, and town council of the borough against the defendants from erection of a wooden building in the borough contrary to an ordinance thereof, as the wooden building complained of was not a nuisance in itself, and for the further reason that the proceeding to enjoin such an erection was one to enforce a municipal ordinance, for which a suit in equity was not the proper remedy, as without express legislative authority, the by-laws of a municipal corporation could only be enforced by a pecuniary penalty which must be certain.

Again, in a case where defendants erected a frame barn on land owned by them, contrary to the provisions of a town ordinance prescribing fire limits and creating a penalty, which building was destroyed by fire, and was threatened and intended to be re-erected contrary to the provisions of such ordinance, the court refused relief upon the ground that the bill was not to restrain a nuisance, and contained no allegation that such building was a nuisance, its only purpose being to aid the city in enforcing its ordinance in respect to the establishment of such fire limits, and also upon the ground it was not shown that the penalties fixed were inadequate for the purpose, and even if it were so shown the power to make such penalty sufficient was vested in the city itself. Williamsport v. McFadden, 15 W. N. C. 269.

In Ellwood City v. Manl, 16 Pa. Co. Ct. 474, the borough sought to restrain defendant from constructing and erecting a frame building within the fire limits, as regulated by the borough ordinance, and the questions raised were, whether the borough had authority to pass such ordinance, and whether the court had jurisdiction or authority to enforce it. Upon the first question the court held that the legislature had undoubtedly power to prohibit the erection of wooden buildings within the limits of a borough or city, and also the power to confer that right or authority upon municipal corporations, such as boroughs and cities, which were subdivisions of the state created by the state for the comfort and convenience of the citizens, although it refused the injunction upon the ground that such wooden buildings, although erected contrary to law, were not nuisances per se, even though they might become a nuisance by reason of the ordinance passed by the municipal authority, which authority also provided a remedy which must be followed, and upon affect the comfort or convenience of the public, but not the public health, the city is only authorized to compel the owners of the buildings or places which constitute the nuisances to remove or abate them as provided by subsection 5 of its charter. There is no occasion for immediate action in such cases. The literal reading of this subsection 5 would indicate that the city could not compel the owner of such a building or place to cleanse, remove, or abate the same unless it affected the public health as well as the comfort and convenience of the public, the words of the statute being "health, comfort, and convenience." But, clearly, such is not the intention of the statute, and the word "and" should be read "or," in accordance with the rule that "or" may be read for "and" in a statute, and conversely, as the clear intent of the statute may require. Weston v. Loyhed, 30 Minn. 226; Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 252.

It follows from our construction of its charter that the city of Red Wing has the power to compel the abatement of a nuisance affecting the comfort or convenience of the public, although it is not injurious to the public health, and therefore it may maintain an equitable action to aid in compelling an abatement of such a nuisance. It also follows that the trial court erred in entering judgment upon the special verdict for the defendant dismissing the action.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

the ground that the fact that it had neglected to provide the remedy, or that the remedy was not sufficient, was no ground for the interference of a court of equity, as the borough authorities still had the power to make an adequate remedy and means to enforce the ordinance. In this case the court followed the prior decisions in Williamsport v. McFadden, 15 W. N. C. 269, and Houesdale v. Weaver, 2 Pa. Dist. R. 344.

So, relief was refused in a case where the defendant was erecting a two-story brick stable fronting the same upon another street than that mentioned in his permit, which street was wholly unimproved by brick or stone buildings prior to the passing of Pa. act April 21, 1855. The city authorities claimed that the stable as fronting on such street was erected in direct violation of the act (Pamph. Laws, 265, § 6), which provides as follows: "No new dwelling house, or other buildings within said city, shall front upon any street, alley, or court which shall be of less width than 20 feet, or without being made to recede, so that such street, alley, or court shall be of that width, the buildings on each side equally receding, the damages for which widening shall be assessed and paid to the owner in the manner provided by law in case of opening new streets; every new dwelling house shall also have an open space attached to it, in the rear or at the side, equal to at least 12 feet square; and no building of any kind shall be permitted to be erected on any street, court, or alley hereafter to be laid out, or if laid out, and wholly unimproved by brick or stone buildings before the passage of this act, of a less width than 25 feet; and every builder or owner who shall hereafter build otherwise than aforesaid shall pay to the said city $100, to be recovered with costs, as debts of that amount may by law be recovered, and shall be restrained by injunction." The court held that the act should be read as an entirety, and that the clause "or without being made to recede so that such street, alley, or court shall be of that width, the buildings on either side equally receding," referred to 25-foot streets as well as to 20-foot streets, and that the terms of the statute had been substantially complied with by the defendant. The injunction was therefore refused, the street by the receding of the building being practically made of the width of 25 feet as required by the statute. Philadelphia v. Wall, 134 Pa. 557.

So, in Daw v. Enterprise Powder Mfg. Co., 160 Pa. 479, the court refused to restrain the erection of a powder-house in the borough adjoining a railroad, which was to be used for the purpose of storing powder and explosives and inflammable substances, as the affidavits filed by way of answer were clear, positive, and unequivocal denials of the material allegations of the bill and there was no evidence in rebuttal, the court stating that if, on a final hearing, the contrary should be shown, or if at any time the building should be put to a use constituting a nuisance, it could still be enjoined.

Again, in Waupun Trustees v. Moore, 34 Wis. 450, 17 Am. Rep. 446, the court refused to enjoin the defendant from erecting a wooden building within the limits of a village, where the ordinance prohibited the erection of such building within a specified area, the erection of such wooden building not being unlawful outside of such village ordinance, the mere erection of a wooden building not being a nuisance per se.

In the above case, while the court did not decide whether the village board had power under its charter to pass the ordinance in question, yet it stated that it had disposed of the case on the hypothesis that the charter conferred such power on the board.

The question of municipal power to enjoin buildings, fences, and other structures as nuisances affecting highways and streets will be the subject of a subsequent note.

The general question of municipal control over buildings, fences, and other structures is treated of in note to Evansville v. Miller (Ind.) 38 L. R. A. 161. M. W.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY, App't.,

v.

Jim NASH.

(.....Ala.....)

1. Payment by a garnishee of a judgment which was void for want of jurisdiction over the nonresident creditor will not be a defense to an action by the latter.
2. The situs of a debt is at the domicile of the creditor for the purpose of garnishment.
3. Due process of law is not furnished by garnishment of a debt due to a nonresident who is not personally served within the state, and does not voluntarily appear.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the City Court of Birmingham in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover wages alleged to be due and unpaid which defendant claimed to have paid under garnishment proceedings in another state. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. Thomas G. Jones for appellant.

Mr. S. L. Weaver for appellee.

Brickell, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee, a resident of this state, and an employee of appellant, brought this action against appellant, the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Kentucky, and doing business in that state, and also in Alabama and Tennessee, to recover the amount of wages earned and due him for work and labor done here for appellant. In defense of the action, appellant set up the payment by it, previously to the commencement of this suit, of a judgment rendered against it in a justice's court in the state of Tennessee in an attachment suit, founded on a debt due in Tennessee, wherein appellee was defendant and appellant was summoned to answer as garnishee. Appellee was a resident of Alabama at the time of the commencement, and during the pendency, of said attachment suit, was not personally served with notice thereof, had no actual notice, and did not voluntarily appear, but service was had by publication, in accordance with the laws of Tennessee. The questions presented by this appeal are, therefore—First, whether the courts of one state have, or can acquire, jurisdiction to attach and condemn a debt due to a nonresident, and payable in the state of his residence, by service of process on his debtor as garnishee, in the absence of personal service within the state of suit on the creditor or his voluntary appearance; and, second, whether, if such courts are without jurisdiction for this purpose, the payment by the garnishee of a judgment rendered against him as garnishee, under such circumstances, will constitute any defense to a subsequent suit by his creditor to recover the debt.

The case presented is ruled, with respect to both questions, by the cases of Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Dooley, 78 Ala. 524, and Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Chumley, 93 Ala. 317. In the former case it was held that a debt due by a foreign corporation to an employee in the state of its creation, although it was doing business in this state also, could not be subjected by a creditor in this state by attachment against the nonresident creditor and garnishment against the corporation. In the latter we decided that the payment by a railroad corporation created by the laws of this state, but doing business also in Tennessee, of a judgment rendered against it in Tennessee under a garnishment issued on a judgment recovered in that state against an employee resident in this state, was no defense to an action by the employee to recover the wages due him for work done in this state, in the absence of evidence showing that, by the statutes of Tennessee, the court had acquired jurisdiction of the debt sought to be reached and subjected. In both of the above cases it was expressly decided that the situs of a debt, for the purpose of garnishment, is at the domicile of the creditor, and not that of the debtor; and this fact is the true foundation for the proposition that a state has no jurisdiction over a debt due to a nonresident, and payable without the state of suit, in the absence of personal service on the creditor within the state, or his voluntary appearance in a proceeding in which jurisdiction over it is sought to be exercised. If it be conceded that a debt due by a resident of, or a corporation doing business in, one state, to a resident in another state, is not properly within the state of the debtor's residence, no legislation by the latter state can give it a situs there for the purpose of enabling its citizens, or other persons resorting to its courts, to subject it to the payment of claims against the creditor by garnishing the person or corporation from whom it is due. If it has no situs within the debtor's state, in the absence of legislation, any legislation attempting to give it such situs, or to prescribe the manner of service on either the debtor or the nonresident creditor, by which jurisdiction over it may be acquired, unless by personal service on the creditor within the state, or his voluntary appearance, would be as nugatory and ineffectual to dispose of the creditor's property in the debt as would be legislation attempting to acquire jurisdiction over tangible property situated without the state. The subject-matter of such legislation, namely, the property over which it is attempted to acquire jurisdiction, is entirely beyond the power and control of the state. In the view we take of the question, the victing it of receiving an excessive amount for baggage transportation. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. McD. Trimble, John A. Easton, and C. M. Rice for appellants.

Mr. E. B. Kinsworthy, for appellee:

Appellant is estopped from denying that these trunks were the baggage of Lincoln.

Battle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

An act entitled, "An Act to Regulate Charges on Excess Baggage on All Railroads Propelled by Steam or Electricity in This State over Five Miles in Length," approved April 19, 1895 [act 143, p. 210, §§ 1, 2], provides:

"Sec. 1. It shall be unlawful for any railroad in this state, over 5 miles in length, run by steam or electricity, to charge more than 12½ per cent of the cost of a first-class fare between all points in this state, per 100 pounds, for excess of baggage, over (150 lbs.) one hundred and fifty pounds: provided, that the minimum charge for excess, where the same does not exceed 200 pounds, shall not be less than 25 cents.

"Sec. 2. Any such railroad violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction be fined in any sum not less than $10 nor more than $25."

The Kansas City, Pittsburg, & Gulf Railroad Company was indicted for, and convicted of, a violation of this act, and was fined in the sum of $10.

The facts upon which the conviction was based are as follows: George T. Lincoln, a traveling salesman, purchased of the Kansas City, Pittsburg, & Gulf Railroad Company a ticket for transportation over its road from Siloam Springs, in Benton county, in this state, to Gentry, a station in the same county, and paid 20 cents for the same, the price of first-class fare. He had with him four trunks, which contained clothing of various kinds, and weighed in the aggregate 970 pounds. He carried this clothing with him, and used it as samples in making sales of the same description. The railroad company allowed him transportation for 150 of the 970 pounds free of additional expense, and charged and received from him $1.25 for the transportation of the remaining 820 pounds from Siloam Springs to Gentry. The sum received was the amount charged for like articles when shipped as first-class freight, was a freight rate, and not an excess baggage rate. The trunks were checked like baggage, and accompanied Lincoln upon the same train. The defendant's railroad exceeded 5 miles in length, and was operated by steam.

Were the four trunks and their contents "baggage" within the meaning of the act of April 19, 1895?

What is baggage, within the rule of the carrier's liability, depends much upon the reason why the passenger is allowed transportation for it as such. There can be but one, and that is because it is necessary or conducive to his convenience and comfort. It is necessary to him, and for that reason it is impliedly, if not expressly, included in every contract of the carrier to transport passengers. "The impossibility of traveling," says Chief Justice Cockburn, "without the accompaniment of a certain quantity of luggage for the personal comfort and convenience of the traveler has led from the earliest times to the practice, on the part of carriers of passengers for hire, of carrying, as a matter of course, a reasonable amount of luggage for the accommodation of the passenger, and of considering the remuneration for the carriage of such luggage as comprehended in the fare paid for the conveyance of the passenger." Hence courts and authors in defining what is baggage have embraced this idea in their definitions. Judge Story says that "by baggage we are to understand such articles of necessity or personal convenience as are usually carried by passengers for their personal use, and not merchandise or other valuables, although carried in the trunks of passengers, which are not designed for any such use, but for other purposes, such as a sale and the like." Story, Bailm. § 499. Baggage, says Chief Justice Cockburn, in Macrou v. Great Western R. Co. L. R. 6 Q. B. 612, is "whatever the passenger takes with him for his personal use or convenience according to the habits or wants of the particular class to which he belongs, either with reference to the immediate necessities or the ultimate purpose of the journey." Mr. Justice Field, in Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Swift, 12 Wall. 274, 20 L. ed. 429, said that the contract of the carrier to carry a passenger, as to baggage, "only implies an undertaking to transport such a limited quantity of articles as are ordinarily taken by travelers for their personal use and convenience, such quantity depending, of course, upon the station of the party, the object and length of the journey, and many other considerations." Upon the same principle, the statutes of this state provide: "Each passenger who shall pay fare . . . shall be entitled to have transported along with him, on the same train, and without additional charge, 150 pounds of baggage to consist of such articles as are usually carried by ordinary persons when traveling." [Sands & H. Dig. § 6215.]

Accordingly, it has been frequently held, as we do now, that merchandise carried for sale, or samples of merchandise carried for the purpose of making sales of goods of the same class do not come within the description of baggage. Humphreys v. Perry, 148 U. S. 627, 37 L. ed. 587; Alling v. Boston & A. R. Co. 126 Mass. 121, 30 Am. Rep. 687; Mississippi C. R. Co. v. Kennedy, 41 Miss. 671, 678; Macrow v. Great Western R. Co. L. R. 6 Q. B. 612; Hawkins v. Hoffman, 6 Hill, 589, 41 Am. Dec. 767; Hutchings v. Western & A. R. Co. 25 Ga. 61, 71 Am. Dec. 156; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Capps (Tex.) 16 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 118; Michigan C. R. Co. v. Carrow, 73 Ill. 348, 24 Am. Rep. 248; Strouss v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 17 Fed. Rep. 209; Pennsylvania Co. v. Miller, 35 Ohio St. 541, 35 Am. Rep. 620; Southern Kansas R. Co. v. Clark, 52 Kan. 398; Hutchings v. Western & A. R. Co. 25 Ga. 61, 71 Am. Dec. 160; Hutch. Carr. §§ 679, 685; Thomp. Carr. p. 510.

It is true that it is said in Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. v. McGahey, 63 Ark. 348, 36 L. R. A. 781: "When a passenger presents to the carrier for transportation his goods and chattels, and makes known what they are, or exposes them to view, or packs them in a way to give to anyone concerned good reason to understand and know that they are not usually carried as baggage, and demands transportation of them as his luggage, and the carrier receives and carries them accordingly, he will be responsible for them as baggage, notwithstanding he was not bound to accept and transport them as such. If he wishes to avoid responsibility for them as baggage, he must refuse to receive them in that way." But the act of April 19, 1895, does not apply to goods and chattels which do not come within the description of baggage. The carrier becomes liable for them as baggage by accepting them as such, by his own acts, and not from any obligation to transport them as baggage which the law imposes upon him. Such property he is not bound to receive, except upon the payment of the rates he is allowed to charge for the transportation of the same as freight.

In this case the railroad company was not bound to receive and transport Lincoln's trunks as baggage. It was entitled to compensation for carrying them at the rate it is lawful to charge for the transportation of such property as freight. It received nothing more, and is not guilty of violating the act of April 19, 1895.

Reversed, and remanded for a new trial.

CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO, Resp't.,

v.

Ellen GROTE, Appt.

(.....Cal.....)

1. A city may maintain ejectment for the possession of land dedicated for use as a street, although it does not own the fee.
2. A man cannot dedicate for street purposes land upon which he has placed a homestead so as to divest the rights of his wife therein.
3. Dedication of land for a highway is not shown by the fact that for eight years the land was used by the public generally for travel without either consent or objection on the part of the owner.

(February 9, 1896.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate alleged to have been dedicated for street purposes. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

See also report of case in Division 1, 36 L. R. A. 502.

Mr. T. Z. Blakeman, for appellant:

The action of the board of supervisors in 1887 upon the petition of certain property owners in said block to have Garden avenue "surveyed, delineated, and described," and obstructions removed, is conclusive upon the plaintiff and the public that Garden avenue at rear of defendant's lot was only 12½ feet wide.

The board of supervisors had "full power and authority" to close up in whole or in part any street, lane, or alley within the city.

People v. Dreher, 101 Cal. 274.

Mr. H. T. Creswell for respondent.

Garoutte, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is brought by the city to recover the possession of a small tract of land 124 by 85 feet, being a strip, of the aforesaid dimensions, forming the rear end of the lot of defendant. It is claimed by the city, and found as a fact by the trial court, that such strip had been dedicated by the owner to the public as a highway or street. Two material questions are raised by this appeal: (1) Can the city and county of San Francisco maintain ejectment for the recovery of the possession of a public street, without showing ownership of the land in fee? (2) Does the evidence show a dedication of the strip of land in dispute to the use of the public for street purposes?

While there may be a difference of opinion existing in the courts of other states upon the question, we think the doctrine should be held settled in this state that ejectment can be maintained for the recovery of the possession of a street dedicated to the public use by the owner of the fee. In Vtsalka v. Jacob, 65 Cal. 434, 52 Am. Rep. 308, this court declared: "It is true an action of ejectment may be maintained by a municipal corporation for the recovery of the possession of a street wrongfully possessed by an individual, whether the corporation owns the fee or the adjoining proprietor retains it. In the latter case the right of the municipality to regulate the public use, and for that purpose to possess, use, and control the property, is treated by the courts as a legal, and not merely an equitable, right." The same doctrine is reiterated in extenso in Southern P. Co. v. Burr, 86 Cal. 238. Although the facts there presented were somewhat different, the principle of law involved was the same, and the case is direct authority upon the legal issue here raised. In Eureka v. Armstrong, 83 Cal. 623 and 624, ejectment was successfully maintained to secure the possession of streets dedicated to the use of the public by the owner in fee, opposing counsel not even raising the objection that the remedy pursued was not authorized by the law. The same conditions are presented in Eureka v. Fay, 107 Cal. 166. In Napa v. Howland, 87 Cal. 84, 41 L. R. A.

the right of recovery in ejectment was sustained, and a rehearing was denied, although at all stages of the litigation it was insisted by defendant that the proper remedy for plaintiff was not ejectment. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 3d ed. § 662, and Elliott, Roads & Streets, pp. 321, 322, fully support the doctrine of the California cases we have cited. Wood v. Truckee Turnp. Co. 24 Cal. 487, is not in point, and especially is this true after the limitations and construction placed upon it by the decision in Southern P. Co. v. Burr, 86 Cal. 238. It may be conceded that a naked right of way, an easement in its simplest form, a mere right to pass over the land of another, is a thing so intangible and unsubstantial as to be insufficient to support an action of ejectment. But here the right of the city goes far beyond that. The city has the right of exclusive possession; a right to disturb the soil; a right to grade and otherwise improve the street in many ways. In other words, more than a mere right to the use of a street passes to the public by dedication. In addition to the right of use, there passes such an interest in the land as is necessary for the enjoyment of that use by the public.

In 1871, when the title to this land passed from the city to defendant's husband, he placed a homestead upon the lot. The defendant was at that time his wife. Grote died in the year 1889. During this period of eighteen years he did and said various things indicating to some extent an intention upon his part to dedicate the tract of land in dispute to the public for street purposes. But during all this period the declaration of homestead rested upon the premises, and under such circumstances the wife at all these times had an interest in the realty which the husband could not take away from her by any act of dedication upon his part. By reason of the prohibition declared by § 1242 of the Civil Code, the husband could neither convey nor encumber this land. It may at least be said that, if a dedication by the husband was established, an encumbrance thereafter rested upon the land. Indeed, if the city by acts of dedication upon the part of the husband can be vested with an interest in the realty so substantial as to support an action in ejectment, and the court so holds, then we have no doubt that such interest is so substantial as to form a burden upon the wife's rights which are extended to her by the aforesaid section of the Code. For these reasons there was no dedication of this land for a public use prior to the husband's death, for it was not in his power to dedicate, however clear his intention so to do may appear.

It is further claimed that a dedication occurred as evidenced by the acts of the wife subsequent to the death of the husband. We fail to find any evidence justifying such a conclusion. It is not a trivial thing to take another's land, and for this reason the courts will not lightly declare a dedication to public use. It is elementary law that an intention to dedicate upon the part of the owner must be plainly manifest. Here there is no such manifest intention. No single act of the defendant can be pointed out so indicating. For a period of about eight years, without either consent or objection upon her part, the land was used by the public generally for travel, and this was all. During his lifetime the husband erected a tenement upon the rear of the lot fronting upon the strip of land in dispute, the steps occupying 4 feet thereof. This house remained in the same position during the ownership and possession of the defendant, but there is nothing in these facts indicating dedication upon her part.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: Van Fleet, J.; Harrison, J.

McFarland, J.:

I concur in the judgment of reversal upon the second point discussed in the leading opinion relative to the homestead right. I think, however, that the case is within the old and well established rule that ejectment will not lie for the disturbance of a right of way or other easement. Two decisions of this court are mainly relied on: Visalia v. Jacob, 65 Cal. 484, 52 Am. Rep. 308; Southern P. Co. v. Burr, 86 Cal. 285. In the Visalia case the only question before the court was whether a private citizen can acquire title by adverse possession to land which had been dedicated to public use as a street. Counsel there made no question as to the proper remedy, and what the court said about ejectment was incidental and unnecessary, and was not the result of the consideration of a point raised and argued by counsel. In Southern P. Co. v. Burr, the decision evidently went upon the theory that the estate which the railroad company had in the strip of land 200 feet wide granted by Congress was something more than a mere right of way. The point is not discussed or referred to in the opinion in either Eureka v. Armstrong, 83 Cal. 623, 624, and Eureka v. Fay, 107 Cal. 166, or Napa v. Howland, 87 Cal. 84. If, in the latter case, the point was made on petition for rehearing, the court may have refused to consider it because not made at the proper time. If a public street or road be unlawfully obstructed there are ample remedies for the wrong, and in such case there is no necessity of trying to use the action of ejectment for purposes, to which, in its very nature, it is not applicable.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

City of INDIANAPOLIS, Appt.,

v.

John N. NAVIN.

(.....Ind.....)

1. A municipal corporation has no power to make a contract with a street railroad company which will prevent the legislature from regulating its rates of fare.
2. In order to exempt a common carrier from legislative control over its rates of fare the exemption must be made by clear and unmistakable language inconsistent with the exercise of such power by the legislature.
3. The right to regulate fares on street railroads does not include the power to require passengers to be carried without reward or for such sum as will amount to confiscation or the taking of property without compensation or due process of law.
4. The exercise by the legislature for forty-five years, with the acquiescence by the people, of the power to regulate corporations by special acts, is influential in determining the construction of a constitutional provision against creating corporations by special acts.
5. The mere regulation of the maximum rate of fare to be collected by street-railroad companies in cities of a population of 100,000 or more according to the census of 1890 is not within the prohibition of Const. art. 11, § 13, against the creation of corporations by special act.

NOTE.—As to legislative power to fix tolls, rates, or prices, see note to Winchester & L. Turnp. Road Co. v. Croxton (Ky.) 83 L. R. A. 177.

6. The enactment of a local or special law on a subject not enumerated in Const. art. 4, § 22, is an expression of the opinion and judgment of the legislature that a general law cannot be made applicable, and this judgment is not subject to be reviewed by the courts.

On rehearing.

7. On questions of the requirements of the state Constitution the supreme court of the state is not at liberty to set aside or discard its own views because of different conclusions by the Federal courts.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Marion County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the penalty for violation of a municipal ordinance against refusing to pay fare on street cars. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James B. Curtis, for appellant:

The ordinance upon which the complaint is based, providing that no one shall ride on a car without paying fare of not in excess of five cents, is a valid one.

The legal fare of the company was, previous to the time of the act complained of, fixed at five cents, and the attempt to regulate the fare by the legislature was unconstitutional.

Const. art. 1, § 28, Rev. Stat. 1894, § 68; Const. art. 4, § 28, Rev. Stat. 1894, § 119; Const. art. 2, § 81, Rev. Stat. 1894, § 212.

The act, although general in form, applies only to the Citizens' Street Railroad Company of the city of Indianapolis, and is, therefore, local and special as applying to cities having a population of 100,000 according to the census of 1890.

The act authorizing the incorporation of street-railroad companies is a general law, and, as required by the Constitution, is "of uniform operation throughout the state." Its uniformity of operation will be destroyed by the act of 1897. Acts relating to corporations must be general, and the Constitution forbids special or local legislation on the subject of either in the form of independent or mandatory acts.

School Dist. No. 56 v. St. Joseph F. & M. Ins. Co. 103 U. S. 707, 26 L. ed. 601; Gray v. Crockett, 80 Kan. 138; Robinson v. Perry, 17 Kan. 248; Darling v. Rodgers, 7 Kan. 592; *San Francisco v. As the subject of legislation of the act of 1897 is a matter which is susceptible of general legislation which will be uniform throughout the state, it must be presumed that the act was 41 L. R. A.

intended to be general in fact. As it is in fact special and local, it is therefore void. As the question as to whether the subject is one which in respect of the matter to which it relates, is susceptible of general legislation, its consideration is, therefore, judicial, and not legislative.

State, Keenan, v. Milwaukee County Supers. 25 Wis. 339; State, Peck, v. Riordan, 24 Wis. 484; State, Walsh, v. Dousman, 28 Wis. 541; Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 118.

The incorporation of the Citizens' Street Railroad Company under the general laws of the state, and the ordinance upon which the prosecution is based, created a contract, and the act of 1897 impaired the obligation of the same, being in contravention of both the Constitution of the United States, and the state of Indiana.

U. S. Const. art. 1, § 10; Ind. Const. art. 1, § 24; Rev. Stat. 1894, §§ 10-69.

An amendatory act must be germane to the subject.

The act as passed grants "privileges and immunities which, upon the same terms, do not equally belong to all citizens," because it applied to street railroad companies in the city of Indianapolis alone, leaving all other companies of the state to be governed exclusively by the general statute.

Gray v. Crockett, 80 Kan. 138; San Francisco v. Spring Valley Waterworks Co. 48 Cal. 493; Leeper v. Texas, 139 U. S. 462, 35 L. ed. 225; Re Converse, 187 U. S. 624, 34 L. ed. 796; Caldwell v. Texas, 187 U. S. 692, 34 L. ed. 816.

Messrs. William A. Ketcham and Frederick E. Matson, for appellee:

The right of the state to provide by amendment of § 9 of the act of 1861 for the regulation of fares to be charged by street-railway companies is reserved by the provision in § 11 of the act, that the act may be amended by the general assembly.

Nor is it in violation of § 22 of art. 4 of the Constitution, for the reason that it is not one of the subjects mentioned in the section, nor does it violate § 28 of article 4, for the reasons, (a) that it is general, and (b) if special, the discretion of the legislature to enact a special law in that case cannot be reviewed by the courts.

Section 13 of art. 11 is, (1) An inhibition upon the legislature to create a corporation by special enactment; (2) a direction that corporations shall only be formed in general laws; and neither this inhibition nor direction extends beyond the limitation contained in the section, and does not prevent an amendment to a general law authorizing the formation of corporations unless (a) it is an attempted evasion of the constitutional provisions, or (b) amounts to the creation of an entirely new corporation.

Where courts actually find language in an act which it was not the intention of the legislature to use, and which, if it remain in the act, will vitiate it, and if eliminated will leave it so that it will accomplish the purpose which the legislature intended it should, the courts should eliminate it.

Monks, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by appellant to collect the penalty provided for the violation of an ordinance, in refusing to pay the fare of five cents prescribed by said ordinance for riding upon a car of the Citizens' Street Railway Company. Appellee filed an answer admitting the passing of an ordinance, and its validity, and that he had ridden as alleged, and had refused to pay the fare of five cents demanded, but justified such refusal under the act approved March 6, 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 201), amending § 9 of the law providing for the incorporation of street railways, and adding a supplemental section thereto, alleging that he had tendered the full fare of three cents provided by said act, but the conductor in charge of the car refused to receive the same; appellee claiming that after the passage of said act the ordinance was of no validity, except so far as it required the payment of three cents in place of five cents as prescribed by said ordinance. To this answer appellant replied, denying the validity of the act in question, for the reason that the legislation was purely local and special, and therefore invalid, because in violation of the constitutional provision on that subject. Appellee's demurrer to this reply was sustained. Appellant refusing to plead further, judgment was rendered in favor of appellee. The only error assigned calls in question the action of the court in sustaining the demurrer to said reply. If said act of March 6, 1897, is unconstitutional, the judgment of the court below must be reversed; but, if constitutional, the judgment must be affirmed.

The act authorizing the incorporation of street railway companies was approved June 4, 1861 (Acts Special Sess. 1861, p. 75); Rev. Stat. 1894, §§ 5450 et seq.; (Rev. Stat. 1881, §§ 4143 et seq.) Section 9 of said act, being § 5458, Rev. Stat. 1894 (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 4151), provides that "the directors of such company shall have power to make by-laws . . . for regulating . . . the fare . . . of said road or roads." In this act the legislature made no provision for the regulation of fares, but left the same to the discretion of the board of directors until the legislature should see fit to make other provisions. The act of 1897 reenacts said section, with a proviso "that in cities in the state having a population of 100,000 or more according to the United States census of 1890, the cash fare shall not exceed three cents for any one trip or passage upon the street railroad or roads," with transfer. It is insisted by appellant that the act of 1897 is unconstitutional because it impairs the obligation of a contract. Counsel for appellant do not point out any contract, the obligation of which is impaired by said act. If it is the contract under which the street railway company took possession of the streets of Indianapolis and constructed its tracks, it is sufficient to say that the city was not authorized to enter into any contract which would prevent the legislature from legislating upon the subject of fares. It is settled law that the legislature has the power to reasonably regulate the rates of fare for the transportation of passengers within the state on street railways. Hockett v. State, 105 Ind. 250, 258, 259, 55 Am. Rep. 201; Central U. Teleph. Co. v. Bradbury, 106 Ind. 1; Central U. Teleph. Co. v. State, Falley, 118 Ind. 194; Rugles v. Illinois, 108 U. Stat. 1889 (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 4153) expressly reserves to the legislature the right to amend or repeal said act at its discretion. The right of the legislature, however, to regulate the fare upon street railroads organized under the act of 1861, does not depend upon the reservation of the right to amend or repeal the act in § 11 of the act. That power would exist even if the right to amend or repeal the act had not been reserved. In order to exempt a common carrier from legislative control over its rates of fare, it must appear that the exemption was made in its charter by clear and unmistakable language inconsistent with the exercise of such power of the legislature. Covington & T. Turnp. Road Co. v. Sandford, 164 U. S. 578, 41 L. ed. 560; Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Smith, 128 U. S. 174, 32 L. ed. 877; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Iowa, 94 U. S. 155, 24 L. ed. 94. Appellant had the power to prescribe the terms upon which, and the time for which, a street-railroad company organized under said act of 1861 should occupy the streets of said city; but such contract, when made, was subject to the right of the legislature to amend or repeal said act at its discretion, and no contract made by the city with a street-railroad company could prevent the exercise of such power by the legislature. It is clear, therefore, that said act of 1897 does not impair the obligation of any valid contract of either the state or appellant. The right to regulate the fares on street railroads, however, does not include the power to require said companies to carry passengers without reward, or for such sum as would amount to confiscation or the taking of property without compensation or due process of law. A statute containing such requirement would be in violation of the provisions of the Constitution of the state, as well as the provisions of the Constitution of the United

It is next insisted by counsel for appellant that said amendment is a local and special act, and is therefore in conflict with § 18 of article 11 of the Constitution, which provides that "corporations, other than banking, shall not be created by special act, but may be formed under general laws." The power to declare a statute unconstitutional is one of the highest entrusted to a judicial tribunal, and is only to be exercised with the greatest care, and only when there is no doubt of the unconstitutionality of the law. If there is any doubt in the mind of the court as to the constitutionality of a law, it must be resolved in favor of its validity. To doubt is to resolve in favor of the constitutionality of the law. Citizens' Street R. Co. v. Haugh, 142 Ind. 254, and cases cited; State, Duensing, v. Roby, 143 Ind. 168, 33 L. R. A. 213. It is not necessary, under the provisions of § 23 of article 4, declaring that all laws shall be general and uniform throughout the state, that legislation concerning cities should operate uniformly on all cities in the state, to make it general. A law which applies to cities having a population of 100,000 or more, when there is but one such city, but is so framed as to operate on all other cities in the state as they acquire the necessary population, is a general law, because it operates upon all cities alike, under the same circumstances. Pennsylvania Co. v. State, 142 Ind. 428. Neither is it necessary that a law concerning the fares to be collected by street-railroad companies shall operate uniformly on all street railroads in the state. It is sufficient if it operates alike upon all such companies under the same circumstances and conditions. Such a law is general within the meaning of the Constitution. Pennsylvania Co. v. State, 142 Ind. 428; and cases cited; Bell v. Maish, 137 Ind. 228; Young v. Tipton County Comrs.

Counsel for appellant seem to understand that this court held in Mode v. Beasley, 143 Ind. 306, that the words "last preceding census" refer only to the last census taken before the passage of the act, and not to any census that may be taken after the act was passed. The rule is otherwise. Such words in a statute refer to the census last taken, whether before or after the passage of an act, unless the contrary appears in the act itself. So that, although a city or town may not have had the required population when the act was passed, yet at any time in the future when any census taken after the passage of the act shows that the necessary population has been acquired, such city is governed by the provisions of the act; that is, when a statute provides that all cities or towns of a named population "according to the United States census," or "according to the last preceding United States census," shall be governed by the provisions of the act, then all cities or towns, as they acquire the requisite population as shown by any census thereafter taken, will be governed by the act, the same as if they had the required population as shown by the last preceding census when the law was enacted. What was said in Mode v. Beasley, 143 Ind. 306, in regard to the city of Indianapolis and the charter by which it was governed, was by way of illustrating what constituted a local or special law, and the difference between such laws and a general law; and any statements concerning the act approved March 6, 1891, (Acts 1891, pp. 187-197), being a local law, or that municipal corporations are not within the prohibition of said § 13, art. 11, Const., were not necessary to the determination of said cause, and were obiter dicta. Section 18 of article 11 of the Constitution means that after it took effect on November 1, 1851, the legislature should have no power or authority to create, originate, or bring into existence by special act a new corporation where none had previously existed. Wiley v. Bluffton, 111 Ind. 152, 155. When the present Constitution of 1851 went into effect on November 1, 1851, there were a great number of corporations in this state which had been created by special acts. The legislature, commencing with its first session of 1852, after the Constitution took effect, again and again, by special acts, enlarged the powers and privileges of such corporations, but in no instance created a corporation by special act, thus recognizing the difference between the creation of a corporation and the regulation of a corporation already in existence. There sat as members of the legislature passing such acts many persons who had been members of the constitutional convention, and who were familiar with the provisions of the Constitution and its intended reforms and changes. No one questioned the right of the legislature to pass such special acts, and for over forty-five years the power 41 L. R. A.

assumed by the legislature has never been challenged, but has been acquiesced in by the state and people. This practical construction is influential. French v. State, Harley, 141 Ind. 618, 623, 29 L. R. A. 118; Hovey v. State, Riley, 119 Ind. 386; Terre Haute v. Evansville & T. H. R. Co. 149 Ind. 174, 87 L. R. A. 189 (last term), and cases cited. It is one thing to create a corporation, bring it into existence, and quite another, as an existing corporation, to regulate its conduct and relations as to other corporations and persons. It has been decided in many cases that, when a corporation has been created, a special act regulating it, without changing the organization of the corporate body, is not within the prohibition. Wilkins v. State, 118 Ind. 514; Central Agri. & M. Asso. v. Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co. 70 Ala. 120; Atty. Gen. v. North America L. Ins. Co. 82 N. Y. 172; Re New York Elev. R. Co. 70 N. In Wilkins v. State, 118 Ind. 514, this court, by Elliott, J., said: "The provision which it is asserted the act violates is this: 'Corporations other than banking shall not be created by special act, but may be formed under general laws.' It cannot with the faintest tinge of justice be affirmed that the simple delegation of authority to appoint three men to perform duties affecting the public is the creation of a new corporation. Changes of infinitely more importance have been held not to create a new corporation. Wallace v. Loomis, 97 U. S. 146, 24 L. ed. 895; Atty. Gen. v. North America L. Ins. Co. 82 N. Y. 172; Southern P. R. Co. v. Orton, 6 Sawy. 157, 32 Fed. Rep. 457. The general rule is thus stated by a late writer: 'A special act of the legislature regulating an existing corporation, or granting to it new privileges, without altering its character or affecting the charter contract, would not be in violation of the letter nor of the spirit of a constitutional prohibition of this description.' 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. 2d ed. § 12. The case of Wiley v. Bluffton, 111 Ind. 152, declares a similar doctrine." It was held in Re New York Elev. R. Co. 70 N. Y. 327, 337, 338; and in Re Church, 92 N. Y. 1, 4, that where a local act merely confirms and regulates franchises previously possessed by a corporation, and does not confer any new franchises, it is not obnoxious to the provisions of the Constitution, which provides that "the legislature shall not pass a private or local act granting any corporation, association, or individual the right to lay down any railroad tracks," or that prohibits the legislature from "granting to any private corporation, association, or individual any exclusive privilege, immunity, or franchise whatever." The North America Life Insurance Company was formed under general laws. In 1866 (2 Sess. Laws 1866, p. 1237, chap. 576) it was enacted by the legislature that the company might make special deposits of its securities in the insurance department, and in the case of Atty. Gen. v. North America L. Ins. Co. 82 N. Y. 172, the validity of § 1 of article 8 was in question, but the act was held constitutional, the court (Earl, J.) saying at page 182: "The plain answer to this contention is, that the act did not create a corporation, but simply regulated a corporation previously in existence." In Southern P. R. Co. v. Orton, 82 Fed. Rep. 457, the legislature of California had passed an act authorizing the Southern Pacific Railroad Company to change the line of its road, accept a congressional grant of land, and construct its road as provided in the act of Congress incorporating the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company; and it was contended that the act was unconstitutional, being in violation of the provisions of the Constitution. But this contention was not sustained by the court: Sawyer, J., saying at page 472: "But it is insisted that this act was passed in violation of the provisions of § 31 of article 4 of the Constitution of California, which reads: 'Corporations may be formed under general laws, but shall not be created by special act, except for municipal purposes.' . . . What does the constitutional prohibition relied on mean? The only prohibitory words are, that corporations of the class in question 'shall not be created by special act.' The word 'create' has a clear, well-settled, and well understood signification. It means 'to bring into being, to cause to exist, to produce, to make,' etc. To my apprehension, it appears to be one thing to create or bring into being a corporation, and quite another to deal with it as an existing entity, a person, after it is created, by regulating its intercourse, relations, and acts as to other existing persons, natural and artificial." . . . In St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Allis, 24 Minn. 75, the appellant had been organized as a mutual insurance company, and afterwards a law was passed making it an exclusively stock company. It was contended that it was in violation of the clause in the Constitution prohibiting the formation of corporations by special act. But the court said: "We think it is not obnoxious to that clause of our Constitution which forbids the formation of corporations by special act. Its effect is only to authorize the company created by the acts of 1853 to exercise its subsisting franchise of carrying on the business of fire and marine insurance in a manner different from that prescribed by the original charter. This is by no means the formation of a new corporation, for both the franchise of corporate existence as well as the general business and purpose of the incorporation, as prescribed by the original charter, remain unchanged." In Cotton v. Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. 22 Minn. 872, the appellee had been created a corporation for a period of fifteen years. In 1867 the charter was amended by striking out the words "for the period of fifteen years," and changing the form of proceedings for condemnation. It was held that neither of the amendments violated the provision of the Constitution prohibiting the formation of corporations under special acts, the court saying at page 874: "In making these amendments the legislature did not, as plaintiff contends, exceed its authority, since neither of the amendments falls within that provision of our Constitution which prohibits the formation of corporations under special acts." In Green v. Knife Falls Boom Corp. 35 Minn. 155, the boom corporation was organized under a general law. Soon after its organization the legislature passed a special act conferring enlarged powers upon the corporation within the St. Louis river, and over the navigation and use thereof, as respects the passage of logs, including the right of eminent domain; the right to charge compensation for boomage, in the nature of tolls, prescribed by the act, upon all logs passing through their works, and to receive and take entire charge and control of all logs and timber which might run, come, or be driven within the same, and to boom, scale, and deliver them as provided in such act. The court held that, while said special act enlarged the business of the corporation, it was not in conflict with the provision of the Constitution prohibiting the formation of corporations by special act. In Central Agri. & M. Assn. v. Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co. 70 Ala. 120, a corporation was intended to be organized under the general law authorizing the formation of private corporations; but certain requirements of the statute had not been complied with, without which the incorporation was not lawful or complete. Subsequently the legislature passed a special act authorizing the corporation to increase its capital stock, and the board of directors to adopt rules and regulations for its government and declaring the existence of the corporation, and approving and ratifying its organization. The court held that said special act was not in conflict with the Alabama Constitution of 1868 (art. 13, § 1), declaring that "corporations may be formed under general laws, but shall not be created by special act except for municipal purposes." The court said: "The statute does not form or create a corporation. Before the time of its enactment the corporation was formed, existed, de facto, having color of right." In Wallace v. Loomis, 67 U. S. 146, 24 L. ed. 895, it was held that the provision in the Constitution of Alabama which declared that corporations may be formed under general laws, but shall not be created by special acts, except for municipal purposes, does not prohibit the legislature from passing a special act changing the name of an existing railroad corporation, and giving it power to purchase the railroad and franchise of another company; the court (Mr. Justice Bradley) saying as to this contention, at p. 154: "We are unable to see anything in this legislation repugnant to the constitutional provision referred to. That provision cannot surely be construed to prohibit the legislature from changing the name of a corporation, or from giving it power to purchase additional property; and this was all that it did in this case. No new corporate powers or franchises were created." This case is in no way overruled or modified by the case of School Dist. No. 56 v. St. Joseph F. & M. Ins. Co. 103 U. S. 707, 26 L. ed. 601. The case last named was governed by the Constitution of Nebraska (article 8, § 1), which provided that "the legislature shall pass no special act conferring corporate powers," and the Supreme Court of the United States followed the construction given to said provision by the supreme court of Nebraska in Clegg v. School Dist. No. 56, 8 Neb. 178. The case of Wallace v. Lomis was decided under the provision of the Constitution of Alabama, which is the same as § 18, art. 11, of the Constitution of this state, and is not the same as the provision in the Nebraska Constitution against conferring corporate powers by special act as construed by the supreme court of that state in Clegg v. School Dist. No. 56, 8 Neb. 178. The difference is recognized in State, Weir, v. Dawson, 16 Ind. 40.

It was, however, correctly said in 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. 2d ed. § 12: "But it is plain that a constitutional provision cannot be avoided and practically annulled by a subterfuge. A special law altering the charter of an existing corporation, and practically changing it, must therefore be deemed in violation of a constitutional prohibition against the creation of corporations by special act. If this were not so, organizations formed under general laws might be treated merely as the rough material out of which corporations might afterwards be fashioned at pleasure, under special acts of the legislature, and the constitutional prohibition would become an empty form." By the act in-question no new corporate power or franchise was created. The directors could regulate the fare after the amendment the same as before, subject to the common-law limitation of reasonableness, except that in cities of a population of 100,000 or more according to the census of 1890, the maximum fare could not exceed 8 cents. This is a mere regulation of an existing corporation, and even if said act is, as contended by appellant, local and special, it is not in conflict with said § 18 of article 11 of the Constitution, which only forbids the creation of corporations by special act, and provides that they may be formed under general law. No new corporation was created or formed by the act of 1897. Said act was a mere regulation fixing the maximum rate of fare to be collected by all street-railroad companies in cities of 100,000 or more population according to the United States census of 1890. Even if said act is local (which we need not and do not decide), it is not special, for the reason that it applies alike to all street railroads that are now or may hereafter be operated in such locality, whether there be one or many. Said act, by amending § 9 of the act of 1861, did not render said last-named act either local or special. Corporations may be organized under the law of 1861 for the construction of street railroads in the cities and towns within the state, the same now as before the amendment of § 9. All the cases cited by counsel for appellant in support of their contention, except San Francisco v. Spring Valley Waterworks, 48 Cal. 493, and Central Trust Co. v. Citizens' Street R. Co. 80 Fed. Rep. 218, are based upon constitutional provisions radically different from the provisions of the Constitution of this state. The cases named are against the great weight of authority, and interpolate into the Constitution words the people have not placed there. Besides the case of San Francisco v. Spring Valley Waterworks, 48

Cal. 493, was decided by a divided court, and is in conflict with the decision of that court in California State Teleg. Co. v. Alta Teleg. Co. 23 Cal. 425.

Much is said by counsel for appellant about the evils of local and special legislation, but we cannot amend or change the Constitution, or read into it what is not there written, merely to avoid either certain or supposed danger. We can only declare that the Constitution means what it says. It follows that the power to regulate existing corporations, either by amendment or independent act, is only limited by § 28 of article 4 of the Constitution, which provides that "in all cases enumerated in the preceding section [23], and in all other cases when a general law can be made applicable, all laws shall be general and uniform throughout the state." Section 23, art. 4 (the section referred to in said § 23), provides that "the general assembly shall not pass local or special laws in any of the following cases" (naming seventeen subjects). Where special laws are not forbidden by the Constitution, they may be enacted. That part of said act fixing the fare at three cents, even if local and special, is not in violation of said § 23, because that subject is not included in the enumeration found in said section. It has been uniformly held by this court, since Gentile v. State, 29 Ind. 409, that whether the act relating to a subject not enumerated in § 23 of article 4 can or cannot be made a general law, as required by § 23 of article 4, is a question to be determined exclusively by the legislature, and not by the courts. Woods v. McCoy, 144 Ind. 316, 322, 33 L. R. A. 97, and cases cited; Mode v. Beasley, 143 Ind. 806; Pennsylvania Co. v. State, 143 Ind. 428; Young v. Tipton County Comrs. 137 Ind. 828; Bell v. Maish, 137 Ind. 226; State, Terre Haute, v. Kolsem, 130 Ind. 484, 14 L. R. A. 566; Hovey v. Foster, 118 Ind. 502; Evansville v. State, Blend, 118 Ind. 426, 4 L. R. A. 98; Wiley v. Bluffton, 111 Ind. 152; Warren v. Evansville, 106 Ind. 106; Johnson v. Wells County Comrs. 107 Ind. 15; Kelly v. State, First Nat. Bank, 92 Ind. 236; Mount v. State, Richey, 90 Ind. 29, 46 Am. Rep. 192; Vickery v. Chase, 50 Ind. 463; State, Pitman, v. Tucker, 46 Ind. 355; Clem v. State, 33 Ind. 418. When, therefore, a local or special law is enacted upon a subject not enumerated in § 23, it is the expressed opinion and judgment of the legislature that a general law cannot be made applicable, and this judgment is not subject to be reviewed by the courts. State, Terre Haute, v. Kolsem, 130 Ind. 484, 14 L. R. A. 566; Mode v. Beasley, 143 Ind. 815; Woods v. McCoy, 144 Ind. 322, 33 L. R. A. 97, and cases cited. The legislature of 1861, by passing the act for the incorporation of street-railroad companies (a general law), could not and did not deprive any subsequent legislature of the right to determine whether a general law fixing the maximum fare on street railroads could or could not be made applicable. If the act in controversy is not a general law, as insisted by appellant, then, under the authorities, the enactment of the same is the expressed opinion and judgment of the legislature that a general law could not be made applicable, and this judgment cannot be reviewed by the courts. It follows that the act approved March 6, 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 201), so far as involved in this case, is constitutional and valid. Said act rendered the ordinance regulating the payment of a fare of five cents invalid and of no effect. Appellee was entitled to be carried for the fare of three cents fixed by the act in controversy, and was not liable for a refusal to pay more than that, for the reason that the ordinance requiring the payment of a fare of five cents was rendered invalid by said act.

Judgment affirmed.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, the following response was handed down July 1, 1898:

Per Curiam:

In this case the principal contention was that the act of March 6, 1897, amending § 9 of the act to provide for the incorporation of street-railroad companies, was inoperative and void, because in contravention of § 18 of article 11 of the Constitution of this state. In arriving at the conclusion reached in the original opinion, we had the benefit of the opinion of the circuit justice, delivered in the case of Central Trust Co. v. Citizens' Street R. Co. reported in 80 Fed. Rep. 218, and also of the very able argument addressed to the justice in that case by the eminent counsel for the complainant. After carefully considering, not only the arguments presented in this case, but also the arguments and opinion referred to, and all the light that we could obtain upon the question, we were constrained to hold that the contention that the legislation in question was in violation of the Constitution of this state was without just foundation, and that the act was in harmony therewith. The question thus presented to us was purely one arising upon the construction of the Constitution of this state. Such a question, when presented to this court, is one that it must decide upon its own judgment as to the requirements of the state Constitution. While in search of assistance and information to enable us to decide such a question correctly, it is eminently proper and necessary that we should examine, weigh, and consider, not only the arguments of counsel, but also the adjudications of courts and the opinions of judges, in other jurisdictions, upon similar or analogous provisions of this or other Constitutions, and give to them such weight as in our opinion they are justly entitled to; but, after that has been done, the responsibility rests upon us, and us alone, and that responsibility cannot be shirked, evaded, or avoided. What the Constitution of the United States, and the laws of Congress or treaties made thereunder, require, is to be finally determined by the Supreme Court of the United States; and its decisions, when made upon such questions, are binding upon the courts in every state, "anything in the Constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. pp. 18-23; Black, Interpretation of Laws, pp. 378-380, 427-429; 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 37-40, and cases cited. The interpretation and construction of the statutes of this state, and whether the same have been enacted in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution of this state, and are or are not in violation of any provision of the Constitution of this state, however, are questions to be finally determined by this court, and by this court alone. The rule is that the construction put upon the Constitution and laws of a state by the court of last resort of such state, and the decision of such court that a law has or has not been passed in conformity with the requirements of the Constitution of such state, or that the same is or is not in violation of the Constitution of such state, are binding upon the Federal courts, and will be adopted by them. Rep. 9; Crowther v. Fidelity Ins. T. & S. D. Co. 42 U. S. App. 701, 85 Fed. Rep. 41, 29 C. C. A. 1; Hill v. Hite, 56 U. S. App. 408, 85 Fed. Rep. 268, 29 C. C. A. 549; Hoge v. Magnes, 56 U. S. App. 500, 85 Fed. Rep. 355, 29 C. C. A. 564.

Since the decision of this case and the filing of the petition for a rehearing, our attention has been called by appellant's brief on said petition to the decision of the United States circuit court in the case of Central Trust Co. v. Citizens' Street R. Co. 82 Fed. Rep. 1, in which the learned judge, who had arrived at a different conclusion before the announcement of our opinion upon the question, adhered to his original conclusion, notwithstanding the opinion announced by this court. We have also examined the opinion, upon appeal, in the circuit court of appeals (Indianapolis v. Central Trust Co. 53 U. S. App. 658, 83 Fed. Rep. 529, 27 C. C. A. 580), and have carefully re-examined the question presented in this regard, not simply as a matter of courtesy to a high court, but constrained thereto by the duty which is cast upon us by the presentation of the petition for a rehearing. We have done this not alone because of the importance of the question, but because of the misfortune to the community, and the parties especially interested in a correct decision of the question, that this court should differ from the circuit court of the United States upon the question. Upon such re examination we are constrained to adhere to our original opinion, that the act in question, even if local and special, is not in contravention of any of the provisions of the Constitution of this state, as contended by the appellant. As the power to amend or repeal the act of 1861 was expressly reserved in § 11 of said act, and as the act of 1897 was a valid amendment of said act of 1861, it is not material whether or not the legislature would have had the power to regulate the fare upon street railroads organized under said act if said § 11 had been omitted therefrom. In arriving at the conclusion that the act of 1897 is not in contravention of any provision of the Constitution of this state, it has not been necessary for us to consider any questions arising under the Constitution of the United States. As to such questions we should be constrained to follow the adjudications of the Supreme Court of the United States, if any, without in any wise considering whether such a construction should or should not commend itself to our independent judgment. But upon the requirements of the Constitution of this state we are not at liberty to set aside or discard our own views because of the fact that they do not meet with the concurrence or approbation of any other court, however high, or any judge, however eminent.

We do not deem it necessary to add anything further to what we have heretofore said upon the questions involved, but, adhering to the opinion originally pronounced in this case, the petition for a rehearing is overruled.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

Mary L. SNYDER et al., Appts.,

v.

FORT MADISON STREET-RAILWAY

(.....Iowa.....)

1. Poles of an electric railway, if properly placed, do not give ground of complaint to an abutting owner, whether he owns the fee of the street or not.
2. Poles for an electric railway must not be so placed as to interfere unnecessarily with the right of abutting owners to use and enjoy their property.
3. A mandatory injunction to compel the removal of an electric-light pole may be granted when the pole is placed in front of the plaintiff's property without necessity therefor, for the purpose of annoying him and to injure and depreciate the value of his property.

(Deemer, Ch. J., and Waterman, J., dissent.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the District Court for Lee County in favor of defendant in a proceeding to enjoin defendant from maintaining a trolley pole in front of plaintiff's premises. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. T. B. Snyder, for appellants:

The fee of the streets is in the owners of the adjacent property.

Dubuque v. Maloney, 9 Iowa, 450, 74 Am. Dec. 358; Cook v. Burlington, 30 Iowa, 95, 6 Am. Rep. 649; Williams v. Carey, 78 Iowa, 194; Cadle v. Muscatine Western R. Co. 44 Iowa, 12.

The relation in this case being the same as that of owners of land adjacent to ordinary highways in the country, the rights of the parties must be measured and judged by the same principle and standard.

In no case could such work be constructed without compensation to the owners of adjacent property.

Freidisy v. Sioux City Rapid Transit Co. 92 Iowa, 191, 26 L. R. A. 246; Elliott, Roads & Streets, pp. 527, 534.

If defendant had the right to erect the pole complained of in the petition in front of plaintiff's residence, at either its whim or its pleasure, then the only limit to the number of poles it might so erect would depend only on the width of plaintiff's lot and the diameter of the poles, and it might with impunity make a stockade of the plaintiff's homestead so far as the city and its streets and the outside world is concerned.

Elliott, Roads & Streets, p. 535.

Even if the defendant had the right to construct its railway on the street named, it could not in so doing disregard the rights and interests of the adjacent property owners by erecting structures, or poles, in front of the same which obstruct the "light and view" and "reduce the value" of their property, "and impair its free use and enjoyment," without having their damages assessed, and paying the same, or becoming liable for their acts under the law.

It is competent for the plaintiffs either to sue for damages, or they may waive their claim for damages and seek only an abatement of the nuisance, the offending obstruction.

Co.* 88 Mich. 299.

Mr. J. D. M. Hamilton, for appellee:

The granting of a franchise to either an electric or horse street railway by any municipality within this state is not such an additional easement or servitude as that appellants in this case can have any remedy to the use or fee of the street which is superior to the public.

McClain's Code, § 623; Damour v. Lyons City, 44 Iowa, 276; Sears v. Marshalltown Street R. Co. 65 Iowa, 742.

The construction of a street-railway line operated by electricity does not impose upon the abutting property owner a servitude by which he can claim damages.

Halsey v. Rapid Transit Street R. Co. 47 N. J. Eq. 880; State v. Laverack, 34 N. J. L. 201; Booth, Street Railways, p. 137; Lorie v. North Chicago City R. Co. 82 Fed. Rep. 270; Croswell, Electricity, §§ 182, 188; Detroit City R. Co. v. Mills, 85 Mich. 634.

It is only when the street is subjected to a new servitude inconsistent with and subversive to its proper use as a street that the abutting landowner can complain, and the erection and maintenance of poles for telephone or other purposes consistent with the use of a street are a proper use of a street.

Julia Bldg. Asso. v. Bell Teleph. Co. 88 Mo. 262, 57 Am. Rep. 398; Howe v. West End Street R. Co. 167 Mass. 46; Reid v. Norfolk City R. Co. 94 Va. 117, 36 L. R. A. 274; Bishop v. North Adams Fire Dist. 167 Mass. 364.

An electric railway operated by means of an overhead wire, supported by poles, and confining its track to the surface of the street, is not an additional servitude on the fee of the street.

Cumberland Teleg. & Teleph. Co. v. United Electric R. Co. 93 Tenn. 492, 27 L. R. A. 236.

This pole is painted black about 3 or 4 feet from the ground, and the balance white, and is the usual electric pole in size and quality; and does not interfere with the free use of appellants' property, nor does it interfere with the free use of the street by the public.

Nuisances always arise from some unlawful act; and where the act itself is lawful in its character, or authorized by a lawful legislative body, it will not be a nuisance.

Wood, Nuisances, §§ 1, 6.

A property owner in order to recover for an obstruction to a highway must show that the 41 L. R. A.

property itself is directly or specially affected, or some right or easement connected therewith.

Rude v. St. Louis, 93 Mo. 415; Gates v. Kansas City Bridge & Terminal R. Co. 111 Mo. 28.

The erection of the pole is a necessity, therefore, an inconvenience, if at all, which people residing in a city must submit to, whether of annoyance, or discomfort, which is brought about by necessity for their existence, and outweighs any ill results, and cannot be classed as a nuisance.

Garrett v. Lake Roland Elev. R. Co. 79 Md. 277, 24 L. R. A. 896.

Whatever is authorized by statute, within the scope of legislative powers, is lawful, and therefore cannot be a nuisance.

Appellants have a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law, relative to taking private property for works of internal improvement.

The plaintiffs have not a remedy by injunction.

Robinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The material facts alleged in the petition, and admitted by the demurrer, are as follows: The plaintiffs have owned and occupied as a homestead, since the 1st day of March, 1892, part of a lot and a dwelling house thereon situated on Broadway street, in the city of Ft. Madison. The lot is bounded on the west by that street, and the house fronts thereon, and on a public park, from which it is separated by the street. The streets, avenues, parks, and lots of the city were laid out and platted under and by virtue of an act of Congress approved July 3, 1836, and an act amendatory thereof approved March 3, 1837, by the government of the United States, from which the title of the plaintiffs was derived. The defendant is a corporation organized under the laws of this state, and is engaged in operating a street railway, which is laid along Broadway street, in front of the premises of the plaintiffs. In the summer of the year 1895, electricity was substituted for the animal power which had been previously used to operate the railway. The trolley system was adopted, and to aid in supporting the trolley wire, a pole 20 or more feet in height was placed in front of the dwelling of the plaintiffs, in that side of the street which was next to their lot. The petition alleges that the pole is an obstruction to the enjoyment by the plaintiffs of their homestead; that it is a nuisance; that there was no necessity for placing the pole where it is; that it could have been so placed that it would not have affected the plaintiffs seriously; that, before it was erected, the plaintiffs protested against its being placed where it now is, and since its erection have offered to pay to the defendant the cost of moving it to a point near the north line of their property, but that the offer was refused; and that they have been greatly damaged by the placing of the pole where it now is, and will sustain much damage in the future if it be not removed. The petition further states that the defendant has not caused the damage which the plaintiffs have suffered, and will suffer by reason of the erection of the pole to be assessed, nor has it compensated them for such damage. The plaintiffs ask for a mandatory injunction requiring the defendant to remove the pole from their property, and particularly from the front of their dwelling house; and they ask, further, that the defendant be perpetually enjoined from erecting or maintaining the pole in front of their dwelling, and for general equitable relief. The demurrer is based upon the ground that the petition does not state facts which entitle the plaintiffs to the relief they ask.

1. The acts of Congress under which the town of Ft. Madison was platted are found on pages 962-964 of the Revision of 1860. Those acts were considered in the case of Dubuque v. Maloney, 9 Iowa, 450, 74 Am. Dec. 358, where it was held that the fee of the streets of a city platted and dedicated by virtue of those acts was, subject to the public easement, vested in the owners of the adjoining lots, and that the city had no right to use the streets for any purpose different from that for which they were originally designed. The same principle was approved in Cook v. Burlington, 30 Iowa, 94, 6 Am. Rep. 649. In Williams v. Carey, 73 Iowa, 196, a distinction between cases when the fee to streets is in the abutting property owners and when it is in the city was noticed. It follows that the defendant in this case could not rightfully acquire from the city nor exercise rights in the street which were not authorized by the dedication of the streets, but are inconsistent with the easement granted to the public. Section 464 of the Code of 1878 gave to cities and towns power to authorize or forbid the location and laying down of tracks for street railways on all streets, alleys, and public places. See also Damour v. Lyons City, 44 Iowa, 276. It now appears to be settled that an ordinary surface street railway operated by animal power is not a new or additional burden upon the public easement in a street, but one which the right of the public to use the street authorizes for the purpose of facilitating public travel. Citizens' Coach Co. v. Camden Horse R. Co. 83 N. J. Eq. 267, 36 Am. Rep. 542; Atty. Gen. v. Metropolitan R. Co. 125 Mass. 515, 28 Am. Rep. 264; Hobart v. Milwaukee City R. Co. 27 Wis. 194, 9 Am. Rep. 461; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Rosedale Street R. Co. 64 Tex. 80, 53 Am. Rep. 739; Elliott v. Fair Haven & W. R. Co. 82 Conn. 579; Carson v. Central R. Co. 35 Cal. 325; Merrick v. Intramontaine R. Co. 118 N. West Chicago Street R. Co.* 156 Ill. 255, 29 L. R. A. 485; Jaynes v. Omaha Street R. Co. (Neb.) 39 L. R. A. 751; Booth, Street Railways, § 83.

Streets are designed for public uses, among which are the construction and operation of street railways; and if they are so constructed and operated as not to affect prejudicially the rights of the public, nor to interfere with the proper use of the street by others, no burden not contemplated by the dedication of the street is placed upon it. In such cases the kind of power used in operating the railway is wholly immaterial. It is said, however, that the erection of trolley poles, and the placing of wires upon them, is a permanent obstruction of the street for the benefit of the street railway, which necessarily interferes with the proper use of the street by others. That poles and wires might be so erected and arranged as to have that effect is undoubtedly true, but the mere fact that the spaces they occupy cannot be used for other purposes does not show an improper use of the street. They are designed to aid in the rapid, convenient, and economical transportation of persons from place to place, and thus to facilitate the use of the street by the public for whom it was intended. It is true that some authorities hold that the erection and maintenance of poles in the streets do cast a burden upon the street which it was not intended to bear. Jaynes v. Omaha Street R. Co. (Neb.) 39 L. R. A. 751, and cases therein cited. But the greater weight of authority appears to sustain the conclusion which we reach. Taggart v. Newport Street R. Co. 16 R. I. 669, 7 L. R. A. 205; Halsey v. Rapid Transit Street R. Co. 47 N. J. Eq. 380; Lockhart v. Craig Street R. Co. 189 Pa. 419; Louisville Bagging Mfg. Co. v. Central Pass. R. Co. 95 Ky. 50; Detroit City R. Co. v. Mills, 85 Mich. 634; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. West Chicago Street R. Co. 156 Ill. 255, 29 L. R. A. 485; Cumberland Teleg. & Teleph. Co. v. United Electric R. Co. 93 Tenn. 492, 27 L. R. A. 236; Croswell, Electricity, §§ 108, 109, 182, 183; Booth, Street Railways, § 83. It follows from what we have said that an abutting lotowner has no sufficient ground to complain of the erection and maintenance of street railway poles in the street in front of his premises if they are properly placed, and this is true whether he owns the fee of the street or not.

Our attention is called to § 1824 of the Code of 1878, as amended by chap. 104 of the Acts of the 19th General Assembly, which relates to the erection of telegraph and telephone poles along the highways of the state, and to § 1825 of the Code of 1878, which provides for the payment of damages caused by setting poles in private grounds, but we do not find anything in these sections to conflict with what we have said. It has been held in some cases that the erection of telegraph and telephone poles in streets imposes a new burden, because they do not in any manner aid in the use of the street by the public; but, as no question of that character is involved here, we refrain from expressing any opinion in regard to it.

2. It is the duty of a street-railway company to so construct and operate its railway as not to interfere unnecessarily with the right of abutting property owners to use and enjoy their property. Cudde v. Muscatine R. Co. 44 Iowa, 14; Croswell, Electricity, 85. A private individual may maintain an action for relief from injury to himself or his property if the injury be separate and distinct from that which affects the general public. Churchill v. Burlington Water Co. 94 Iowa, 89. The petition in this case alleges, and the demurrer admits, that the plaintiffs have sustained serious injury from the placing and maintaining of the pole in its present location, and that the injury will continue if the pole be not removed. To show this more clearly, we set out somewhat more fully than we have already done the substance of averments contained in the petition. In addition to the platting of the town, the location of the property in question, and the adoption by the defendant of the trolley system, the petition alleges that the plaintiffs have, since the year 1892, owned and occupied as a homestead the premises described; that the defendant erected in that part of the street appurtenant to their property, and in front of their dwelling, a pole 20 or more feet in height, used in supporting its trolley wire, and similar poles at intervals on each side of the street; that the poles so erected were connected by cross wires to which the trolley wire was attached; that it was not necessary to place a pole in front of the plaintiffs' dwelling house, nor on that part of the street appurtenant to their premises; that the pole on the opposite side of the street to which the one in question is attached is from 4 to 6 feet further north than is the one in question, and, had the latter been placed 3 feet further north than is the one to which it is attached, it would still have been in front of the plaintiff's lot, but not at a place where it would have damaged the plaintiff's premises to such an extent as to be complained of; that the pole in question is a nuisance and an obstruction to the enjoyment by the plaintiffs of their premises and homestead; that it was placed where it is, not because of any necessity, but to annoy the plaintiffs, and to injure and depreciate the value of their property, and that it had had that effect; that, before it was placed where it is, the plaintiffs protested against its erection there, and, after its erection, offered to pay the defendant the cost of moving it to a point near the north line of their property, where they would not object to it, but that the defendant declined to accept the offer; that the plaintiffs have been greatly damaged by the placing of the pole where it now is, and will continue to suffer such damage until it is removed; and that they have not been in any manner compensated for such damage. Some of the averments of the petition are immaterial, but we are required to determine whether a cause of action is stated in the petition. If it is, the immaterial matter and the statement of legal conclusions may be disregarded. Section 2646 of the Code of 1878 required the petition in a civil action to contain "a statement of the facts constituting the plaintiff's cause of action," and the petition was demurrable if the facts stated in the petition did not entitle the plaintiff to the relief demanded. § 2648. It is well settled that, under these provisions, ultimate facts only, and not evidence of them, are to be stated in the petition. De Lay v. Carney Bros. 100 Iowa, 687; Robinson v. Berkey, 100 Iowa, 136. In Luss v. Des Moines, 22 Iowa, 590, it was said of a statement in the petition that the defendant "fixed and established a grade for Second street, as it was lawfully authorized to do," that it was an averment of an ultimate fact; and that it was not necessary for the petition to show how the grade was established. In Brown v. Kingsley, 88 Iowa, 220 (an action for seduction), it was said that the ultimate fact was the fact of seduction, and that it was not necessary to state in the petition the "acts made use of to deceive and mislead," nor certain other facts, as they were merely evidence of the ultimate fact. In Grinde v. M. & St. P. R. Co. 42 Iowa, 376, a petition which alleged that the "defendant by its agents and servants did run and manage one of their engines in such a grossly negligent and careless manner that the same ran against and over" a cow of the plaintiff which had casually strayed upon the track of the defendant, was held to be sufficiently specific, and it was said: "It is not allowable to plead mere abstract conclusions of law, having no element of fact; they form no part of the allegations constituting a cause of action; but if they contain the elements also of a fact, construing the language in its ordinary meaning, then force and effect must be given to them as allegations of fact;" and that to plead more than the ultimate fact would be to plead the evidence, which is not allowable. See also Byington v. Robertson, 17 Iowa, 562; O'Connor v. Illinois C. R. Co. 88 Iowa, 105; Winter v. Central Iowa R. Co. 80 Iowa, 443. Section 2655 of the Code of 1878 provided that an answer might contain "a statement of any new matter constituting a defense." In Kendig v. Marble, 55 Iowa, 386, which arose under that provision, the foreclosure of a mortgage on account of a judgment rendered by confession was asked. The answer alleged "that the confession of judgment was adopted as a fraudulent device, and is such to aid the plaintiff in evading the statute against usury, plaintiff well knowing that the contracts were usurious. That this defendant believed, at the time of the execution of the same, it was only for the amount due, without usury, as before stated." It was held by this court that a sufficient defense was pleaded, and that if a conclusion of law, and not of fact, was set out, the answer should have been assailed by a motion for a more specific statement; that, "if it was sufficiently explicit to enable plaintiff to demur to it, there can be no doubt that it was fully understood and disclosed the defense intended to be made. This was all that could have been required upon the consideration of the demurrer."

The petition in this case states that the pole in question was placed in front of the property of the plaintiffs without necessity therefor, to annoy them, and to injure and depreciate the value of their property; that it is an obstruction to the enjoyment by them of their property; that it has depreciated the value of that property, and caused great damage to the plaintiffs, and will continue to cause such depreciation and damage if not removed; and that they have not been compensated for the damages received. Applying the rule of the statutes and authorities cited, we conclude that the statements of the petition are of ultimate facts, which show a cause of action, although it may be true that a motion for a more specific statement as to the manner and extent of the obstruction and its effect might have been required had it been asked. But the ultimate fact was the unnecessary obstruction of the use and enjoyment of the plaintiffs' property to their substantial damage; and that the petition showed. We do not understand the appellee to question this if it be true that the pole in question may have been so placed and maintained as to give to the plaintiffs a right of action. If the plaintiffs can prove the averments of their petition, they might recover damages for the injuries sustained; but they are not compelled to resort to that remedy. If the location of the pole is not only injurious, but unnecessary, they may have recourse to this action for the removal of the pole. Richards v.

Holt, 61 Iowa, 533; Gribben v. Hansen, 69 Iowa, 255; Harbach v. Des Moines & K. C. R. Co. 80 Iowa, 593, 11 L. R. A. 113.

We must not be understood as holding that a property owner may dictate the location of poles in front of his premises, nor that he may recover damages, however trivial, which may be caused by their location. The railway company has the right to so place its poles as to secure the best results for its railway, provided that it so places them as not to cause any unnecessary injury. The injurious consequences which it must guard against are those of a substantial character. The placing of poles in front of property is seldom desired by the property owner, and may in some slight degree interfere with the use of his property, as by obstructing the view from it; but for such injury alone he would rarely, if ever, be entitled to relief. The placing of a pole in a walk or roadway, however, or in front of and near to an important window, if the pole could as well be placed elsewhere, might afford ground for relief. But we cannot undertake to lay down general rules which would govern all cases. Each, of necessity, must be decided according to its own facts. It follows from what we have said that the district court erred in sustaining the demurrer, and its judgment is reversed.

Deemer, Ch. J., dissenting:

I do not think the petition states a cause of action, and I dissent from the second paragraph of the opinion. I especially dissent from the doctrine that a pole placed in front of a window is a nuisance. The doctrine of ancient lights does not obtain in this state. I am authorized to say that Waterman, J., joins in this dissent.

14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 532.

Johnston, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action brought by Rosa Werner to obtain a divorce from Emil Werner upon the grounds of habitual drunkenness, extreme cruelty, and gross neglect of duty. She also set forth at length a description of the property, in some of which she alleged she owned an interest, and the remainder stood in the name of the defendant, but was in fact the joint accumulation of the parties while they lived together as husband and wife. In his answer, Emil Werner alleged that he was induced to enter into the marriage relation with Rosa through her misrepresentation and fraud; that she was at the time the wife of John G. Cole, who was then living, and from whom she had not obtained a divorce; and that he had no knowledge of this fact until the present proceeding was begun. He also charged her with extreme cruelty, and asked that the marriage contract be declared to be null and void. In her reply, Rosa Werner asks that, if the marriage should be held to be null and void, and no divorce granted to the plaintiff from the defendant, there be an equitable and just division of the property, which she alleges was the result of the joint earnings and labors of the plaintiff and the defendant during the time they lived together as husband and wife. At the trial considerable testimony was offered as to the misconduct of Emil Werner, but the court found it unnecessary to determine whether the grounds alleged by the plaintiff below had been sustained. It appeared from the testimony that Rosa Werner had a husband living at the time she was married to Emil Werner, and for that reason the marriage was declared to be null and void, and a division of the property was made.

Emil Werner complains of the ruling of the court awarding Rosa a share of the property, contending, first, that she was never, in fact, his wife, and that alimony is never awarded to a woman who is not a wife. It is true, as the plaintiff in error contends, that the marriage between the parties was absolutely void from the beginning. Although living together as husband and wife, they were not, in fact, married, and hence no allowance could be made as alimony. The rule is that permanent alimony can only be allowed where the relation of husband and wife has existed; but this rule does not preclude an equitable division of the property where there is a judicial separation of the parties on account of the invalidity of the marriage contract. Fuller v. Fuller, 33 Kan. 582. Strictly speaking, this action as it was tried was not a divorce proceeding, but it was rather one to annul a void marriage. Although instituted, under the statutes to obtain a divorce, the pleadings were so drawn, and the issues so shaped, that it was within the power of the court to grant relief independently of the statutes relating to divorce, and it rendered a decree of nullity, rather than a decree of divorce. The plaintiff below set forth at length the description and nature of the property which had been acquired by the parties, the manner in which it had been acquired, and her interest in the same, and in the prayer of her reply she asked to be allowed a just and equitable division of the same in case the marriage was held to be null and void. The court, in its decree, did not treat the award as alimony, but rather adjudged her a share of the property jointly accumulated by the parties during the time they lived together as husband and wife. Fuller v. Fuller, 33 Kan. 582, greatly relied on by the plaintiff in error, holds, it is true, that in an action of this character the defendant is not entitled to recover permanent alimony; but at the same time it is expressly stated: "That in all judicial separations of persons who have lived together as husband and wife, a fair and equitable division of their property should be had; and the court in making such division should inquire into the amount that each party originally owned, the amount each party received while they were living together, and the amount of their joint accumulations." Even in cases where the marriage is valid, and a divorce is refused for any cause, the court may adjudge an equitable division and disposition of the property of the parties. Code Civ. Proc.

§ 643. But, independently of the statute of divorce, we think the court had authority to decree, not only an annulment of the marriage, but also the division of the property which had been jointly accumulated by the parties. It was an equitable proceeding, and within its equity power the district court had full jurisdiction to give adequate relief to the parties. The division that was made was eminently equitable and just. While Emil Werner had considerable property at the time of the marriage, and Rosa had none, the testimony tends to show that the property which they have now is largely the result of their joint labor and earnings. She was active, industrious, and faithful, and, besides household work, she was an efficient aid in conducting and carrying on the different branches of business in which he was engaged. In the early days she performed labor of the hardest and most menial character, and throughout the twenty-two years in which they lived together as husband and wife she was diligent, tireless, and economical in building up a business and in gathering up the property which they held at the time of the trial. She appears to have been a valuable assistant in managing the business and in caring for the property in which their earnings were invested. A portion of the time the title to the property was in her name, but at the time of the separation he held the legal title to most of it. The fact, however, that the legal title stood in the name of one or of the other of the parties does not prevent a just distribution of the property jointly contributed, and in fact jointly owned by both. If a separation had occurred while the property stood in her name, it would hardly be contended that he would be deprived of any share or interest in the same. No more should she be deprived of a fair share of the fruits of her skill, industry, and toil while she occupied a partnership relation with him. The court has the same power to make equitable division of the property so accumulated as it would have in case of the dissolution of a business partnership. It is claimed that she has no right to appeal to the equitable consideration of the court, because the marriage contract was entered into through deception and fraud on her part, while his conduct was faultless in this respect. The testimony hardly sustains the contention. She states that she frankly told Werner of her former marriage to Cole, and she further told him that Cole claimed at the time he abandoned her that he had a living wife when he married Rosa. Emil Werner advised her that, as Cole had another living wife, her marriage with Cole was void, and that she was at liberty to marry again. He produced a law book, and read from the same to convince her that the former marriage was no obstacle to a legal marriage with him. There is considerable testimony tending to show that there was no deception or fraud, and that her misconception of the law was largely due to the advice and influence of the plaintiff in error. No reason is seen why she was not entitled to ask and obtain a share of the joint accumulations, and, in our view, the share which was awarded her was no more than she was justly entitled to.

The judgment of the court will therefore be affirmed.

which was subject to plaintiff's mortgage for taxes, for the payment of which the mortgagor was alleged to have had sufficient personal property which defendant failed to subject to the payment of the tax. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. M. J. Cochran for appellant.

Mr. Thomas E. Phister for appellee.

Guffy, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is substantially alleged in the petition in this action that the appellant is the owner of 89 acres of land in Mason county, conveyed to her by deed January 5, 1893, by Allie B. McAtee, and that, at the time of the conveyance, appellant held a mortgage upon the same to secure an indebtedness due her from said McAtee in the sum of $4,000, with interest from June 25, 1889, until paid, which note and mortgage were executed on June 25, 1889, and were an outstanding lien on said land during the years 1889, 1890, 1891, and 1892, and said land was worth in value less than the mortgage lien during these years, and at the time of the conveyance to her. It is further alleged, in substance, that during each of said years the said McAtee owned and had in his possession, on said land, and in this (Mason) county, personal property which exceeded greatly in value the amount of taxes due from him to the state of Kentucky and county of Mason, and such fact was known to the defendant, Samuel P. Perrine, who was deputy sheriff of Mason county during said years of 1889, 1890, 1891, and 1892, for John W. Alexander, sheriff of Mason county, and afterwards J. C. Jefferson, sheriff of said county, and ever since has been, and still is, said deputy, and who had in his hands for collection the taxes due from said McAtee for each of said years; that the defendant, Perrine, notwithstanding he knew of this fact, suffered and permitted said McAtee to sell and dispose of said personal property, and collect and receive the proceeds therefor, without making any attempt to collect his said taxes out of same, and has caused the property conveyed to her by McAtee in 1893, and which she now owns, to be advertised for sale at the court house door on the 11th day of March, 1895, for the taxes due from the said McAtee for said years 1889, 1890, 1891, and 1892, amounting to the sum of $268.30, all of which plaintiff had no notice of before said advertisement, and, unless enjoined and restrained from so doing, he will sell in pursuance to said advertisement; that said defendant and his principal had accounted to the state and county for the taxes due from said McAtee for said years at the time they were required to settle, and the same are now due the defendant, and not the commonwealth of Kentucky, or the county of Mason; that said threatened sale for taxes for said years of 1889, 1890, 1891, and 1892, will produce great and irreparable damage to plaintiff. An injunction was prayed for, and obtained, restraining the defendant from selling the land for the taxes for the years 1889, 1890, 1891, and 1892. The defendant entered a general demurrer to the petition, which was sustained by the court; and, plaintiff failing to plead further, her petition was dismissed, and the injunction dissolved, and judgment rendered against her for costs, to which plaintiff excepted, and prayed an appeal to this court, which was granted.

It appears from the petition that the appellant had a mortgage lien upon the land in question, for an amount in excess of its value, at and before the time the taxes enjoined were assessed or became a charge against McAtee, and that she purchased the land in 1893, taking therefor an absolute deed in part discharge of her mortgage debt. It is the contention of the appellee that the commonwealth had a lien upon the land in contest for the taxes in question, and that, the sheriff having accounted for the same, he is subrogated to all the rights of the commonwealth. Section 4021, Ky. Stat. which seems to be substantially the same as the provisions in the General Statutes, provides that the commonwealth and each county shall have a lien on the property assessed for the taxes due them, respectively, which shall not be defeated by gift, devise, sale, alienation, or any other means whatever, unless the gift, sale, devise, or alienation shall have been made more than five years before the institution of proceedings to enforce the lien, and nothing shall be exempt from levy and sale for taxes and costs incident to the sale. It will be seen that the appellant acquired her lien upon the land in contest in June, 1889, before any lien had attached for the taxes in contest. One of the questions to be determined is whether or not the defendant can voluntarily pay McAtee's taxes for the years named, and knowingly permit McAtee to dispose of his personal property, sufficient to pay the taxes due from him, and yet be entitled to sell the land in question in satisfaction of the entire amount of taxes due from McAtee for the years aforesaid. It is evidently a fact, as the taxes in this case amounted to $268.30, that McAtee was the owner of a large amount of property in addition to the land in controversy. It will thus be seen that, if appellee's contention is sustained, the result will be that appellant must pay a large sum of taxes justly due from McAtee upon property other than the land in controversy. It is clear that it was McAtee's duty to pay the taxes in question. It is contended by the appellee that, the sheriff having accounted to the state and the county for the taxes due from McAtee, he thereby became subrogated to all the rights that the state and county ever had in respect to the collection of the taxes. The principle of subrogation rests mainly upon the fact that a party pays the debt of another, which he was legally bound to pay. But if we concede that the sheriff, on account of his failure to collect the taxes due from McAtee, became, as a matter of law, bound to pay the same to the state, and thereby acquired any right of subrogation, that right must be subject to prior equities, and to all rules of equity. It is said in 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 187: "Subrogation is the substitution of another person in the place of a creditor or claimant, to whose rights he succeeds in relation to the debt or claim asserted, which has been paid by him not voluntarily." It is further said in the same work (p. 191). "Subrogation is an equitable, and not a legal, right. . . . Being the creature of equity, it will not be enforced where it will work an injustice to the rights of those having equal equities." On page 192 of the same work it is said: "Subrogation will not be permitted in favor of one who is ultimately or really liable for the debt discharged; nor in favor of one who would thereby be permitted to derive an advantage from, or to establish his claim through, his own wrong or negligence, or inequitable or illegal conduct."

In the case at bar it is shown by the petition, which must in this case be taken as true, that McAtee had an abundance of personal property during all the years of 1890, 1891, and 1892, sufficient to pay his taxes, situated in Mason county, Kentucky, which was known to the appellee, and that he (appellee) permitted said property to be sold and disposed of without any effort to collect the taxes, which were then in his hands for collection. His delay was a matter of choice. It may have been done, as suggested in appellee's brief, for the accommodation of McAtee. It was certainly his duty to levy upon and sell the personal property before levying upon any real estate; and to allow him, for the accommodation of the taxpayer, or for any other purpose, to sit idly by, and permit this personal property to be disposed of, and then attempt to collect the taxes by a sale of appellant's land, seems to us to be in violation, not only of the principle above quoted, but contrary to natural justice, and inconsistent with any rule of equity known to the law. If the appellee be permitted to enforce the collection of these taxes by a sale of the land in contest, he simply makes appellant pay the taxes of McAtee; and that, too, without any reason or excuse, unless his desire to accommodate McAtee be considered an excuse. He delayed to collect the taxes, manifestly, for his own accommodation, or that of McAtee; and he should not now be allowed to collect the same off of an innocent party, and a party who never was under any obligation to pay the taxes, and, so far as this record shows, had no notice, until the filing of this suit, of McAtee's failure to pay. It has been repeatedly decided by this court that it was the duty of the sheriff to sell the personal property of a delinquent taxpayer, if it be found in the county, before he levied upon or sold the land, and that a sale of land, when he could have made the taxes by a sale of personal property, was void, or at least passed no title to the purchaser. It may be true that, as between the sheriff and the taxpayer, if the sheriff had delayed the collection of the taxes at the instance of the taxpayer, or through negligence, and the taxpayer had disposed of his personal property, the sheriff might within the five years levy upon and sell real estate, because it was the duty all the time of the taxpayer to pay the taxes, and the indulgence would be presumed to have been for his benefit, or at his instance; and he would not be heard to complain, or avail himself of the delay, to the detriment of the sheriff. But no such state of affairs exists in this case. The delay was evidently for the benefit of McAtee or the sheriff, or both. The negligence was that of the appellee, and manifestly the appellant should not be made to suffer on account of the negligence of the sheriff, or for the benefit of McAtee. We do not think that appellant was under any obligation to pay McAtee's taxes, nor do we think that any presumption should be indulged in that she knew they were unpaid; and, if she was aware of that fact, we are unable to see in what manner she could have protected herself against the liability now sought to be imposed upon her, any further than the amount of taxes due upon the land in question. We have been referred to § 4032 of the Kentucky Statutes as authorizing appellant to have taken such action as would have protected her from the claim of appellee herein. Said section reads as follows: "Any person having a lien on property upon which the owner has failed to pay the taxes, and has become delinquent, such lienholder may pay the taxes, interest, and penalties thereon, and shall be subrogated to the lien of the commonwealth, county, or district therefor, and the sum so paid shall bear legal interest from the date of payment, and shall be collectible in the same manner as the original claim of the lienholder." The most that appellant was authorized to do was to pay the amount of taxes due upon the valuation of the land, and thus obtain an additional lien upon the land, which would have been utterly worthless in this case. And, if appellee's contention is to be sustained, he could have still sold this same tract of land for the residue of taxes due from McAtee. There is no statute or law, that we are aware of, by virtue of which appellant could have paid McAtee's taxes, and levied and sold his personal property therefor. It seems clear to us that the appellee had no right to sell the land in question for the taxes claimed. It is manifest that appellant had a right to maintain this action, and obtain an injunction, for the reason that a sale of the land in question would have cast a cloud upon her title, which could only have been removed by an equitable proceeding; hence she had no adequate remedy at law. For the reasons given, the judgment appealed from is reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to overrule the demurrer, and for proceedings consistent herewith.

Billy ROSE, by Next Friend, Appt.,
v.

J. A. ROSE.

(.....Ky.....)

The right of a husband to the use of his wife's real estate with power to rent it for not more than three years at a time and receive the rent, under Gen. Stat. p. 720, chap. 52, art. 2, § 1, which was in force when the parties were married and the property was acquired, is a vested right of which the legislature cannot deprive him.

(DuRelle, Hazelrigg, and Burnam, JJ., dissent.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Logan County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate which belonged to plaintiff but which was in possession of her husband from whom she had separated. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Mr. Wilbur F. Browder for appellant.

Mr. James H. Bowden, for appellee:

In order to sue her husband for the possession of land, the wife ought to be required to show some marital dereliction—some act of wrong or improvidence—something. That would protect her in all her property rights, and yet fully preserve the peace of domestic life.

The husband's right to the use and possession of the wife's land, which he has in possession, is not inchoate, but present and vested, and the legislature cannot take it away.

As to property a wife may get, the husband's right before it is gotten is a mere possibility or expectancy. It may be cut off by a law that he shall not have it. If she has a mere right, and his right depends on a reduction to possession, it is not a title vested, but a right inchoate, and he may be precluded by law.

Paynter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It appears from the petition, to which the court sustained a demurrer, that the appellant is the wife of appellee J. A. Rose; that they were married in the year 1890, that a separation has taken place, which is permanent; that they will never live together as husband and wife. It also appears from the petition that after the marriage took place, and before the passage of the act of 1894 (Ky. Stat. §§ 2127, 2128), defining the rights of married women, the appellant by gift acquired title to a tract of land containing 308 acres, and by purchase another tract of 120 acres. It is alleged that the husband is in possession of this land, and refuses to surrender it to the appellant. She therefore prays that the possession of it be adjudged to her. The question involved is, whether, under the act referred to, the rights of the husband—as they existed at the time of its passage—to the use of the land have been destroyed; that is to say, Did the legislature intend to deprive husbands of their interest in the lands of their wives, or, if it so intended, did it have the power to do so?

At common law the husband became the owner of the personal property of the wife. He likewise became seised in an estate for their joint lives of her freehold lands and chattels real. He could sell the personal property thus acquired, and vest the vendee with a title thereto. He could sell the interest which he acquired in the real estate, and vest the purchaser with the title to the interest which became vested in him by operation of law. 2 Dembitz, Land Titles, p. 788; 2 Kent, Com. p. 180; 2 Bl. Com. p. 126. The court held in M'Clain v. Gregg, 2 A. K. Marsh. 454, that marriage gives the husband an estate in the lands of his wife, which he could sell, and that his vendee could maintain ejectment. That opinion was before an act of the legislature reducing the interest of the husband in the wife's land. A divorce restores to the wife the exclusive right to her land. Hays v. Sanderson, 7 Bush, 489. As civilization advanced, and as the men who made the laws began to recognize that a wife should not be compelled to surrender practically all of her estate to the husband, but should be given a reasonable protection in the enjoyment of her property, the legislature of Kentucky passed an act which supplanted the common law with reference to the rights of a husband in his wife's real estate. It is § 1, art. 2, chap. 52, p. 720, Gen. Stat., and reads as follows: "Marriage shall give to the husband during the life of the wife, no estate or interest in her real estate, including chattels real, owned at the time, or acquired by her after marriage, except the use thereof, with power to rent the real estate for not more than three years at a time, and receive the rent. If, however, the wife die during the term for which her land is rented, the rent shall go to the husband, if alive, subject to her debts, contracted as stated in the next section. But if during such term the husband die, the rent accruing thereafter shall go to the wife or her representatives, subject to her debts as aforesaid." This section was in force at the time the parties to this action were married, and at the time the wife acquired the land. It gives the husband the use of the wife's land, with power to rent it for not more than three years at a time, and receive the rent. It does not allow this rent to be subjected to the payment of his debts, because the legislature thought it wise to place it in the power of the husband to appropriate the rents for the benefit of his wife and children, if he chose to do so. In obedience to the requirements of the statute, this court has repeatedly held that the rents of the wife's land could not be subjected to the payment of the husband's debts. If the husband cultivates the land himself, then the products of the land have been adjudged to belong to him. The court, in Moreland v. Myall, 14 Bush, 474, held that corn standing on the wife's land (her general estate) is subject to levy and sale under execution against the husband. While the rent of the wife's land is not liable for the husband's debts, yet, as between the husband and wife, the rent belongs to him. Barnes v. Burbridge, 7 Ky. L. Rep. 445. While, under the act in force when the parties married and when the land was acquired, the husband's interest in the wife's land was not so great as at common law, still it is a vested right; and the legislature could not deprive him of the use of his wife's land, and the right to rent it for three years at a time. The act of 1894 declares that marriage shall give to the husband no interest in the wife's property, and that she shall hold it and own it for her separate and exclusive use, free from the debts and control of her husband. The act is not retrospective in its operation. It cannot take from a husband the rights which existed under the law in force at the time of its passage. It is said by Mr. Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations (5th ed. p. 442): "At the common law the husband immediately on the marriage succeeded to certain rights in the real and personal estate which the wife then possessed. These rights became vested rights at once, and any subsequent alteration in the law could not take them away." It is held in Junction R. Co. v. Harris, 9 Ind. 184, 68 Am. Dec. 618, that a husband's estate in the wife's land is not impaired by a statute declaring it separate property. Under the law of New York, a husband had a certain interest in his wife's property. Subsequently the legislature passed an act which, in effect, declared that such property should no longer belong to the husband, but should become the property of the wife, as though she were a single female. The court held that the husband's rights could not be impaired by the act of the legislature. Westcott

v. Gregg, 12 N. Y. 202, 62 Am. Dec. 160. It was held in Rose v. Sanderson, 58 Ill. 247, that a legislative enactment cannot take from the husband a vested life estate in the wife's land and give it to her. Bishop on the Law of Married Women (vol. 2, § 40), after stating what are the rights of the husband at common law in the wife's real estate, says: "This is a vested estate in him; and within the doctrines discussed under our first subtitle, it is not competent for legislation without his consent to take it from him and give it back to the wife." The views we have expressed are supported by Jackson v. Jackson, 144 Ill. 374; Clark v. Clark, 20 Ohio, 185; Wyatt v. Smith, 25 W. Va. 813. Many authorities could be cited in support of these views. A wife who was married before the act of 1894 took effect is entitled to all the rights in property acquired after the act took effect which it purports to give her. Although the marriage took place before the act took effect, the husband has no right to complain that the legislature has given his wife the control of such property as she acquired after the act took effect. The act did not impair any vested right of the husband in property so acquired. His right was expectant, not vested. Mr. Cooley in his work on Constitutional Limitations (p. 448), in speaking in regard to the husband's expectant interest in the after-acquired property of the wife, said: "It is subject to any changes in the law made before his right becomes vested by the acquisition." In Allen v. Hanks, 136 U. S. 800, 34 L. ed. 414, it was held competent for a state, in its fundamental law or by statute, to provide that all property thereafter acquired by or coming to a married woman shall constitute her separate estate, not subject to the control or liable for the debts of the husband. Such requirements do not take away or impair any vested rights of the husband. The same doctrine was announced in Jackson v. Jackson. It is hardly necessary to observe that, if Mrs. Rose should be divorced from her husband, she is entitled to be restored to the possession and use of her land; or should she, in an appropriate proceeding, show herself entitled to alimony or equitable settlement the products of her land, or the rents thereof, would be subject to the payment of it, in the same manner and to the same extent as they would be if the land belonged to the husband. This is upon the idea that the products of the land, or the rents of it, belong to him.

The only case to which the court's attention has been called which militates against the conclusion we have reached as to the incompetency of the legislature to take from a husband his vested rights, is the case of Rugh v. Ottenheimer, 6 Or. 281, 25 Am. Rep. 513. To sustain its conclusion in that case the court cited Maguire v. Maguire, 7 Dana, 183. A similar question to the one involved in this case was not before the court in the Maguire Case; neither did the court express an opinion on a question like the one involved in this case. The part of the opinion which the Oregon court relied upon to sustain its conclusion was dictum, and that does not even sustain the conclusion of the court. The court in Gaines v. Gaines, 9 B. Mon. 308, 48 Am. Dec. 425, did 41 L. R. A.

not adhere to the doctrine which was declared in Maguire v. Maguire, but said: "And if it were conceded, as intimated in Maguire v. Maguire, 7 Dana, 183, that the marriage contract is not as a contract wholly removed, like other contracts, from the power of the legislature to dissolve it in any particular case by special act of divorce, and that the dissolution of a marriage, if required by the public good, may be a legislative function, still it cannot be admitted that a power thus deduced, uncertain upon principle, as to its existence, and still more uncertain as to the grounds of its legitimate exercise, can override the express and highly conservative prohibitions in the Constitution, intended for the protection of private rights of property. We are of opinion, therefore, that whatever power, to be exercised in view of the public good, the legislature may have to enact divorces in special cases, as it cannot, even for the public good, change the right of private property from one to another without compensation, much less can it do so by a special act of divorce, sought by one of the parties against the consent of the other, with the purpose or effect of operating upon the rights of property incident to the marriage relation, as created and sustained by the general laws applicable to that relation." The act of the legislature in question does not attempt to dissolve the marriage contract, nor does it give any additional grounds upon which a court might do it. So the dictum in the Maguire Case, to wit, "And therefore marriage, being much more than a contract, and depending essentially on the sovereign will, is not, as we presume, embraced by the constitutional interdiction of legislative acts,"—could be regarded as a correct statement of constitutional law and still would have no application to the question at bar.

We have not felt it necessary to discuss marriage as a social relation, nor the necessity of the regulation and control of it by the sovereign power of the state. Neither have we felt it necessary to discuss the question as to the power of the legislature to prescribe the causes for which the marriage contract or relation may be dissolved. Neither would it be profitable to determine the question whether marriage is a contract sui generis, or one publici juris, or both. The marriage relation was assumed by the parties, it still exists, and no effort is made to have the court dissolve it. The questions we have been called upon to determine were: (1) What rights did the marriage give the husband in the wife's property? (2) Can the rights thus acquired be taken from the husband by the legislature and given to the wife? Our conclusions are supported by the common law, by the consensus of judicial opinion, and by the ablest writers on constitutional law. We have neither thought it wise nor judicial to disregard the rules of law, which are the crystallization of judicial opinion. Neither do we think, because lawmakers may have been slow in giving to wives freedom in the control of their property, that we should give our sanction to a law which, if upheld, will take the property of the husband and give it to the wife. If change and transition are to take place in the domestic relationship, although right and for the public good, still it should not be done at the sacrifice of vested rights.

The judgment is affirmed.

Du Relle, J., dissenting:

The question presented in this case is whether the statutory right given to the husband by the act of 1846 (2 Rev. Stat. p. 8) to the use of the wife's land, with power in him to rent it for not more than three years at a time, can be taken from him by legislation adopted subsequent to his marriage. It is provided in the act of March 15, 1894 (Ky. Stat. § 2127), that "during the existence of the marriage relation the wife shall hold and own all her estate to her separate and exclusive use, and free from the debts, liabilities, or control of her husband," and this suit is brought under the clause quoted, for the recovery of possession of the wife's land. In dissenting from the opinion of the majority in this case, it is essential to an understanding of the reasons of the dissent that the views of the minority upon the institution of marriage, and the peculiar limitations which have been placed by the courts upon the scope and effect of the so-called marriage contract, should be stated. To do this in the shortest mode, I have strung together, without unnecessary comment, extracts from the opinions and writings of judges and law writers who are properly esteemed to have given this subject most careful consideration and philosophic thought. Most of these extracts, and many more, may be found in Bishop's Marriage, Divorce, and Separation: "The word 'marriage' is used in two senses. It may mean the solemnity by which two persons are joined together in wedlock, or it may mean their status when they have been so joined." Cotton, L. J., in Harvey v. Farnie, L. R. 6 Prob. Div. 35, 47. In like manner the expression 'agreement of marriage' denotes either a contract between parties to solemnize together a marriage at a future time, or the solemnization itself. The term 'contract to marry' never points to an actual, executed marriage, but 'contract of marriage' often does. We have, therefore, three things: First, an agreement to enter into a marriage; secondly, an agreement of present marriage; and, thirdly, the status of marriage, imposed on the parties by the law as a consequence of their agreement of present marriage, oftener expressed by the single substantive word 'marriage.' A failure to keep in mind these distinctions has led to not a little confusion in our law books." Bishop. Mar. Div. & Sep. § 9. "Marriage, as distinguished from the agreement to marry and from the act of becoming married, is the civil status of one man and one woman legally united for life, with the rights and duties which, for the establishment of families and the multiplication and education of the species, are, or from time to time may thereafter be, assigned by the law to matrimony." Id. § 11. "That marriage, executed, is not a contract, we know because the parties cannot mutually dissolve it, because legislation may annul it at pleasure, and because none of its other elements are those of contract, but all are of status." Id. § 13. "The mere agreement to marry is not essentially different from other executory civil contracts;

it does not superinduce the status; and, on its violation, the injured party may recover his damages of the other. But when it is executed in what the law accepts as a valid marriage, its nature as a contract is merged in the higher nature of the status. And though the new relation—that is, the status—retains some similitudes reminding us of its origin, the contract does in truth no longer exist, but the parties are governed by the law of husband and wife. In other words, their prior mutual promise to marry was simply an undertaking to assume the marital status; and, on its assumption, the agreement being fully performed according to its terms, bound them no longer." Id. § 14. "There may be, and sometimes is, an antenuptial bargaining between the parties, to survive the assumption of the status, more or less regulating their property relations, yet in no degree qualifying the status itself." Id. § 15. "Lord Robertson, a Scotch judge, in a passage approvingly quoted by Judge Story and by Mr. Fraser, said: 'Marriage is a contract sui generis and differing in some respects from all other contracts, so that the rules of law which are applicable in expounding and enforcing other contracts may not apply to this. The contract of marriage is the most important of all human transactions. It is the very basis of the whole fabric of civilized society. The status of marriage is juris gentium, and the foundation of it, like that of all other contracts, rests on the consent of parties. But it differs from other contracts in this, that the rights, obligations, or duties arising from it are not left entirely to be regulated by the agreements of parties, but are, to a certain extent, matters of municipal regulation, over which the parties have no control by any declaration of their will.' " Id. § 24. "Lord Bannatyne said: 'The rights arising from the relation of husband and wife, though taking their origin in contract, have yet, in all countries, a legal character, determined by their particular laws and usages, altogether independent of the terms of the contract, or the will of the parties at the time of entering into it.' " Id. § 25. "Robertson, Ch. J., said in a Kentucky case: 'Marriage, though in one sense a contract,—because, being both stipulatory and consensual, it cannot be valid without the spontaneous concurrence of two competent minds—is, nevertheless, sui generis, and, unlike ordinary or commercial contracts, is publici juris, because it establishes fundamentals, and most important domestic relations. And therefore, as every well organized society is essentially interested in the existence and harmony and decorum of all its social relations, marriage, the most elementary and useful of them all, is regulated and controlled by the sovereign power of the state, and cannot, like mere contracts, be dissolved by the mutual consent only of the contracting parties, but may be abrogated by the sovereign will, either with or without the consent of both parties, whenever the public good, or justice to both or either of the parties, will be thereby subserved. Such a remedial and conservative power is inherent in every independent nation, and cannot be surrendered, or subjected to political restraint or foreign control, consistently with the public welfare. And therefore marriage, being much more than a contract, and depending essentially on the sovereign will, is not, as we presume, embraced by the constitutional interdiction of legislative acts impairing the obligation of contracts. The obligation is created by the public law, subject to the public will, and not to that of the parties." Id. § 80. Said Story in his Conflict of Laws: "It is rather to be deemed an institution of society, founded upon the consent and contract of the parties, and, in this view, it has some peculiarities in its nature, character, operation, and extent of obligation, different from what belong to ordinary contracts." Again: "Marriage is not a mere contract between the parties, subject, as to its continuance, dissolution, and effects, to their mere pleasure and intentions. But it is treated as a civil institution, the most interesting and important in its nature of any in society." Id. § 88. "Thus, to say that marriage is a contract, when speaking of the marital condition, not of the agreement to assume it, is, as we have seen, according even to the former utterances of most legal persons, inaccurate, since they further declare that it differs in many particulars from other contracts. And when the differences are pointed out, we see that they have covered every quality of the marriage, and left nothing of contract. All is submerged in the status." Id. § 86. Said Chief Justice Ames in Ditton v. Ditton, 4 R. I. 87: "It [the state] may, except so far as checked by Constitution or treaty, create by law new rights in, or impose new duties upon, the parties to these relations; or lessen both rights and duties, or abrogate them, and so the legal obligation of the relation which involves them, altogether. This it may do, with the exception above stated, as to some relations by law, when it wills; declaring that the legal relation of master and slave, for instance, shall cease to exist within its jurisdiction, or for what causes or breaches of duty in the relation, this, or the legal relation of husband and wife, or of parent and child, may be restricted in their rights and duties, or altogether dissolved through the judicial intervention of its courts."

Sufficient quotations have been given—and they might be multiplied—to make plain the general underlying doctrine upon this subject. The Kentucky cases bearing upon this question will next be considered:

The case of Maguire v. Maguire, 7 Dana, 184, has been already quoted from. In that case the question was as to the power of the circuit court, under the statute of 1809, to decree a divorce in invitum against a husband who was never domiciled in Kentucky. In his argument of the question, Chief Justice Robertson was of the opinion that, "so far as a dissolution of a marriage by public authority may be for the public good, it may be the exercise of a legislative function; but so far as it may be for the benefit of one of the parties, in consequence of a breach of the contract by the other, it is, undoubtedly, judicial." The distinction was drawn with reference to the Kentucky Constitution, under which the legislature could not exercise any power clearly and purely judicial, and deserves attention as recognizing the legislative power of absolute dissolution of marriage, even by private act, when the object aimed at by the lawmaking power might be the public good.

In Berthelemy v. Johnson, 8 B. Mon. 90, 38 Am. Dec. 179, Chief Justice Robertson emphasized the distinction referred to in the Maguire Case between the functions delegated by the Constitution to the judiciary and prohibited to the legislature, and held that the legislature might constitutionally authorize the courts to grant divorces, on the ascertainment by them that the marriage obligations had been violated. This was under a special act of the legislature enacted subsequently to the violation for which the divorce was authorized to be granted,—a mode of procedure which has frequently been held constitutional by the courts of other states.

In Gaines v. Gaines, 9 B. Mon. 295, 48 Am. Dec. 425, it appeared that Gaines and his wife had separated, with an agreement between Gaines and certain trustees for his wife, to which she was not a party, whereby certain provision was made for her. Some five years afterwards she instituted a suit for divorce, to which he filed a cross bill alleging five years' abandonment. By supplementary answer to the bill he pleaded that since the filing of his original answer the legislature, by an act regularly and legally passed, after due notice to the wife, had divorced him, and she was no longer his wife. Nothing further was done in the suit until after his death, when the wife filed a bill of revivor, claiming arrears of alimony, as well as dower and widow's distributive share. The court, through Chief Justice Marshall, in passing upon the constitutionality of the special act, referred to the distinction drawn in Maguire v. Maguire, 7 Dana, 184, and Berthelemy v. Johnson, 8 B. Mon. 90, 38 Am. Dec. 179, between the legislative power of divorce for the benefit of the public, and the judicial nature of divorces granted for the benefit of the parties, and remarked upon the characteristic feature of constitutional government in Kentucky, "in which the departments of power are not only carefully distinguished and divided, but the depositories of power in each department are prohibited from exercising, except in cases expressly authorized, any power properly belonging to the others. Can it be consistent with this division and prohibition," asks the court, "that after one department, erected for the very purpose of ascertaining and enforcing existing rights according to existing laws, had obtained possession of the case, and jurisdiction over the parties and their rights, by a suit regularly before it in a form and for purposes authorized by law, another department, not intrusted with the function of deciding upon individual rights as founded in existing laws, prohibited from exercising judicial power, except in a few instances not embracing this, prohibited from passing any law impairing contracts or their obligations, prohibited from taking private property for public use, and having no pretext of a right to take it from A and give it to B, may, upon the application of one of the parties, take the case from the appointed and selected forum, and by its mere fiat put an end, not only to the contest as existing in the judicial tribunal, but to the right itself, for the enforcement of which the party alleging injury had appealed to the tribunal appointed by the Constitution and the law, for the ascertainment of private rights and the redress of private wrongs?" Pages 300, 301, 48 Am. Dec. 427, 428. After arguing that the power under discussion would imply the further power to nullify by special act a judgment already decreed between the parties,—in effect, power of reversal by the legislature of judicial decrees,—and after considerable argument upon the failure of the evidence before the legislature to establish any ground of divorce in favor of the man, and the evident purpose, by resorting to the legislature, to defeat the wife's claim to provision out of his estate, which would inevitably have been granted in the pending suit, the court thus stated the question for decision: "The question, as thus developed by an analysis of the case, is not simply whether the legislature may, under any circumstances, constitutionally enact that A be divorced from B, but whether, when it is manifest that a party, after having sought a divorce in a judicial tribunal, and while his suit is there pending, abandons that forum, and resorts to the legislative power for the sole purpose of affecting and defeating the legal and equitable rights of his wife in his property, the divorce granted by the legislature on such application can, without disregarding the division of powers and distinction of departments as established by the Constitution, and the security of private rights of contract, and of property therein granted, be considered as asserting to any extent, the rights of property involved in the question of divorce. We are of opinion that it cannot." And again the question decided is stated: "The power of prescribing by general laws what causes shall constitute sufficient ground for a divorce, and what shall be the consequences of a divorce founded upon the ascertainment of these causes, is strictly within the legislative competency, and its exercise is intrusted to the legislative discretion. But the power of deciding upon the existence of these causes in individual cases, and of pronouncing the divorce and enforcing its legal consequences, is strictly judicial." There are some expressions in the opinion indicating that to some extent the court, in argument, based its conclusion upon the theory that, whatever power the legislature might have over the question of divorce by special act, it could not change the right of private property "by a special act of divorce, sought by one of the parties against the consent of the other, with the purpose or effect of operating upon the rights of property incident to the marriage relation, as created and sustained by the general laws applicable to that relation." But I am unable to conclude that by this opinion it was intended to deny the legislative power over the institution of marriage. But, if it be true that in the case last referred to a disposition was shown to limit the broad doctrine laid down in the Maguire Case, an equal disposition was shown in a subsequent case to restrict that limitation. In Cabell v. Cabell, 1 Met. (Ky.) 819, the husband and wife separated by mutual consent. By the terms of the separation, she was to be furnished with a riding horse and the sum of $1,- 000; and it was agreed in writing that either or both might apply to the legislature for a divorce, and that it might be granted without making further provision for the wife's support. Upon the husband's petition to the legislature, setting forth the facts, it was enacted that the marriage should be dissolved, and that they should be restored "to all the rights and privileges of unmarried persons." After Cabell's death, Mrs. Cabell claimed dower, upon the ground that the legislative divorce was unconstitutional and void, as—First, impairing the obligation of a contract, and therefore in violation of both Federal and state Constitutions; and, second, as being an exercise of judicial power by the legislature. This court (Judge Stites delivering the opinion) disposed of the first objection, viz., that the legislative divorce impaired the obligation of a contract, as follows: "It has generally been considered by the courts of this country, Federal and state, that marriage, though in some respects a contract, is not within the constitutional interdiction of legislative acts impairing the obligation of contracts. In Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 518, 4 L. ed. 639, Chief Justice Marshall observed that the Constitution of the United States had never been understood to restrict the general right of the legislatures of the states to legislate on the subject of divorces. And a similar view seems to have been entertained by Judge Story, in the same case. This doctrine seems likewise to have been acquiesced in by Chancellor Kent, who concedes 'that in ordinary cases the constitutionality of the laws of divorce in the respective states is not to be questioned.' 2 Kent, Com. p. 108. So, in Connecticut, it was held that legislative divorces for cause were constitutional and valid. Starr v. Pease, 8 Conn. 541. We are aware of no case in Kentucky in which this question has been directly raised or decided; but the general doctrine that the marriage contract is not within the constitutional inhibition has been certainly approved of by this court impliedly, if not directly." After referring to Maguire v. Maguire, 7 Dana, 184, and Berthelemy v. Johnson, 3 B. Mon. 90, 88 Am. Dec. 179, the opinion states what was considered to be the effect of Gaines v. Gaines: "And in Gaines v. Gaines, 9 B. Mon. 308, 48 Am. Dec. 430, in which it was held the legislature could not, by special act of divorce, sought by one of the parties against the consent of the other, affect prejudicially the rights of property of the latter growing out of, and incident to, the marriage relation, the general power of the legislature over the subject of divorces and the contract of marriage is not only not questioned, but is virtually conceded. In addition to these almost direct judicial recognitions of the power of the legislature, to some extent, over the marriage relation and contract, and the rights of the parties incident thereto, and in corroboration of the correctness of the doctrine that the power exists, we have had frequent and repeated instances of its exercise under the Constitution of 1799, acquiesced in by the executive, and, except in the cases referred to, never called in question. Every department of government in this state, since the adoption of the Constitution of 1799, and up to 1850 seems to have recognized the marriage relation, as has been said, 'as an organic institution, subject to the sovereign power of the state, not like mere contracts, to be dissolved by the mutual consent only of the contracting parties, but to be abrogated by the sovereign will, either with or without the consent of both parties, whenever the public good, or justice to both or either of the parties, will be thereby subserved,' and to have regarded 'the obligation as created by the public law, subject to the public will, and not to that of the parties.'" That part of the opinion in Cabell v. Cabell, which argues that the facts did not come within the rule laid down in the Gaines Case, as showing an exercise of judicial power by the legislature, sheds no light on the present question, and need not be here considered.

The doctrine to be deduced from these cases is that the marriage status, or relation existing between husband and wife, is, with all its attendant rights, subject to the sovereign power of the state. The relation may be entirely abrogated, and every resultant right destroyed, together with the relation from which it sprung. This may be done upon proof being made of ground for divorce which occurred prior to the enactment of the law which made it such ground. This is upon the ground that the marriage relation and its attendant rights are not included in the provision of the state or Federal Constitution as to laws impairing the obligation of contracts. If they were included in such provision, then it would follow necessarily that, wherever a married couple might go, they would take with them the law of the place where the marriage was contracted, as written into the marriage contract. If they sought divorce in another jurisdiction, it would be necessary to prove the law existent at the time the marriage was entered into in the place where it was contracted. And so, wherever they went, they would be governed in their relation to one another by such law, both as to their respective rights and duties, and as to their property rights, notwithstanding they might be domiciled in the new jurisdiction immediately after the marriage was consummated, and remain so domiciled until their death. It would follow necessarily that the act of 1846, which took from the husband his estate of freehold during the joint lives of husband and wife, which attached to him upon marriage, and gave him in lieu thereof merely the use of the wife's land, with power to rent it for not more than three years at a time, and made the husband's rights not subject to his debts, was unconstitutional, both as to the husband and as to creditors. No such doctrine has ever been announced, nor, so far as I am informed, been contended for. It would follow, also, that the act authorizing a circuit court to empower a married woman to act as a feme sole was unconstitutional. But, as said by Judge Stites in the Cabell Case, every department of the state government seems to have regarded the marital relation as created by the public law, subject to the public will, and not to that of the parties. The vinculum of the marriage may be broken, therefore, either by direct statutory action, or under statutory authority given to the courts; and this may be done for causes antecedent to the statute. Carson v. Carson, 40 Miss. 349; Berthelemy v. Johnson, 3 B. Mon. 90, 38 Am. Dec. 179; West v. West, 2 Mass. 221; Bigelow v. Bigelow, 108 Mass. 88. If the foundation of the rights may be taken away, with the result of the absolute destruction of such rights in all property which has not been lawfully consumed or disposed of during the existence of the marriage, why cannot the rights themselves be altered or modified or taken away without the dissolution of the marriage itself? What peculiar sanctity attaches to a marital right which does not belong to the institution of marriage? Does not the greater power include the less? Is not the whole greater than any of its parts?

There are, it is true, a large number of cases, and numberless dicta which either state or imply a distinction between the marriage status and the rights of property which accrue under it. These may be found collated in 2 Bishop, Married Women, §§ 88-51, and in the note to McNeer v. McNeer, 19 L. R. A. 256 (142 Ill. 888). It may be remarked that the New York decisions upon the subject of marriage are not in accord with those of most civilized countries; it being there held that a divorce obtained in another state against a citizen of New York did not release the latter from the marriage bond, though perfectly valid in the state which granted it, and that a subsequent marriage of the man, who, it was admitted, had ceased to have a wife, was polygamy under the laws of New York. Baker v. People, 15 Hun, 256. And it is there held that divorce obtained by the wife does not bar dower. A distinction is also drawn in the cases between the various kinds of marital rights, by dividing them into vested and non-vested rights. The preponderance of the decisions is to the effect that both curtesy and dower are not vested rights, though it is difficult to see upon what reason the distinction is founded. A married woman has a present, fixed capacity and right of future enjoyment of an estate for life of one third of the lands of which her husband is seised. It is urged with some plausibility that it cannot be known, until her dower is assigned, exactly what property will be assigned to her; but her right to one third of what her husband is seised of is fixed. So of curtesy. It is claimed that it does not take effect until after the death of the wife. According to the common-law rule, this reasoning is not sound, and is stated to be unsound by Mr. Bishop: for upon the birth of the child the husband becomes tenant by the curtesy initiate. 2 Bishop, Married Women, § 43. An estate is none the less vested because it is not in possession. But a tenant by the curtesy initiate is an estate in possession. Upon the birth of the child, the husband's freehold estate by the marital right becomes extended, and merged into a tenancy by the curtesy initiate, under which he holds the land, even during the life of the wife. And yet the author of the note to McNeer v. McNeer, 19 L. R. A. 256 (142 Ill. 888), states that he has "been unable to find any case in which the power of the legislature to defeat the right of curtesy initiate has been denied, except where the husband's right, which was held to be vested, and beyond the power of the legislature to destroy, consisted in whole or in part of his present right to the possession and profits of the wife's estate during coverture." And so of the husband's right to the wife's choses in action. He has a right to bring suit for, recover, and reduce them to possession. They then become his. And yet it is said that he has not a vested right to them, because, if he does not exercise the right, it survives to the wife, and it does not pass to his executor. For what other thing has a man a present, fixed right to bring suit and obtain recovery, to which he has not a vested right? Wherein is the husband's freehold by the marital right more a vested right than his right to sue for his wife's choses in action? And yet an act taking away the husband's right to recover the wife's choses in action is not unconstitutional. Percy v. Cockrill, 10 U. S. App. 574, 58 Fed. Rep. 872, 4 C. C. A. 78. It is not claimed that any part of the wife's property which had been lawfully consumed or lawfully disposed of during the continuance of the marriage relation, or before any statutory interference with the husband's rights, would be affected by a statute like the one under consideration; but it is insisted that, as between the husband and wife, all the rights growing out of the marital status are subject to the sovereign will.

In Rugh v. Ottenheimer, 6 Or. 281, 25 Am. Rep. 513, the plaintiff (appellant) was a married woman at the time of the adoption of the state Constitution. Judge Boise, delivering the opinion, states the question as follows: "The deed from Sebastian to plaintiff did not limit the land to her use, and the evidence does not show that in her trade with Gardner such a limitation was to be inserted in the deed. And, if the rule of the common law is not abrogated or modified by the state Constitution, then W. C. Rugh had an interest in this land which was liable to execution for his debts. It becomes, therefore, necessary to consider how far the real estate of women who were married at the time Oregon became a state was affected by § 5, art. 15, of the state Constitution. This section provides: 'The property and pecuniary rights of every married woman at the time of marriage, or afterward acquired by gift, devise, or inheritance, shall not be subject to the debts or contracts of the husband.'" After deciding that the clause of the Constitution was not merely prospective, and applicable only to future marriages, or property acquired after the establishment of the state government, the court continued: "So, the only real objection is that this section defeats or modifies the rights of the husband in his wife's property. Courts look with disfavor on all laws which are retrospective in their action, where they divest vested estates, or impair the obligation of contracts. It was by virtue of the marriage contract that the husband became, at common law, entitled to the use of his wife's land. And it was a fiction of the common law that husband and wife were one person, and the legal rights of the wife, on marriage, become merged in the husband; but this fiction, and the laws and decisions which grew up under it, were becoming modified in this country before the adoption of our Constitution,—the more rational and enlightened maxims of the civil law, which recognizes the rights of married women to property, having then been adopted in many of the states. And where the civil law was not adopted, cautious and judicious parents evaded the rigid rules of the common law by making ante-marital settlements for the benefit of future wives. If the section of the Constitution under consideration, which changes the common-law rights of the husband, is right and proper in cases of future marriages, or of property acquired in future, it is also right and proper to apply it to the lands of persons then married, unless such a construction cannot be given it. Against such a construction it is claimed that the husband by the common law became, on marriage, invested with a freehold in the lands of the wife, which estate continued for their joint lives. This estate, however, was conditional, and subject to be defeated by a divorce a vinculo. Schouler, Dom. Rel. p. 800. The marriage contract out of which this estate arose, was at common law one in which the state was interested, and over which it exercised legislative control. It is both sui generis and publici juris. Cord, Married Women; 1 Kent, Com. p. 418, note a; Maguire v. Maguire, 7 Dana, 188. In this last case the court, in speaking of the legislative control over marriage contracts, says: 'Marriage being much more than a contract, and depending essentially on the sovereign will, is not, as we presume, embraced by the constitutional interdiction of legislative acts impairing the obligation of contracts.' In view, therefore, of the nature of the contract by which the estate of the husband in his wife's lands is created, and the control which the legislature has always assumed over them, we think that without constitutional authority such contracts are subject to be altered and modified by the legislature. But this section of the Constitution is an expression of the sovereign will of the people, expressed in their Constitution, and in the making of that Constitution the convention represented the sovereign power, and was subject to the control of no higher power, except the Constitution of the United States; and, if they judged it right to exempt the lands of married women from the debts and contracts of these husbands, they could do so, and the only question is, What is the true meaning and scope of the section of the Constitution in question?" In this case the court held that the construction given was not controlled or affected by another provision of the Constitution, that "private rights shall not be affected by such changes." And upon this question the court continued: "The marriage relation, affecting the whole public, and being an institution of society, affecting more deeply than any other the foundations of social order and public morals, has always been under the control of the legislature. The legislature can, and often does, dissolve the marriage relation between parties, and when the relation is thus destroyed the marital right to use the wife's land, which is incident to such relation, ceases longer to exist. And we think this right is not strictly a private right, but is one which is incident to a relation in which the whole community is interested. We think, therefore, that § 5, art. 15, is not modified by § 10, art. 18, of the Constitution, and that article 15, § 5, does include all the lands owned in their own right by married women at the time of marriage,—whether married before or after Oregon became a state."

We have seen that the legislature of Kentucky has twice modified the life estate by the marital right,—once by direct statutory action, and once by statute to be made effectual through the medium of the courts, by authorizing them to enter decrees clothing married women with the powers of a feme sole. No question has ever been made as to the constitutionality of either statute. On the other hand, it has been held in Azbill v. Azbill, 92 Ky. 154, that a decree authorizing a married woman to act as a feme sole may be entered against the objection of the husband, and after a contest made by him against it in the courts. The opinion in this case, by Judge Lewis, shows one of the grounds of the application to be the wife's ownership of personal property, which of course had vested in the husband by virtue of the marriage, and of land, in which a freehold estate by the marital right had vested in him. Does not this decree take away his vested rights, if any right is vested, under the Constitution, which springs out of, or takes its origin from, the marriage relation? If authorized by such a decree, the wife may by will defeat her husband's right of curtesy. Garner v. Willis, 92 Ky. 386. It is conceded that, if we are to be guided by the mere number of cases which have been decided upon this question the husband's contention must prevail. But if we are to reach our conclusion by reasoning from the nature of the marriage relation and the principle which underlie it, it must be decided in favor of the wife. It has appeared to me so plain, from a careful reading of the statute, that it was intended to be applied to existing marriages and property held thereunder, that I have not discussed the question, which, indeed, appears to be conceded in the arguments of counsel. Great difference of opinion may exist as to the policy of the statute in question. Many have doubted the wisdom of the enactments giving to married women greater freedom of contract and disposition of their property. Since the enactment of the statute, cases have arisen which furnish strong argument in favor of the view that it was unwise to take from the wife the restraints which, for her protection, the common law had woven about her. That, however, is a matter for the discretion of the legislature. But I have never had a doubt of the wisdom of the particular provision now under consideration. It has seemed to me monstrous that a brutal husband should have the legal right to put his wife to the election of either leaving him in possession of all her estate, or assuming the social stigma of a divorced woman, and that, having the use of her land, he should have the right there to entertain such guests as he saw fit, against her protest. It is unprofitable, however, to discuss the wisdom of the act. It has been adopted. My conclusion is that it was intended to take effect at once, as to all property held by virtue of existing or future marriages, except as to such as had been theretofore lawfully consumed or disposed of, and, further, that it is not in conflict with the Constitution, for the reason that all rights obtained by virtue of the status of marriage are taken subject to the sovereign power of the state to alter and modify them. In my opinion, the judgment should be reversed.

Hazelrigg, J., dissenting:

Our statutes conferred on the husband, during the wife's life, no estate or interest in her lands, except an uncertain and contingent use thereof, with power to rent them for not more than three years at a time; and even this rent went to the wife if the husband died during the term. If the wife happened not to avail herself of her statutory right to incumber her estate for debts created for necessities for herself or for any member of her family, including her husband, and also happened not to avail herself (as she might, even in opposition to the husband's will) of the sweeping rights with which she may invest herself under the statute empowering her to act as a single woman, then the husband might enjoy the use of her lands. It is a stretch of legal nomenclature to call this an estate or interest in lands at all, and a clear confusion of terms to call such uncertain and contingent interest a vested estate or interest. The husband cannot sell this use, nor can his creditors subject it to their debts contracted either before or during his marriage. The argument of the cases relied on in the majority opinion finds its chief support in the recited fact that the husband's interest in the wife's lands may be sold or otherwise disposed of by him, or by his creditors. "It cannot be," said the court, in McNeer v. McNeer, 19 L. R. A. 360, 142 Ill. 888, 894, "that an interest in property, which can be seized on execution and sold by creditors in payment of their debts, is not such a vested interest as the fundamental law will protect from destruction by retroactive legislation." But, speaking of the modification of the old law by the Illinois statute, the court said further: "So long as she lived, however, his interest in her land lacked those elements of property, such as the power of disposition and liability to sale on execution, which had formerly given it the character of a vested estate." Mr. Cooley, in speaking of the husband's common-law right of curtesy initiate, says: "This right would be property subject to conveyance, and to be taken for debts; and must therefore be regarded as a vested right, no more subject to legislative interference than other expectant interests which have ceased to be mere contingencies and become fixed." Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 440. I may take occasion, when time permits, to extend these views. I do not believe any case can be found holding such a restricted, shadowy, and uncertain use as is given the husband in his wife's lands under the Kentucky statutes in force when the parties to the marriage entered into that relation to be a vested estate or interest in lands.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

John W. HAGGETT

v.

Frances E. HURLEY et al.

(91 Me. 542.)

A married woman cannot form a partnership with her husband under Rev. Stat. chap. 61, § 4, making her liable for debts contracted before marriage and those contracted after marriage in her own name, as well as for her torts in which her husband took no part.

EXCEPTIONS by Mrs. Hurley to rulings of the Supreme Judicial Court for Knox County made during the trial of an action brought to hold her liable as partner in a business conducted by her husband for goods sold and delivered for use in the business. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. H. Fogler and J. E. Hanley for defendants.

Messrs. C. E. Littlefield and A. S. Littlefield, for plaintiff:

There is no state wherein it is held that a wife cannot enter into a contract of partnership with her husband, where the decisions have not been rendered upon statutes essentially narrower and more restrictive in their language than the statutes of the state of Maine.

The state of Maine is in a very marked degree in its legislation in advance of any other state in the Union, and there is no court whose decision holding that a wife cannot enter into this contract would, for that reason, be an authority, even tending to sustain such a conclusion by our court under our legislation.

The question involved is settled by an act of the legislature passed in 1866.

Private and Special Laws of Maine 1866, chap. 52.

The act of 1866 reads as follows: "The contracts of any married woman, made for any lawful purpose, shall be valid and binding, and may be enforced in the same manner as if she were sole; and her separate property shall be holden by attachment, or levy on execution, in any suit brought to enforce such contract, but she shall not be liable to arrest, on any writ in such suit, or on any execution issued on a judgment recovered in the same."

This statute was condensed at the time of the revision in 1871, and appears in chap. 61, § 4, of that revision.

Blake v. Blake, 64 Me. 177.

Upon the authority of that case it is settled that a married woman has the legal right to make a contract "for any lawful purpose" with whomsoever she may choose, and with her husband equally as with anyone else.

Wentworth v. Wentworth, 69 Me. 247.

Lord v. Parker, 8 Allen, 127, is the first case in Massachusetts holding that the wife has no power to enter into a contract of partnership with her husband. It is practically the original case in which this question was determined in this country, and all the cases which hold that such a contract cannot be entered into practically follow it as authority.

There is nothing in the statutes there discussed that gives her the broad and comprehensive power to enter into any lawful contract.

Lord v. Parker, 8 Allen, 127, is based upon the proposition that the statutes of Massachusetts do not authorize the wife to enter into a contract of any kind with her husband, and for that reason the wife could not enter into a contract of partnership.

Fowle v. Torrey, 185 Mass. 89.

In Massachusetts to-day, by virtue of an express provision of the statute, if a husband desires to make a conveyance to his wife he must employ the absurd and ridiculous mummery of making a conveyance to a third person, who then makes the conveyance to his wife.

Porter v. Wakefield, 146 Mass. 27.

Ever since 1852 in this state the husband and wife have enjoyed the common-sense right against which nothing but a common-law fiction can be urged, of conveying directly to each other.

Allen v. Hooper, 50 Me. 371.

The states in which the court hold with greater or less definiteness that the wife cannot make a contract of partnership with her husband, or any contract, are Washington, Wisconsin, Indiana, Maryland, Ohio, Texas, South Carolina, Florida, and Arkansas, following Massachusetts.

The states which hold that she may become a partner of her husband are New York, Illinois, Vermont, Kentucky, Missouri, Michigan, Alabama, and Georgia.

The cases holding adversely to our contention are—

There are none of them that are in any proper sense in point in favor of defendant's contention; from the Massachusetts case down, the statutory provisions are so distinct and different that none of the cases have any weight in reaching a conclusion at bar.

Upon the other hand, there is a line of respectable authority holding distinctly, under less favorable legislation, that the wife can become a partner of her husband.

Suau v. Caffé, 122 N. Y. 308, 9 L. R. A. 593; Hamilton v. Hamilton, 89 Ill. 350; Dressel v. Lonsdale, 46 Ill. App. 455; Dunifer v. Jecko, 87 Mo. 284; Schofield v. Jones, 85 Ga. 823;

NOTE—As to partnership between husband and wife in business, see Gilkerson-Sloss Commission Co. v. Sallinger (Ark.) 18 L. R. A. 523, and note; also Fuller & F. Co. v. McHenry (Wis.) 18 L. R. A. 512; and Vail v. Winterstein (Mich.) 18 L. R. A. 515. 41 L. R. A.

Schlapback v. Long, 90 Ala. 525; Wells v. Caywood, 3 Colo. 487; Snell v. Stone, 23 Or. 327; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Alexander, 16 Ky. L. Rep. 806.

The fact that the controversy at bar is between the creditors of the partnership and the partnership, and not between the parties to the partnership themselves, furnishes a decided distinction which would authorize us to maintain this action against the defendant, and charge her as a partner, even though as between herself and her husband it was not competent for her to enter into that relation.

Lane v. Bishop, 65 Vt. 575.

A wife is liable upon a joint promise with her husband.

Strickland v. Hamlin, 87 Me. 81.

The wife may be jointly liable with her husband, even under the Massachusetts statutes.

Reiman v. Hamilton, 111 Mass. 245.

Mr. Mervyn Ap Rice also for plaintiff.

Emery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The important and decisive question is whether a married woman can enter into the relation of a business partnership with her husband, and thus subject herself and her separate estate to liability for the partnership debts contracted in the name of the partnership. The plaintiff, of course, concedes that the affirmative of this question is without support from the common law, and must be based solely on some enabling statute. He contends, however, that it is fully sustained by the statute, Rev. Stat. chap. 61, § 4, the full text of which is as follows:

"Sec. 4. A husband married since April 26, 1852, is not liable for the debts of his wife contracted before marriage, nor for those contracted afterward in her own name, for any lawful purpose; nor is he liable for her torts committed after April 26, 1852, in which he takes no part; but she is liable in all such cases; a suit may be maintained against her, or against her and her husband therefor; and her property may be attached and taken on execution for such debts and for damages for such torts, as if she were sole; but she cannot be arrested."

The "all such cases" in which she is by the statute made liable are three: (1) "Her debts contracted before marriage," (2) "her debts contracted afterward [after the marriage] in her own name," and (3) "her torts committed after April 26, 1852, in which her husband took no part." The statute thus makes a distinction between her debts contracted before and those contracted after marriage. As to the former, she is made liable without restriction; as to the latter her liability is confined to those contracted "in her own name." This phraseology alone at the outset should make the court hesitate to declare that she is liable for a debt contracted after marriage, not by her in her own name, but by the partnership in the partnership name. The intention of the legislature to subject her and her separate estate to such a liability is not clearly apparent from the statute in its present form.

The plaintiff, however, contends that the language of the present statute is but a consolidation of Stat. 1866, chap. 52, which reads 41 L. R. A.

as follows: "The contracts of any married woman, made for any lawful purpose, shall be valid and binding and may be enforced in the same manner as if she were sole." This statute, read by itself, may seem very broad and inclusive. Read in connection with the whole body of the law, it will seem less so. For instance, the statute declares in the most unlimited terms that her contracts "may be enforced in the same manner as if she were sole," yet her husband cannot enforce her contracts with him in any manner. Hobbs v. Hobbs, 70 Me. 381. Again, a contract to marry is ordinarily for a lawful purpose, but this statute would not empower a married woman to make such a contract.

No single statute should be interpreted solely by its own words. Upon enactment it becomes a part of, and is to be read in connection with, the whole body of the law. Its interpretation is to be in the light of the general policy of previous legislation and of the long-established principles of law and equity. There is a presumption that by the new enactment the legislature intended some progress along the line, and did not intend any reversal of such established policy and principles. No new statute will be construed as intending such a reversal unless that intent unmistakably appears. Landers v. Smith, 78 Me. 212; Cummings v. Everett, 82 Me. 260.

That, under the statute of 1866, a married woman may make a contract with her husband, need not be questioned here. That such an authority to make contracts includes the power to enter into the relation of a business partnership with her husband, so as to subject herself and her separate estate to partnership liability, is more questionable. A business partnership between husband and wife is scarcely within the strict letter of the statute. The term "contract," in its ordinary legal sense, implies two opposite parties, or two opposite sets of parties. Each has in the subject-matter of the contract a right distinct and different from that of the other. Indeed, so marked is the difference, the right of the one is the duty of the other. If one is the vendor, the other, as to the same subject-matter, is the vendee. If one is bailor, or employer, or creditor, the other is bailee, or employee, or debtor. Again, a legal contract implies a right of action at law for its breach. The law of contract was first developed through the allowance of actions for the breach. A right of action is often the test of the existence of a legal contract. Without such right it is difficult to conceive of a binding contract. Neither in a contract nor in the part ownership of property is there any idea of community of interest, nor any idea of an entity apart from the individual contractors or owners. The right or interest of each part owner is separate and distinct from that of the others.

Partnership is often called a contract, as marriage is often spoken of as a contract; but it is rather a relation, a status, somewhat as marriage is a relation or status. T. Parsons, Partn. § 101.

In a partnership there are no opposite parties with separate and different interests in the subject-matter of the partnership. There is a community of right and interest. Neither partner owns any proportional part of any article of partnership property. Each has dominion over the whole article, and over the entire partnership property. Upon the death of either partner this dominion remains in the survivors. So long as the partnership continues, no right of action at law exists between partners as to any partnership property or transaction. Much like marriage partners, business partners are left to adjust themselves to one another as best they can until they call upon the courts to dissolve the relation and administer the estate. Again, in a partnership there is a notion of an entity apart from individual partners. In the Roman law the partnership was known as "societas." There is individual property and partnership property. A partner may owe the partnership and vice versa. A partnership usually has dealing and keeps accounts with each partner. In those jurisdictions where the Roman law is the basis of the jurisprudence, the entity of the partnership is frankly recognized, and actions are allowed between the partner and the partnership. Fitcher's Succession, 89 La. Ann. 362; Liverpool, B. & R. P. Nav. Co. v. Agar, 14 Fed. Rep. 615.

In common-law jurisdictions this entity is acknowledged, at least in equity, and to some extent at law, in spite of the technical rule that no action at law can be maintained between a partner and a partnership. Pooley v. Driver, L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 458; Curtis v. Hollingshead, 14 N. J. L. 402, 410; Walker v. Wait, 50 Vt. 668.

As to the character of the partnership relation, see also Duinel v. Stone, 80 Me. 884; Woodward v. Cowing, 41 Me. 9, 66 Am. Dec. 211.

It seems apparent that there is much difference between the partnership relation and the ordinary contract. So far as partnership is a contract, it is sui generis, and is not necessarily, or even ordinarily, brought to the mind by the use of the term "contract." The legislature, in using the word "contract" in this statute of 1866, without further definition or expression, has not, we think, expressed in terms an intent to authorize a married woman to enter into a business partnership with her husband. But, however unrestricted the term in the original statute, it should be noticed that in the revision (Rev. Stat. chap. 61, § 4) the term is expressly restricted to contracts in her own name. This restriction clause would seem to exclude contracts made in the name of the partnership, or in any other name than her own. The plaintiff's proposition certainly falls outside of the strict letter of the present statute.

Is such an authority within the spirit of the statute?

To determine this question we shall consider the rules and reasons of the anterior law, the character and trend of its successive modifications, and the reasons for them, and the course, purpose, and policy of legislation upon the subject. If the purpose of a course of legislation can be perceived, it is always to be presumed that the legislature intends to further that purpose, rather than to abandon it.

Before the recent statutes it had been for more than a thousand years the settled legal policy of the Teutonic nations, at least, to exclude a married woman from all participation in business affairs. The husband, upon the marriage, took over all her personal property, and the use of her real estate for his life. He became responsible for her support, her debts, and her torts. She was not responsible for any debts, nor for any torts committed by her under her husband's influence. There was, of course, for this rule, a reason, which seemed sufficient for centuries. There is no warrant for saying that this reason was in the harshness or selfishness of the male sex, or in any desire to exploit the female sex. Though in early times manners were ruder, and life harder, the family and marital affections do not appear to have been weaker. The strength of these among the Teutonic races, as compared with their weakness under the liberal marriage laws of the Roman empire, excited the admiration of the historian. The reason appears to be in the almost instinctive desire to insure the unity,—the singleness of the family.

There is a general consensus of opinion that the family existed before the state, and that autocratic family government was the first of all forms of government. It seems to have been regarded as an axiom by publicists for centuries that the family was the basis of the state, and that the destruction of the family would be the destruction of the state. To insure the unity and preservation of the family, there seemed to be thought necessary a complete identity of interests, and a single head with control and power. The husband was made that head, and given the power, and in return was made responsible for the maintenance and conduct of the wife. To prevent any clashing of interests between husband and wife, to prevent any divisions or separations in the family, the wife was disqualified during coverture from having any business interests, and from subjecting her personal estate to the claims of creditors. Such at least was the common law.

This policy or rule undoubtedly worked hardship in individual cases. Some husbands were incompetent; some were beyond the seas; some exercised rigidly their marital authority over the property of the wife, but did not apply it to her support. The courts of equity began early to relieve and guard against these hardships by recognizing trusts for married women, by recognizing her conveyances, and even her contracts when clearly necessary for her support in the absence of her husband, by refusing aid to the husband in recovering the wife's property until he create a trust fund for her maintenance, and by other means. The doctrine of the wife's separate estate thus grew up in equity, and was cherished by the courts, but rather to insure the wife's support under the law than to weaken the law. Every attempt of the husband or of third parties to charge this separate estate was resisted. The wife was not allowed to charge it unless clearly for her own benefit. The idea of any legal relation between husband and wife other than that of marriage was not entertained.

In late years the legislatures have recognized these equitable doctrines, and have modified the law, presumably in the same direction, and for the same purpose, to more fully insure the maintenance of the married woman. An examination of the course of legislation in this state will show this to be the general purpose. The first statute was § 9, chap. 57, Laws 1821, which empowered the court to authorize the wife to make contracts in her name, and sue in her name, during the time her husband may have abandoned her, and absented himself from the state. In 1841, by Rev. Stat. chap. 87, § 29, this former statute was made to include the case of a wife whose husband was in the state prison. By § 81 of the same act the land damages for land of the wife taken under eminent domain were to be secured to the wife's separate use. By §§ 81 and 82 it was provided that a married woman coming into the state without her husband, he never having lived with her in this state, should have power to contract as if sole until his arrival and resumption of his marital rights. The act of 1844 (chap. 117) was entitled "An Act to Secure to Married Women Their Rights in Property." Section 1 provided that a married woman could become seised and possessed of property in her own name, provided the same did not come in any way from her husband. Section 2 provided that when a woman possessed of property married, the property should continue hers as her separate property, exempt from liability for the debts of the husband. Section 3 authorized the wife to release to the husband the control of the property, and the right to dispose of the income "for their mutual benefit." By Stat. 1847, chap. 27, the wife was allowed to acquire property from her husband except as against his creditors. By Stat. 1848, chap. 73, she was granted the right to use all processes to enforce and defend her rights of property under the statute of 1844. By § 3 of the same statute she was authorized to dispose of her estate by will, and if she died intestate her estate was to descend to her heirs. By Stat. 1853, chap. 227, she was empowered to dispose of her separate estate, acquired under former acts, in her own name, as if unmarried. By statute of same year (chap. 291) the husband was freed from liability for his wife's debts, though he might still be joined in the suit against her. The wife could defend alone or with her husband, but was to be free from arrest. By Stat. 1855, chap. 120, she was again authorized to convey her separate estate by her separate deed. In 1856, however, by chapter 250, this right of conveyance was restricted to property not acquired from her husband or his relatives. As to such estate the joinder of the husband was required. By Stat. 1857, chap. 59, she was authorized to receive and sue for the wages of her personal labor performed for others than her own family. Rev. Stat. 1857, chap. 61, § 6, of the same year authorized marriage settlements. By Stat. 1863, chap. 148, she was authorized to engage in business upon her own account, and her contracts therein were made binding and enforceable against her separate property, but the husband and his property were to be exempt from liability therefor.

By Stat. 1863, chap. 214, she was authorized to take and hold property from her husband as security for a bona fide debt, or for payment for money actually loaned. Next came the statute of 1866, which has been quoted in the early part of this opinion, and upon which the plaintiff relies. The next statute was that of 1876 (chap. 112), granting the wife all processes for the defense of her property and personal rights without control by her husband. By Stat. 1883, chap. 207, the husband was freed from liability for his wife's torts in which he took no part. The statute of 1889 (chap. 176) limited the necessity of the husband's joinder in conveyances to property conveyed by him directly to his wife. Here legislation upon the subject has apparently come to an end.

The main purpose running through all this legislation seems to have been to enable a married woman to acquire, hold, and dispose of a separate property, a property which should be entirely free from her husband's control. This purpose is made more manifest from the revisions of the statutes since 1866. If the statute of 1866 was intended to have the sweeping, comprehensive effect claimed for it by the plaintiff, it must have been understood to have superseded all the previous legislation designed to enlarge a married woman's rights and powers. The previous enlarging acts would have been regarded as obsolete, and dropped from the statute book upon its revision. But this does not seem to have been the understanding of the legislature. We find nearly all these prior statutes twice re-enacted in the revisions of 1871 and 1883, and they are still upon the statute book. Rev. Stat. chap. 61, §§ 1-5, 7-10. The statute of 1866 reappears in § 4, which enacts that a married woman shall be liable for all her debts contracted before marriage, and for those contracted afterwards "in her own name for any lawful purpose." The words "in her own name" were not in the act of 1866, and seem to have been added to bring that act into harmony with preceding acts. They seem to limit her power to contract to such contracts as she may make in her own name. While mere consolidation or condensation of the language of a statute in revision is not to be presumed to indicate a change of meaning, the addition of restrictive words not found in the original statute may indicate an intention or understanding that the statute is restricted in its effect. The words "in her own name" seem to indicate that the wife's power to contract is not unlimited; that it is confined to her separate business or estate. The legislature, by twice re-enacting most of the former statutes, and by using the words "in her own name" in the revisions, has certainly indicated that it did not understand that all disabilities and restrictions upon married woman were removed by the act of 1866. While the legislative construction of a statute is not binding upon the court, it is entitled to great respect.

In enacting these statutes the legislature was aware that they could not be extended by implication, but would be construed strictly as in derogation of the common law, and as modifying a long approved policy. Such was the settled rule of construction in this state when the statute of 1866 was passed. Swift v. Luce, 27 Me. 285; Newbegin v. Langley, 39 Me. 200, 68 Am. Dec. 613; Brookings v. White, 49 Me. 479. It has since been emphatically affirmed in Hobbs v. Hobbs, 70 Me. 381, and Cummings v. Everett, 82 Me. 260.

In view of this familiar rule of construction, it would be reasonable to expect that if the legislature really intended the act of 1866, as recast in the Revised Statutes, to extend beyond the contract of a married woman in her own name, and to include the power of entering into a business partnership with her husband, to contract in a firm name, and to subject herself and her separate estate to all the incidents, risks, and liabilities of such a relation, it would have used language more pointedly indicating such an intention. Up to that time the policy of the legislature had been to insure the maintenance of the wife and the security of her separate property from her husband's control, following out the equities suggested by the courts. There was manifested no intention to interfere in any other respect with the marriage relation, except to free the husband from liability for his wife's debts or torts. The husband was still left the head of the family, with the duty of support, and the right to direct the family life. The importance of family unity was still recognized. Though husband and wife might each have separate property or business interests, this was for the protection of the wife against the misfeasance or nonfeasance of the husband as to his duty.

There seems to be an incongruity between this policy of the legislature and the incidents of the partnership relation, and also an incongruity between these and the incidents of the marriage relation. In a partnership all the partners are equal in power and liability. A partnership acting through one partner may commit torts as well as make contracts, and each partner may thus be made liable for torts as well as debts caused by another partner. By entering into a business partnership with her husband the wife practically subjects her separate property and herself to liability for debts and torts caused by him,—the very liability the legislature, as well as the court, had been striving to prevent. Ordinarily, the husband would in fact carry on the business, and by reason of his position as husband would have an influence over his partner and the business not justified by any superior business capacity. The partnership relation could not be kept distinct from the marriage relation. The business partners could not forget they were also husband and wife. The essential element of perfect equality between business partners could not exist. The wife would be at a disadvantage. The husband would still be the head of the family, with marital authority. The assent he could not win from his business partner, he might extort from his wife. The result might often defeat the very purpose of the enabling statutes.

True, it may be best for the family and the state that the wife be permitted to enter into this additional relation with husband, and be subject to all its consequences. If we thought the legislature had clearly intended such an almost revolutionary change in the law of husband and wife, we should not assume to question its wisdom; but, in view of all the foregoing considerations, until it uses language more explicit upon this point than it has heretofore used, we cannot think that such was its intention.

The plaintiff's counsel cites the cases of Blake v. Blake, 64 Me. 177, and Wentworth v. Wentworth, 69 Me. 247, and especially the language of the opinion in the former case, as inconsistent with the construction here put upon the statute. We do not find in either case an expression of an opinion that the word "contract" in the statute includes a business partnership between husband and wife. That point evidently was not in the mind of the court. We make no decision here inconsistent with those decisions or opinions. We do not decide that a wife may not make a valid contract with her husband, nor that she may not join with her husband in contracts with other parties, nor that she may not become a surety for her husband, nor that she may not make contracts through him as her agent. All these might be contracts "in her own name."

Both counsel with commendable diligence have made exhaustive citations of cases in other states. Such citations are of less assistance in the interpretation of statutes than in ascertaining general legal principles. Since our legislature does not appear to have adopted any statute of another state which has been construed by the courts of that state, but to have legislated independently, those decisions should not very much influence us in endeavoring to ascertain the true intent of our own legislature. Apart from any difference in the phraseology of the statutes of the various states, there may be wide differences in the history, in the general legislative and judicial policy, and in the habit of judicial interpretation in the different states, so that the opinions of their courts as to the intent of their legislatures might not indicate the intent of our legislature, even when they use similar language. Still it may be instructive to briefly survey some of the cases cited by plaintiff's counsel as antagonistic to our interpretation.

The only case necessarily and expressly affirming the plaintiff's contention is Suaw v. Caffé, 122 N. Y. 308, 9 L. R. A. 593. But that decision was by four justices against three in the second division only of the court of appeals. The narrowness of the majority detracts from the authority of the decision. In the other cases cited there were other elements, not present in this case, which were considered, and made to a large degree the basis of the decisions, especially the element of estoppel. These will appear in an examination of the cases. In Lane v. Bishop, 65 Vt. 575, the wife held herself out as a partner of her husband in running the hotel. The goods were sold upon her credit, and she personally promised to pay for them. The court practically held that she was estopped from denying her liability. The court said a wife could not be allowed to conduct a partnership in which her husband was a secret or open partner, to frequently receive all the benefits to be derived therefrom, and escape all liabilities. The case of Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Alexander, 16 Ky. L. Rep. 306, is briefly reported, but the wife seems to have been held liable upon the ground that she had held herself out as a partner. The language of the court is:

"She cannot say to the world, 'I am interested in this business venture with my husband, and my property is therefore pledged to the payment of the partnership debts,' and then escape liability." In Snell v. Stone, 28 Or. 827, the wife carried on the business in her own name, but her husband was interested in the business, and so informed the plaintiffs upon their inquiry about the time the account was opened. Upon this ground the husband was held liable. The wife made no defense, confessing her liability on her own contract made in her own name. In Dunifer v. Jecko, 87 Mo. 284, the husband and wife sued as co-owners and copartners in a newspaper. The defendant raised the point they could not sue as partners, but, inasmuch as he had dealt with them as partners, and had been allowed a set-off against them as partners, it was held that he could not now complain as to the joinder; but even this much was only held by three justices against two. Dressel v. Lonadale, 46 Ill. App. 454, was an action by husband and wife for board. The defendant insisted that the action should have been by the wife alone. The court held that it could make no difference to the defendant whether the action was by one or both, since the judgment would in this case be a bar. The court said briefly and obiter that, because husband and wife could contract with each other, they could form a business partnership. Hamilton v. Hamilton, 89 Ill. 850, contains dicta only. In Schofield v. Jones, 85 Ga. 816, Jones and wife were part owners of an hotel, and as such gave joint promissory notes. The wife pledged some of her separate property as collateral security for these notes. It was held that her pledge was binding on her. In Schlappack v. Long, 90 Ala. 525, the action was on a judgment against husband and wife as partners in an hotel business. The husband had held himself out to the creditor as a partner. Held, that by reason of such holding out, and because of the judgment recovered against him as such partner, he was now estopped from denying the partnership. In Wells v. Caywood, 8 Colo. 487, the action was ejectment, and the question was simply whether a husband could convey to his wife. The court adopted the liberal expansive rule of construction.

On the other hand, the following cases are cited: Lord v. Parker, 3 Allen, 127; Artman v. Ferguson, 78 Mich. 146, 2 L. R. A. 348;

Vail v. Winterstein, 94 Mich. 281, 18 L. R. A. 515; Haas v. Shaw, 91 Ind. 384, 46 Am. Rep. 607; Payne v. Thompson, 44 Ohio St. 193; Fuller & F. Co. v. McHenry, 83 Wis. 578, 18 L. R. A. 572; Gilkerson-Sloss Commission Co. v. Salinger, 56 Ark. 294, 16 L. R. A. 526; Mayer v. Soyler, 80 Md. 402; Howard v. Stephens, 52 Miss. 244; Miller v. Marx, 65 Tex. 182; Salinas v. Turner, 33 S. C. 231; American Mortg. Co. v. Owens, 25 U. S. App. 659, 72 Fed. Rep. 219, 18 C. C. A. 518. The plaintiff insists that these cases are not in conflict with his proposition, since in all the statutes interpreted was restrictive language indicating an intention to limit the power of contract by a wife to her separate property, or to her separate business affairs.

He assumes that there is no such restrictive language in our statute. As already intimated, we do not think this assumption is well founded. There is one restrictive clause at least. A married woman's contract, to be binding, must be "in her own name." Is not this a concise mode of saying that her contract must concern her own separate property, her own separate business? It could hardly mean the mere outward form or name of the contract. It must have referred to its character, its substance. We do not see such a dissimilarity between the substance of the statutes, as the plaintiff claims there is.

There is one late case, however, which goes to the extreme against the plaintiff's proposition,—Seattle Bd. of Trade v. Hayden, 4 Wash. 263, 16 L. R. A. 580. The statute was as follows: "Sec. 2406. Contracts may be made by a wife and liabilities incurred, and the same be enforced by or against her to the same extent and in the same manner as if she were unmarried." The term "contract" in this statute is certainly unrestricted by anything in the context. The action was against Mrs. Hayden to charge her as a partner in her husband's firm of J. P. Hayden & Co. The court, in an elaborate opinion, held that the partnership relation between husband and wife was not within the spirit of the statute. Only one justice out of five dissented. The plaintiff suggests that the "community" law of the state influenced the decision, but the opinion seems to arrive at its result in spite of, rather than on account of, the "community" law.

Motion and exceptions sustained.

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court for Baltimore City dismissing a bill filed to compel payment for stock held by defendant's testator in a foreign corporation against which plaintiff had recovered a judgment. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Pollard & Bagby for appellant.

Mr. J. Markham Marshall, for Thomas A. Bryan:

The contract on which the shareholder's obligation is founded, is not to pay a certain fixed sum upon a future contingency, but such sum or sums as may be required from himself and all other shareholders from time to time, not exceeding a certain sum, and regulated by the wants of the company.

South Staffordshire R. Co. v. Burnside, 5 Exch. 129; Glenn v. Howard, 65 Md. 40; Scovill v. Thayer, 105 U. S. 155, 26 L. ed. 978.

In the present case, there was nothing due and payable by any stockholder, until the Virginia court, exercising the discretion that the directors of the company had refused to exercise, took an account of the debts against the company, and ascertained the amount of the unpaid capital stock necessary to be called in to discharge those debts.

Glenn v. Williams, 60 Md. 93; Hawkins v. Glenn, 131 U. S. 880, 33 L. ed. 191.

The account prayed for by the plaintiff has already been taken by a court of competent jurisdiction in a sister state, whose decisions are entitled to full faith and credit in the courts of this state. The defendant is as much bound by that decree, as if he had been personally before the court, and can only plead to a suit brought to enforce it "never subscribed" or payment of his subscription in full.

Bagby v. Atlantic, M. & O. R. Co. 86 Pa. 291.

Plaintiff is not entitled to have an account against appellant or his codefendants in this case.

When the call was made in the present case, it created a legal obligation on the part of this defendant to pay the unpaid portion of his subscription, if any, not to the company or any creditor of the company, but to the receiver in charge of the company's affairs, when the call was made.

Messrs. Thomas I. Elliott, H. H. Rouser, and William L. Hodge for appellees.

Boyd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, as a creditor of the Salem Loan & Real Estate Investment Company, a corporation chartered under the laws of the state of Virginia, filed a bill in equity in this case to enforce the payment of subscriptions to the stock of that company alleged to have been made by James A. Templeman and Thomas A. Bryan, who were residents of this state. James A. Templeman having died before the bill was filed his executors and his widow, who was residuary legatee, for life, under his last will and testament, were made parties. The decree below having dismissed the bill of complaint as to them, the appellant took this appeal; and, the decree being in her favor against Thomas A. Bryan, he took an appeal, which will be disposed of in the next succeeding case. The appellant obtained a judgment against the company in the circuit court of Roanoke county, Virginia, and afterwards filed a bill in equity in that court, which resulted in a decree establishing an indebtedness due her by the company, on the judgment, of over $7,000, and which appointed A. B. Pugh receiver, directing him to take charge of all the assets of the company (excepting the real estate, which was sold by a trustee named in a deed of trust, and only realized a few hundred dollars), and to collect the unpaid subscriptions from the resident stockholders who were named, together with the amounts due by each. Shortly afterwards another decree was entered, which confirmed a report of the receiver, which stated that he had collected $1,050 from two resident stockholders, and had paid over to the plaintiff the balance, after deducting costs, and had issued executions against the other resident stockholders, which had been returned "No effects." It was then further decreed that the several nonresident stockholders of the company, as shown by the report of a commissioner previously filed in the case, pay to said A. B. Pugh, receiver, the amounts due by them respectively, as follows: T. A. Bryan, the sum of $3,300; J. A. Settle, the sum of $2,504; and J. A. Templeman, the sum of $1,250,—the two decrees including all the stockholders, and the assessments being for the entire amount of subscriptions unpaid. The decree further provided that "said A. B. Pugh, receiver, is authorized to collect said several sums of money, and to sue for the same in any proper court or courts having jurisdiction of the person or property of the parties owing the same, whether in this state, or any other state, district, or territory of the United States. And said receiver shall report to the court."

The evidence shows that the amounts stated above were still due on stock in the name of Messrs. Templeman and Bryan, but it is denied that J. A. Templeman ever subscribed for the stock. The directors of the company had made several assessments, amounting in all to 50 per cent of the stock, which had been paid; leaving the above amounts still due, as claimed by the appellant. The court below held that J. A. Templeman had not subscribed, or ratified the subscription in his name. From the view we take of the case, it will be unnecessary to discuss that question, as well as some others that were argued. Neither Templeman nor Bryan were served with process in the Virginia court, although they were made parties and proceeded against by an order of publication, and hence there could be no valid decree in personam against them; but in the case of Glenn v. Williams, 60 Md. 93, this court held that a decree of the Virginia court making assessments on stock of a Virginia corporation, held by stockholders who were not parties to the suit, was valid and binding on them, both as to the necessity for the assessment, and the amount thereof. It was there said that, "when the court obtained jurisdiction of the corporation, every stockholder, in his corporate capacity, was a party to the cause, and was supposed to be represented by the president and directors who were intrusted with the management of the corporate interest of all the stockholders;" and again it was said, "The judgment is conclusive, as against the corporation and its property; . . . and upon principle, those who hold its property or funds for the payment of debts ought to be concluded, except where there has been fraud or collusion." That decision has been distinctly approved of by the Supreme Court of the United States in Hawkins v. Glenn, 131 U. S. 330, 33 L. ed. 191, and other cases in this state, as well as elsewhere. Of course, it does not decide that one who is alleged to be a stockholder is precluded by such a decree, in a case to which he was not personally a party, from showing that he was not a stockholder, or that he had actually paid for the stock subscribed for by him; and when the fact is established that he is the owner of stock liable to assessment, which is not paid in full, the assessment made by a court of equity having jurisdiction over the corporation is binding on him. In the absence of authorized assessments by the president and directors, the court has the power to make them; and, until they are made, the stockholders are not called upon to pay. The authority of the president and directors to make assessments is the same in this case as it was in Glenn v. Williams, the statute requiring a payment of $3 upon each share at the time of subscribing, and the residue as required by the president and directors. The appellant, having obtained the decree from the Virginia court, thus establishing the amount to be paid by each stockholder (being the balance of the unpaid subscriptions) filed this bill on behalf of herself and any other creditors of the company who might make themselves parties and contribute to the costs of the suit. In her bill filed in Virginia she alleged that there was no other creditor, and, as the decree of that court directed the money collected to be paid over to her, she apparently satisfied that court that such was the case. It is not contended that there are any creditors residing in this state, and we understand it to have been conceded that the appellant did not reside here. The important question therefore for us to decide is whether the appellant, after obtaining such a decree in the Virginia court as we have referred to, can now sue in her own name to recover the amount of the unpaid subscriptions alleged to be due by Thomas A. Bryan and the estate of J. A. Templeman. The bill alleges that the receiver made demand upon the executors of Templeman and on Bryan for the balance alleged to be due by them respectively, but they refused payment, and that the receiver has taken no further steps to collect them, although it is not alleged that he was unwilling or unable to do so. So far as we are informed (and, indeed, it is so stated in the brief of the appellant), there is no statutory remedy in Virginia, in favor of creditors, directly against stockholders, for unpaid subscriptions. The right of the appellant, therefore, to proceed against them, must depend upon the principle established by courts of equity, that unpaid subscriptions to stock of an insolvent corporation constitute a trust fund for the payment of debts, and that, notwithstanding the company may have failed to make a call or assessment, a court of equity can make its own call for such amount of the unpaid subscriptions as is necessary to pay the debts. The appellant went into the Virginia court, and asked for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of the assets of the company including the unpaid subscriptions to its capital stock, and that the stockholders of the company, "after they shall have been definitely ascertained, and their respective liabilities in the premises determined, may be required to pay to such receiver, or to someone especially appointed by the court for the purpose, so much of their unpaid subscriptions respectively as may be found necessary to pay the plaintiff's said judgment and the costs of this suit." That court granted her prayer, and made the assessments relied on as the basis of this proceeding, but, in doing so, expressly directed that they should be paid to A. B. Pugh, receiver, and authorized him to sue for them. That decree, as we have said, is binding on and conclusive against the stockholders, to the extent of determining the necessity for, and the amount of, the assessment; and, until the assessment was made, there was no unconditional liability on the stockholders who had paid the calls made by the president and directors. But the appellant having obtained a decree in a court of competent jurisdiction, by which the receiver, and not herself, is authorized to collect the amounts due by the stockholders, as fixed by the assessment of the court, her right to sue for them is merged in that decree. Payment to the receiver would have been an absolute bar to her recovery, and he undoubtedly has the privilege of suing in any court which will recognize his authority. The only possible ground that she can now have to sue in another court must be the inability of that receiver, or anyone appointed in his place, if he decline or fail to act, to enforce the collections. In that event she might have some standing in a court of equity. But when her suit is founded on a decree, obtained at her instance, which directs the assessment made to be paid to another person, as an officer or representative of the court, the inability of the latter to proceed should certainly be definitely and clearly established, in order to enable her to maintain the proceeding in her own name. Has that been done in this case?

That the receiver could have instituted suits in the name of the company, for his use, would seem to be clear. While the company is shown to be insolvent, it has not been dissolved so far as the record discloses. If it has not been dissolved, or if it has been, and the Virginia law authorizes suit to be brought by the receiver in the name of the company, there is express authority for such proceeding, in this state, in the case of Lycoming F. Ins. Co. v. Langley, 62 Md. 196. In that case a receiver had been appointed in Pennsylvania, and assessments had been made on a premium now given to the insurance company, by which the defendant promised to pay the amount named "in such portions and at such time or times as the directors of said company, may, agreeably to their act of incorporation, require." One of the assessments was made after the receiver was appointed by the Pennsylvania court, and this court held that the action could be maintained in the name of the company. We can see no distinction in principle between that case and this, so far as the right of the receiver appointed by the court of another state to sue, making the company the legal plaintiff. Many authorities have held that, unless otherwise provided by statute, a receiver must sue in the name of the party over whom he has been appointed if the legal title has not been formally assigned to him; and although in this state a receiver can sue in his own name, if so authorized by the court, he can also sue in the name of the original party. State v. Wilmer, 65 Md. 178; Lycoming F. Ins. Co. v. Langley, 62 Md. 196. But under the circumstances of this case, the receiver was not confined to that method of proceeding. We understand it to be conceded that there are no creditors of this company residing in this state; and, if not conceded, there is no allegation in the bill, or even suggestion in the testimony or other part of the record, that any of the citizens of this state are interested in the distribution of the assets of this company. The courts of this state had not taken jurisdiction over the subject-matter of this suit, or any of the property of the defendant, when this bill was filed. The subscriptions alleged to be due by Templeman and Bryan must be treated as Virginia contracts, as they were to be performed there, and the rights and liabilities of the parties under them are to be determined by the law of that state. Fear v. Bartlett, 81 Md. 446, 83 L. R. A. 721. The Virginia court had jurisdiction over the subject-matter, and has exercised it as far as it could in that state. Under these circumstances, we can see no reason why the receiver should not be permitted to sue here,—not because he, as a matter of right, can demand recognition in this state, but through comity between the states, which should permit the representative of the court of one state to sue in another, when such suit does not injuriously affect the interests of the citizens of the latter, or violate its policy or laws. It is true that as a general rule the functions and powers of a receiver, for the purpose of litigation, are limited to the courts of the state within which he has been appointed, and that he has no extra territorial jurisdiction, and that such rule has been more than once announced by this court. Bartlett v. Wilbur, 53 Md. 485; Lycoming F. Ins. Co. v. Langley, 62 Md. 196; Day v. Postal Teleg. Co. 66 Md. 854. But as it is said in 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 244, in referring to the exception to this general rule, "the authorities supporting this exception are so numerous, and the language of the courts so favorable to its extension, that it seems certain the exception will soon, if it has not already, superseded the general rule." In Bartlett v. Wilbur, 53 Md. 485, and Day v. Postal Teleg. Co. 66 Md. 854, this court recognized the fact that there were exceptions to the general rule; but in those cases the exceptions did not apply, as the exercise of the jurisdiction of the courts of this state had been previously invoked in regard to the same subject-matter. In the case of Hurd v. Elizabeth, 41 N. J. L. 1, the question is very fully and ably considered. The decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Booth v. Clark, 17 How. 322, 15 L. ed. 164, which has been followed by courts adopting the general rule, including our own, is fully recognized by the supreme court of New Jersey, which held that although a receiver could not sue, or otherwise exercise his functions, in a foreign jurisdiction, if such acts would interfere with the policy of the law in the foreign jurisdiction, or be to the detriment of resident creditors, yet, "after completely protecting its own citizens and laws, the dictates of international comity would seem to require that the officer of the foreign tribunal should be acknowledged and aided." To the same effect are the cases of Merchants' Nat. Bank v. McLeod, 38 Ohio St. 174; Gilman v. Ketcham, 84 Wis. 60 (23 L. R. A. 52, where there is an excellent note on the subject); Boulware v. Davis, 90 Ala. 207, 9 L. R. A. 601; Bagby v. Atlantic, M. & O. R. Co. 86 Pa. 291; Metzner v. Bauer, 93 Ind. 427; Pugh v. Hurtt, 53 How. Pr. 22; Patterson v. Lynde, 112 Ill. 196; and other cases cited in 23 L. R. A. 52, and in 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 241-245. It will be seen, from an examination of those cases, that the tendency is to recognize the exception to the general rule, and to apply it when it can properly be done within the lines indicated above; and we are of opinion that the exception is a proper one, and will often promote the ends of justice, without in any way being in conflict with the previous decisions of this court. Of course, we do not mean that the privilege shall be granted to a foreign receiver to sue for all kinds of property; but for a debt of the character of that before us, we can see no reason why he should not be recognized and aided by our courts, under such or similar circumstances as those disclosed by this record, to which we have referred. The appellant has undertaken to meet this by saying that the Virginia receiver was made a party defendant to this bill, and has answered, consenting to a decree. But that will not do. The receiver is an officer of the court which appointed him, and is subject to its orders. He is, by the decree appointing him, expressly required to report to that court. It would seem to be clear.

then, that he has no authority to bind the Virginia court, or right to thus relieve himself of the duty assumed by him. Besides we have said the appellant has no standing in court to institute proceedings of this kind, because her right to proceed individually against the stockholders has been merged in the decree, obtained by her, directing the receiver to collect the very debts she now seeks to collect. She therefore cannot maintain the suit herself, nor can she confer on herself the right to sue the Templemans and Bryan by joining the receiver with them as codefendant. The proper course for her to pursue is to require the receiver to proceed, or, if he refuses to do so, to have another person appointed, who will obey the order of the court appointing him. It will not be out of place to say that, when a receiver appointed by the court of one state desires to sue in a court in another state, it would be a proper practice for him to file a petition, setting forth such facts as we have indicated as sufficient to enable him to do so, in the latter court, asking permission to sue.

As we are of opinion that the bill of complaint must be dismissed on the grounds we have stated, it will not be necessary to discuss the other questions raised. Indeed, as it is intimated in the brief of the appellant that additional evidence can be obtained as to whether J. A. Templeman did subscribe for the stock, and as the evidence does not clearly show whether the notice to creditors was given by his executors before they settled their final account, relied on as a bar in this proceeding, we deem it proper not to pass on those questions, but will, for the reasons we have given, affirm the decree dismissing the bill in this case.

Decree affirmed, with costs to the appellees.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

Carl J. CARLSON, Resp't.,

v.

ST. LOUIS RIVER DAM & IMPROVEMENT COMPANY, Appt.

(.....Minn.....)

1. Several miles above plaintiff's land the defendant corporation built two dams across the Cloquet river and one of its tributaries, each 20 feet high, and thereby restrained and collected large quantities of water of said streams, and, by means of sluices, flood gates, and locks, discharged said water in large volumes into the channel of said Cloquet river below said dams, whereby said river suddenly rose above its usual, natural, and ordinary high-water mark, and thereby overflowed the plaintiff's land, and greatly injured and damaged the same. Held, that this was a taking of the plaintiff's land, within the meaning of Const. art. 1, § 12, which the defendant had no right to do without plaintiff's consent, or without first paying compensation therefor.

2. Conceding, without deciding, that the defendant corporation, under the NOTE.—Right to use stream for floating logs.

The existence of the immense tracts of timber lands on this continent so situated that the only practicable method of getting the timber to market was to use the streams flowing through them has brought into prominence the question of the right to such use.

Such use is so low in the scale of navigation that if the stream is capable only of floatage navigation is likely to cease with the disappearance of the forests, and never to have been claimed where the forests are absent. Consequently the decisions upon the question of the navigability of such streams are limited to sections of the country having large tracts of timber land, and most of the decisions depend upon the particular facts affecting the case in hand, so that the general rules are not entirely uniform.

Stream must be floatable in its natural state.

There seems to be an agreement that to be subject to the public right of floatage the stream must be floatable in its natural state.

power conferred upon it by statute, has the right to build dams across navigable streams for the purpose of aiding in floating logs to market, and to mills during seasons of low water, yet this right is subordinate to that of the riparian owner to have his land free from overflow and damage caused thereby, if such damage is the result of so raising the waters beyond the natural, usual, and ordinary high-water mark.

3. As the defendant has illegally caused the plaintiff's land to be overflowed, and thereby damaged it, and as it threatens and intends to continue so to do, an injunction is a proper remedy.

4. The trial court committed no error in refusing defendant permission to introduce certain evidence, as it was immaterial.

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for St. Louis County denying a motion for new trial after judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injury to plaintiff's land by defendant's booming operations. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

ject to the public right of floatage the stream must be floatable in its natural state.

So, one seeking to justify the running of logs down a stream which resulted in the breaking down of the dam of a riparian owner must show that the stream was navigable. McLaren v. Buck, 26 U. C. P. 530.

Hence the burden of showing that the stream is floatable is on the person seeking to use it as such. Gwaltney v. Scottish Carolina Timber & Land Co. 111 N. C. 547.

In accordance with this doctrine it has been held that the legislature cannot make a stream navigable by declaring it so if it is not so in fact. Olive v. State, 86 Ala. 38, 4 L. R. A. 33; People, Ricks Water Co. v. Elk River Mill & L. Co. 107 Cal. 221; Morgan v. King, 35 N. Y. 459, 91 Am. Dec. 58.

So, a private stream cannot be made public without compensation to the riparian owner. Allison v. Davidson (Tenn. Ch. App.) 30 S. W. 905.

Although in Partridge v. Eaton, 53 N. Y. 422, a

The right of the public to float logs on navigable streams is analogous to the right of the public to use a highway.

Page v. Mille Lacs Lumber Co. 53 Minn. 492; Doucette v. Little Falls Improv. & Nav. Co. (Minn.) 73 N. W. 847.

In this state a stream is navigable in the law, even though the natural capacity is actually, and often must be necessarily, aided by various contrivances.

Merriman v. Bowen, 33 Minn. 455; Minneapolis Mill Co. v. St. Paul Water Comrs. 56 Minn. 485; Red River Roller Mills v. Wright, 30 Minn. 249, 44 Am. Rep. 194; Fieid v. Apple River Log Driving Co. 67 Wis. 569.

stream was declared by the legislature a highway for floatage of logs, and provision made for compensation to riparian owners.

A statute declaring navigable streams which are now or at any time have been used for the purpose of floating logs or timber does not apply to a stream which is insufficient to float single logs except during extreme winter freshets and with the aid of dams to carry the flow of the water. People, Ricks Water Co. v. Elk River Mill & L. Co. 107 Cal. 221.

Although a statute declares a creek to be a public highway for the purpose of floating lumber, logs, and timber, if it is capable of this use only in periodical seasons of high water, it is a public highway only during those seasons. Harold v. Jones, 86 Ala. 274, 3 L. R. A. 406.

So, the general rule is that if artificial aids are necessary to make the timber float the stream will not be regarded as floatable.

The public right of navigation is measured by the capacity of the stream for valuable public use in its natural condition, and any attempt to create capacity at other times at the expense of private interests can be justified only by an assessment and payment of compensation. Witheral v. Muskegon Booming Co. 68 Mich. 48.

A stream is not floatable for the public which will not carry logs without the flood water from a storage dam and the blasting of rocks, cutting of trees on the banks, and the straightening of the channel by cuts, while even after all this thousands of logs are left in the stream on private property after the water has subsided so that they will no longer run. DeCamp v. Thomson, 16 App. Div. 623.

A stream is not navigable for the floatage of logs if logs cannot be run down it in ordinary water and dams have been used to facilitate the progress of the logs whenever it has been used for running them. Smith v. Carlow (Mich.) 72 N. W. 22.

A person cannot be indicted for obstructing a watercourse by building a dam across it if at the time he built the dam the stream was not navigable, although by private enterprise it has since been cleaned out and made so. State v. Hickson, 5 Rich. L. 447.

The doctrine of floatage cannot be extended to include small streams of only a few miles in length, although they rise during a few weeks in the year sufficiently high to be used to a limited extent, by the application of artificial means, to float logs at 41 L. R. A.

A stream is navigable though it may require additional facilities for floating the logs.

Under certain circumstances a person navigating a navigable stream may, as incident, cause damage for which there is no remedy.

It is not every taking, or encroachment upon private property, that amounts to a taking within the constitutional provision which forbids the taking of property for public use without just compensation.

short distance. Haines v. Hall, 17 Or. 165, 3 L. R. A. 609.

The public right of passage does not include any right to meddle with the rocks or soil of the bed of the stream. Pearson v. Rolfe, 76 Me. 380.

The public have no right to use a stream made floatable by improvements put upon it by the riparian owner. Wadsworth v. Smith, 11 Me. 278, 28 Am. Dec. 525.

But in Wisconsin a somewhat more liberal rule in favor of the public has been adopted. In one case it was held that a statute requiring the owner of a milldam to maintain chutes to accommodate such rafts as may navigate the river refers to such as may do so after the improvement of the navigation by the dam, and not in the natural state of the stream. Volk v. Eldred, 23 Wis. 410.

So, the legislature may authorize the construction of flooding dams without making compensation to the owners of mills who are injured by the interruption of the flow of the water. Falls Mfg. Co. v. Oconto River Improv. Co. 87 Wis. 184.

The legislature may authorize the improvement of the navigation of the stream and the taking of tolls for the improved facilities. Tewksbury v. Schulenberg, 41 Wis. 584.

And the fact that the Constitution makes the navigable stream a common highway, forever free, is immaterial. Wisconsin River Improv. Co. v. Manson, 43 Wis. 255, 28 Am. Rep. 542.

The Pennsylvania act of May 21, 1864, gave a corporation the right to improve the floatable navigation of White Deer Creek. White Deer Creek Improv. Co. v. Sassaman, 67 Pa. 415.

If the stream is in fact floatable the state may, for the purpose of developing the use of it, authorize dams and booms where their use will do more good than harm. Pound v. Turck, 95 U. S. 459, 24 L. ed. 525.

What streams are floatable.

There is some disagreement among the decisions upon the question what streams are floatable. Of course there are many streams the condition of which is so obvious that all must agree as to the public right in them.

Thus, a stream which is capable of floating logs in its natural condition is by nature a highway for that purpose. Thompson v. Androscoggin River Improv. Co. 54 N. H. 545.

Buck, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff owns a farm containing 63 acres through which flows the Cloquet river, the waters of which are discharged into the St. Louis river, and thence flow into Lake Superior. The defendant constructed and owns a dam extending across said Cloquet river, 20 feet high, and there constructed sluices, flood gates, and locks on the said dam, 12 feet high, which can be opened and closed by the defendant at will; and, when closed, the water in said river gathers and collects above said dam, and is retained in great quantities. The defendant also built a similar dam, with similar appurtenances, about 10 miles further up said stream, which also gathered said water the same as the other dam. There is a tributary to said Cloquet river called "Boulter Creek," which discharges itself into the Cloquet river above the plaintiff's land. Heretofore the defendant also built across said creek a dam and appurtenances similar to those built by it across Cloquet river, and which collected and retained large quantities of water above said dam. The defendant is a corporation duly created and organized under the laws of this state, for the avowed purpose, as set forth in seasons except in summer is a floatable stream or water highway of the third class, affording a channel for useful commerce. State v. White Oak River Corp. 111 N. C. 661.

A stream which for eight or nine months in the year admits the floating of logs, and upon whose banks are large forests of pine trees, and which was omitted from the government survey, will be held to be navigable for the floatage of logs. Ruckl v. Cone, 25 Fla. 1.

Every stream which in its natural state and its ordinary volume of water is capable of being used for the purpose of commerce, of transportation of the products of the fields, forests, or mines on its banks in a marketable condition, is for the purpose of navigation to be deemed public. Walker v. Allen, 72 Ala. 453.

A river is navigable if it has sufficient depth naturally for valuable floatage of rafts. Stuart v. Clark, 2 Swan, 2, 58 Am. Dec. 49.

A stream which is of sufficient capacity to float the products of the forests through which it flows to market is subject to the right of passage. Browne v. Scofield, 8 Barb. 239.

A public easement for floating logs exists in a stream which is capable of being generally and commonly used for that purpose. Collins v. Howard, 65 N. H. 190.

A stream may be a public highway for floatage when it is capable in its ordinary and natural stage in the seasons of high water of valuable public use. Thunder Bay River Boom Co. v. Speechly, 31 Mich. 336, 18 Am. Rep. 184.

If the stream in its natural condition is capable of floating rafts, logs, etc., and has in fact been used for that purpose, the public has an easement in it. Goodin v. Kentucky Lumber Co. 90 Ky. 623.

If a stream is naturally of sufficient size to float boats or mill logs, the public have a right to its free use for that purpose. But such little streams or rivers as are not floatable, that is, cannot in their natural state be used for the carriage of boats, rafts, or other property, are wholly and absolutely private, not subject to the servitude of the public interest nor to be regarded as public highways by water. Wadsworth v. Smith, 11 Me. 273, 26 Am. Dec. 525.

A stream is subject to an easement for floating logs if for a considerable period of the year its usual and habitual condition is such that the public may rely upon it as a safe and convenient means of transporting the logs which are cut on its banks, and this condition recurs with the season of our 41 L. R. A.

usual rains and continues through it, even though occasionally interrupted by a decline of its waters. On the other hand, even though at irregular and uncertain intervals during the year, regardless of seasons, it is so swollen by rains that it is temporarily useful for purposes of transportation, it is not a navigable or floatable stream in such sense as to entitle the public to an easement over its waters. Smith v. Fonda, 64 Miss. 551.

On the other hand, it has been held that, if the stream is only a brook, although it may carry down saw logs for a few days during a freshet, it is not therefore a highway. Haines v. Welch, 14 Or. 319.

In Morgan v. King, 13 Barb. 234, it is said that a brook, although it may carry down saw logs for a few days during a freshet, is not therefore a public highway. But a stream upon which and its tributaries saw logs to an unlimited amount can be floated every spring for a period for from eight to ten weeks, and for a distance of many miles, and upon which many thousands will be floated for many years to come, is a public stream for that purpose.

So, a stream only a few rods in length, which can be of use to only one person and his successors in title, which is only floatable for a few days in the year, and even then requires to be cleaned out and deepened and to have a channel cut through solid ground a part of the way, is not navigable for floatage of logs. Nutter v. Gallagher, 19 Or. 375.

The courts are very well agreed as to the test of navigability, and that is capacity.

The true test in determining the right of public use in a stream is whether or not it is inherently and in its nature capable of being used for floatage. If it is, an easement in favor of the public exists whether it has been used by the public or not. Moore v. Sanborne, 2 Mich. 519, 59 Am. Dec. 209; Ames v. Port Huron Log Driving & Boom Co. 11 Mich. 143, 33 Am. Dec. 731.

A stream on which logs can be floated to market is navigable, and is a public highway for that purpose. Felger v. Robinson, 3 Or. 455.

The question of the right to float logs on a stream depends upon its capacity for such use. Wiese v. Smith, 3 Or. 445, 3 Am. Rep. 621.

The question of navigability depends upon whether or not the river in its natural state is such that it affords a channel for useful commerce. Carter v. Thurston, 56 N. H. 104, 43 Am. Rep. 584.

But in deciding what capacity is sufficient to make the stream navigable there is conflict, first, as to the quantity that can be floated at once, and its articles of incorporation, of driving logs in the St. Louis river and its tributaries, and to improve said streams for log-driving purposes by clearing and straightening the channel thereof, closing sloughs, erecting sluiceways, booms of all kinds, side rolling, sluicing, and flooding dams, or otherwise for facilitating the running of loose logs and timber down said streams. The plaintiff resides upon said land, and uses the same for agricultural purposes. He brought this action to recover damages caused by the defendant during the years 1895 and 1896 by damming up the waters in said streams, and discharging the same into the stream below, so as to cause the water in the Cloquet river to overflow its banks and flow over plaintiff's land. The action was tried by the court, and it ordered judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of $15 damages, and for a permanent injunction as prayed for in the complaint.

The appellant claims that, under the statutes and decisions of this state, a stream that is used for driving logs with or without the aid, at times, of artificial means, is a navigable stream; that one of the functions of said stream is its use in getting logs to market; that, while the logs may be owned and their traffic conducted by individuals or corporations, the right of navigation is a public right; that the riparian owner on such stream takes his title subject to this public use, and in legal contemplation of the same, the same as the owner of lands adjoining a street or highway; and that if the use is necessary, and exercised with care and caution, the necessary second, as to the duration of the floating capacity.

In regard to the quantity which can be floated at once, it has been held, on one side, that to attribute navigable properties to a stream which can only float a log is carrying the doctrine of navigability entirely too far, and is turning a rule which is intended to protect the public into an instrument of serious detriment to individuals, if not of actual private oppression. American River Water Co. v. Amsden, 6 Cal. 443.

So, capacity to float single logs is not enough to show the stream navigable; there must be capacity to float rafts, flat boats, and small vessels of light draught. Irwin v. Brown (Tenn.) 12 S. W. 840.

On the other side, in Buffalo Pipe Line Co. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 10 Abb. N. C. 107, it is said, by way of illustration, that the capacity to float logs, singly or together, to run rafts, however small, gives to all the public the right to use and navigate the stream.

And that statement represents accurately the results of many decisions holding streams to be floatable.

In regard to the duration of navigable capacity, the cases all agree that it is not necessary that the stream shall be floatable at all seasons of the year. Holden v. Robinson Mfg. Co. 65 Me. 215.

For, if the stream is only floatable at certain seasons of the year, it must be considered subject to public use at such seasons. Thunder Bay River Boom. Co. v. Speechly, 81 Mich. 336, 18 Am. Rep. 184.

So, a river is subject to public use if at the times of high water it is capable of floating logs for such a length of time as will make it useful and profitable to use it as a highway to float logs to mill or market. Gaston v. Mace, 33 W. Va. 14, 5 L. R. A. 392.

To make the stream floatable it must appear that business men may calculate with tolerable regularity as to the seasons the water will rise to, and remain at, such height as will enable them to make it profitable to use it as a highway for transportation of logs. Burke County Comrs. v. Catawba Lumber Co. 115 N. C. 690.

A stream to be public must have sufficient water as the result of natural causes to be capable of valuable floatage periodically during the year, and so continue long enough at each period to make it susceptible of beneficial use to the public. Lewis v. Coffee County, 77 Ala. 190, 54 Am. Rep. 55.

The weight of authority is that streams which are not floatable in the ordinary stage of the water, but only when swollen by heavy rains, and then only for very short periods, are not navigable. Allison v. Davidson (Tenn. Ch. App.) 39 S. W. 906.

A stream is not shown to be a public highway by the fact that at spasmodic and occasional periods in the winter and spring, as the result of freshets, it has capacity of floating logs, if it was not exempted from the government survey and there is nothing to show the existence of a great number of forests on its banks or any number of people engaged in the lumber or rafting business so that it has been or may be utilized as a highway. Payzer v. McMillan Mill Co. 103 Ala. 395.

A stream which is only capable of floating down logs and timber during certain freshets is not a navigable river at common law. Whelan v. McLachlan, 16 U. C. C. P. 112.

A stream is not floatable for logs which is not capable of floating single logs except during season of high water, which is only about two months in the year, when even then they have to be aided in their passage by men in skiffs or on shore, and which has never been used for floating logs except in small quantities, and those were broken and the ends more or less broomed up. Morgan v. King, 35 N. Y. 459, 91 Am. Dec. 53, Reversing 30 Barb. 9.

Merely because a watercourse may, in times of periodical freshets for a few days or weeks, be capable of floating mill logs, the stream cannot be regarded as a highway for that purpose at any time, if in its natural state and during the greater portion of the year it is incapable of such floatage. Hubbard v. Bell, 54 Ill. 110, 5 Am. Rep. 98.

A stream which is found to be capable of floating logs only at high water or during freshets, without more, will not be held to be public. Lewis v. Coffee County, 77 Ala. 190, 54 Am. Rep. 55.

A fresh-water stream is navigable and a public highway when it is susceptible of being used in ordinary condition for a highway of commerce, over which there is valuable floatage. For a season or considerable part of the year it must contain that depth of water which fits it for such transportation. All those streams which have the requisite volume of water only occasionally as the result of freshets and for brief periods are unnavigable. Morrison Bros. v. Coleman, 37 Ala. 655, 5 L. R. A. 384.

In order that a stream may be floatable it must be capable of being used to an extent that would make it of some value as a highway, or at least it must appear that the stream will be used for some portions of the year, and the fact that it could be used for a few days in the rainy season, with the aid of dams, is not sufficient. People, Ricks Water Co., v. Elk River Mill & L. Co. 107 Cal. 221.

In Munson v. Hungerford, 6 Barb. 265, it seems to be assumed that mere capacity to float logs will not render the stream navigable. The court says it is not sufficient that a stream is capable during a period of two to four weeks in a year, when it is swollen by the spring and autumn freshets, of carrying down its rapid course whatever may be thrown upon its angry waters, to be borne at random over every impediment in the shape of dams damage is a burden incident to the location of the land, and is damnum absque injuria; and that, while the land upon which this burden is imposed might be condemned for that purpose, yet the defendant, being a quasi public corporation, is entitled to all the rights to navigate the river which the public possess; and that, though this navigation may impose a temporary and incidental burden, it does not impose any liability. In other words, it claims the legal right to build dams across natural non navigable streams, obstruct the natural flow of their waters, collect them in large quantities, and discharge them, as its necessities require, upon the lands of the riparian owner, in such quantities as to raise the stream to an unnatural and unusual height, and thereby overflow his lands, and destroy his crops and otherwise injure his said property. The court found as a fact in this case that the streams here involved were non-navigable, and that the defendant, by means of its dams and appurtenances so constructed, enabled it to collect and restrain large quantities of waters of said streams, which it vented and discharged into said Cloquet river in unusual and unnatural quantities, whereby it flowed upon plaintiff's land, to his damage. The evidence tends to show that the overflowing of plaintiff's land was not the result of a mere casual trespass, but the natural and necessary effect of the defendant's plan or scheme of improving the navigation of the stream, which will recur whenever these improvements are utilized. This, in our opinion, was a taking of his property, which it had no right to do without com-or bridges which the hand of man has erected. To call such a stream navigable in any sense is a palpable misapplication of the term.

And that case was followed in Curtis v. Keesler, 14 Barb. 611.

The North Carolina decisions at first followed this rule.

A stream which is not capable of floating logs unless there is a freshet is not of public use. Gwaltney v. Scottish Carolina Timber & Land Co., 111 N. C. 647.

If the stream is only floatable in occasional freshets, it is not in law a floatable stream, but if the freshet should rise from the natural rainfall for a sufficient period to make the stream useful to the public, it may be considered as floatable. Gwaltney v. Scottish Carolina Timber & Land Co., 115 N. C. 579.

But in a later case it held that if the stream rises eight or ten times a year high enough to carry logs over the shallows, at irregular intervals, and remains so for from twenty-four to forty-eight hours, it is floatable. Burke County Comrs. v. Catawba Lumber Co., 116 N. C. 781. Overruling the statement to the contrary in 115 N. C. 600.

And that appears to be the Pennsylvania rule.

Creeks and small rivers are private property, but if of sufficient capacity at any stages of the water to be used for transportation of lumber or other goods, they are held subject to that public easement which our English ancestors guarded with great jealousy. Barclay B. & Coal Co. v. Ingham, 86 Pa. 194.

Other tests have sometimes been employed to aid in determining the navigable capacity of the stream. One is that of usage.

In Burroughs v. Whitman, 50 Mich. 279, it is said that in the fifty years during which a certain county had been converted from a wilderness into a garden no one had ever thought of running a log or stick of timber down the stream flowing through it, the navigability of which was in question, and it was further said this is pretty nearly conclusive evidence that the stream has never been susceptible of public use for floatage, either valuable or otherwise.

In Berry v. Carle, 8 Me. 269, it is assumed that to make a stream navigable for timber above where the tide ebbs and flows it is necessary that it should have assumed the character of a navigable stream by long usage.

However, it has been held that in case of a stream navigable throughout the year it is sufficient to show adaptability for the purpose of navigation or valuable floatage at the usual stage of the water, without reference to the past, present, or prospective use of the stream for these purposes. Olive v. State, 86 Ala. 88, 4 L. R. A. 83.

If the right to raft timber down a stream has been 41 L. R. A.

used for twenty-six years, it cannot be disputed by the riparian owner. Shaw v. Crawford, 10 Johns. 236.

If the stream has been used for floating logs for more than twenty years, it must be considered a highway for that purpose. Ford Lumber & Mfg. Co. v. McQueen, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 621.

In Pierpont v. Loveless, 72 N. Y. 216, Reversing 4 Hun, 696, it was held that after the stream had been used for thirty years, and the legislature had declared it a public highway for floating logs, and had made appropriations for improving its navigability, a town cannot allege that the putting of logs into the stream for floatage was unlawful so as to render the one doing so liable for a bridge destroyed by the logs.

A stream which has only been used by a few persons for floating logs, not more than three or four in any year, and then only from three to six days, is not shown to have become public by prescription, although the use continued for thirty years. Meyer v. Phillips, 97 N. Y. 485, 49 Am. Rep. 538.

Another element sometimes mentioned is the amount of timber which would seek an outlet through the stream.

In case of a stream which is suitable for purposes of transportation only during certain periods the inquiry relates to its fitness and the period of its capacity for valuable floatage, the number of individuals interested, and the extent of the public interest involved in its use for transportation, the length of time previously used by the public, and its prospective public use, and whether the bed of the stream was embraced in the government surveys of the territory through which it runs, or was excluded therefrom. Olive v. State, 86 Ala. 88, 4 L. R. A. 83.

A stream which can be used for only 6 or 7 miles, and which has never been used by anyone for floating logs, while there is not sufficient timber on its banks to make it of public use, cannot be held to be public because an individual has some timber on its banks which he wishes to float to market and it is capable of floatage for a short time at periods of freshets. The public must be interested before a stream can become a public highway. Rhodes v. Otis, 33 Ala. 578, 73 Am. Dec. 439.

In a small private stream there is no right to attempt to float logs which have been brought by rail from a distance, since the right to use the stream for floatage is based on its natural surroundings, and rests on convenience, if not necessity. Kooperman v. Blodgett, 70 Mich. 610.

Again, the necessity of going upon the banks to aid in propelling the logs has been made the subject of consideration.

When a stream is inherently and in its nature capable of being used for the purpose of commerce for the floating of rafts or logs, the public easement pensation. It was an invasion or violation of plaintiff's private rights, which he suffered not in common with the public, but as damage solely to his own private property. We may concede without deciding that, under the power conferred by the state upon this defendant corporation, it has the right to build dams across streams not navigable in fact, for the purpose of aiding in floating logs to market and to mills during seasons of low water. He has a right to insist that his land shall not be taken for private purposes at all, and not for public purposes without just compensation. "The state has not the right, without making exists. It is immaterial that it may be necessary for the persons attempting to float logs thereon to use its banks. A distinguishing criterion consists in its fitness to answer the wants of those whose business requires its use. Its perfect adaptation to such use may not exist at all times, although the right to it may continue and be exercised whenever an opportunity occurs. They need not be floatable at their ordinary stage. But if the stream cannot be used without going upon its banks to propel what is floating, such fact would evidence its want of capacity for public use. Brown v. Chadbourne, 81 Me. 9, 60 Am. Dec. 641.

Streams which are so small and shallow that no logs can be driven in them without being propelled by persons traveling on their banks are not navigable in any sense to give the public a right of way in them. Treat v. Lord, 42 Me. 552, 66 Am. Dec. 296.

But the mere fact that it is convenient, and that persons are accustomed to use the banks to aid the floating of their logs, does not show that the stream is not navigable. Olson v. Merrill, 42 Wis. 203.

In some cases the floatability has been assumed without decision.

In Dwinnel v. Barnard, 28 Me. 554, 48 Am. Dec. 507, it was assumed that the public had a right to float logs in a stream for the purpose of determining the public right to use a cut which carried the water of the stream across private property.

In Davis v. Winslow, 51 Me. 264, 289, 81 Am. Dec. 573, it was agreed that the stream was of sufficient size to float logs, and the rights of the parties were adjudged accordingly.

In Scott v. Willson, 3 N. H. 321, it is said that the Connecticut river has been so long used by the public for rafting that it must without question be considered as a public highway.

And that ruling was recognized in Barron v. Davis, 4 N. H. 338.

In other cases the question of floatability has been regarded as a question of fact.

Whether a stream is capable of being used as a passageway for the purpose of commerce is a question of fact for the jury. Treat v. Lord, 42 Me. 552, 66 Am. Dec. 296; New England Trout & S. Club v. Mather, 68 Vt. 338, 38 L. R. A. 569.

But, of course, that must be under competent instructions as to what constitutes floatability.

Necessity.

A way of necessity cannot be claimed down a stream if there are other modes of getting the logs to market. DeCamp v. Thomson, 16 App. Div. 523.

Artificial channel.

An artificial channel made for the purpose of improving the navigation of a stream and of lessening the expense of driving logs therein to all persons choosing or desiring to use it, if left without gates or guards and used by all without objection from the owner, will be held to have been dedicated to the public so that the owner cannot recover for its use. Weatherby v. Meiklejohn, 56 Wis. 76, 41 L. R. A.

compensation, to take or destroy the property of riparian owners in making a watercourse navigable when it is not so by nature, or in appropriating such watercourse to the public use by artificial erections or improvements." Weaver v. Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. 28 Minn. 534; McKenzie v. Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. 29 Minn. 288; Re Minnetonka Lake Improvement and Carpenter v. Hennepin County Comrs. 56 Minn. 513. The rule laid down in Gould on Waters (§ 103) is this: "A corporation which is authorized by statute to construct booms upon a river for the purpose of holding and storing logs, acquires thereby

Construction of statutes.

A statute making a stream navigable for boats and rafts will include logs run singly without being formed into rafts. Dedrick v. Wood, 15 Pa. 9.

The Canadian statute provides that it shall be lawful for all persons to float saw logs down all streams in upper Canada during the spring, summer, and autumn freshets. McLaren v. Buck, 26 U. C. C. P. 539.

The Canadian statute gives no right to float timber on streams which are not floatable in their natural state. Boale v. Dickson, 13 U. C. C. P. 337; Whelan v. McLachlan, 16 U. C. C. P. 162.

Those cases were, however, overruled in McLaren v. Caldwell, 6 Ont. App. Rep. 456, and the court held that all streams which were in fact capable of floating logs were made subject to the public right by the statute, although they had become so by improvements made upon them by their owners.

But that case was in turn reversed, and the authority of Boale v. Dickson restored in McLaren v. Caldwell, 8 Can. S. C. 436.

Finally the privy council reversed the supreme court, and overruled the authority of Boale v. Dickson, and held that the statute is not limited to streams which are capable of floating logs in the natural state, but extends to all streams, including those which had been made floatable by improvements made by riparian owners. Caldwell v. McLaren, L. R. 9 App. Cas. 392. Blackburn says when once it is shown that there is a sufficient body of water above and below the spot where the natural impediment exists, though that natural impediment renders the stream at that spot practically unfloatable, it does not make it cease to be a part of the stream in the ordinary sense of the words.

Manner of use.

The right of the log driver is to use the stream in its natural capacity, and he cannot crowd the stream far beyond such capacity, nor can he hold back the water for the purpose of obtaining a flow to move his logs down the stream. Koopman v. Blodgett, 70 Mich. 610.

A person has a right to drive timber or logs down a public stream without confining them in rafts or clamps and putting competent persons on such rafts or clamps to guide them,—at least so far as such driving does not impinge upon the rights of other persons to navigate the stream in any manner allowed by law. Sullivan v. Jernigan, 21 Fla. 264.

A person having a right to use a river for the purpose of running logs will not be permitted to let them run over a fall in such a manner as to destroy structures erected by the government to preserve the fall, but will be required to guide them into the chute provided for taking them over it. United States v. Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. 8 Fed. Rep. 543.

Floatable streams are public highways.

Rivers capable of floating rafts and lumber to no right to appropriate and use the banks, except by the consent of the owners, or in the exercise of the power of eminent domain. This property cannot be taken for a purely private purpose; and the fact that booming companies and companies for the improvement of the navigation are quasi public corporations, and hold their franchises for a public use, does not give them the privileges of a riparian owner, or enable them, by legislative authority, to devote the river banks to the purposes of their charter, without compensation to the riparian owners. Compensation is also necessary where the banks are flooded by public improvements, or by dams erected for the collection and storage of logs, or by a collection of logs in great numbers." It may be that the construction of the dam, with locks and sluiceways, and the collection of waters, was a right conferred by statute, as well as the right to vent and discharge the same into the channel of the Cloquet river for the purpose of floating logs, and that it only discharged such water in sufficient quantity or volume so that, if kept at or within the usual, natural, and ordinary high-water mark, it would be exercising a legal right; but the evidence shows that it went beyond this, and, in so doing, did not exercise any such right.

market are public highways. Whisler v. Wilkinson, 22 Wis. 572; Sellers v. Union Lumbering Co. 39 Wis. 525; Cohn v. Wausau Boom Co. 47 Wis. 524; Gerrish v. Brown, 51 Me. 256, 81 Am. Dec. 539.

A river, so far as it is navigable for logs, is but a public highway by water, and the right to float is but a right of passage, including only such rights as are incident to the use of the stream for that purpose and necessary to render such use reasonably available. Grand Rapids Booming Co. v. Jarvis, 30 Mich. 308.

Rivers and streams which are of sufficient size and channel that they may be used for the purpose of floating logs are public highways. Spokane Mill Co. v. Post, 50 Fed. Rep. 429. But the court in refusing to compel the entire removal of all obstructions from the stream says the water, as well as the light and air and the rest of nature's bequests, are not for the sole benefit and use of any single individual, corporation, or interest, but for all so far as they can be usefully appropriated.

The use of the Mississippi river as a highway to run logs down to market is a right common to all. United States v. Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. 3 Fed. Rep. 548.

A stream which may be beneficially used by the public for rafting lumber is for that purpose to be deemed a highway. Palmer v. Mulligan, 3 Cal. 315, 2 Am. Dec. 270.

If the stream is floatable the owner of a dam cannot take toll for passing logs through his dam. Witt v. Jelfcoat, 10 Rich. L. 389.

But the mere fact that a stream is capable of floating logs does not make it navigable within the meaning of the Constitution and laws of the United States. Duluth Lumber Co. v. St. Louis Boom & Improv. Co. 17 Fed. Rep. 419.

Correlative rights of log and riparian owners.

On a stream navigable only by floatage it cannot be said that the right of floatage is paramount to the use of the water for machinery. Each right shall be enjoyed with due regard to the existence and protection of the other. Middleton v. Flat River Boom Co. 27 Mich. 533.

The right to obtain water power from a stream for mill purposes, and the right to float logs on the stream, modify each other. Buchanan v. Grand River & G. Log Running Co. 45 Mich. 364.

The rights of the public to run logs in a navigable stream are not subordinate to the rights of riparian owners, but are concurrent, and each must be exercised without unnecessarily interfering with the other, and without negligence. White River Log & Boom Co. v. Nelson, 45 Mich. 578.

The riparian proprietors may change the natural condition of the stream only so far as changes are possible without any infringement of the public right. Connecticut River Lumber Co. v. Olcott Falls Co. 65 N. H. 290, 18 L. R. A. 626.

One wishing to use the stream for floatage has no rights which are paramount to those of the riparian owner, nor has the riparian owner the right to monopolize the stream to the prejudice of the right of floatage. A. C. Conn Co. v. Little Suamico Lumber Mfg. Co. 74 Wis. 652.

But in North Carolina it is held that the public easement of floatage is paramount to that of riparian owners. Burke County Comrs. v. Catawba Lumber Co. 116 N. C. 731.

A millowner is under no obligation to provide a better way over his dam than would be afforded by the natural flow of the stream, and in case there is not water enough in the stream to float the logs in the absence of the dam, he is not bound to furnish a passage. Pearson v. Rolfe, 76 Me. 380.

The owners of dams on floatable streams are required to furnish reasonable facilities for the passage of logs, but need not provide the same facilities as would exist if the dams were not present. They are not required to provide for the passage of large rafts without breaking them up. Foster v. Seaport Spool & Block Co. 79 Me. 508.

A sluice which was sufficient for the passage of logs which would come to it in the natural condition of the stream when the dam was erected need not be enlarged to accommodate logs which come down after the navigability of the river has been improved by the removal of obstructions and erection of storage dams for the accumulation of water. Stratton v. Currier, 81 Me. 497, 3 L. R. A. 809.

The owners of dams erected under the Pennsylvania act of 1893 must provide a chute properly constructed and adapted to the stream and dam, to enable the navigator to pass safely by ordinary care and diligence in running it, and having his raft constructed with the usual skill and care. Newbold v. Mead, 57 Pa. 487.

A bridge may be authorized over a stream which is floatable for logs only $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles above the bridge, and when only one person is interested in the floatage, although the effect will be to cut off all possibility of floating logs on the stream. Peters v. New Orleans, M. & C. R. Co. 56 Ala. 528.

A bridge may be erected over a stream which is navigable for rafts. Spring v. Chase, 2 Dane, Abr. 686.

A statute prohibiting the bridging of navigable rivers will not apply to a stream which, although navigable for rafts, has never been used for such purpose. State v. Gilmanton, 14 N. H. 487.

A dam cannot be placed across a stream which in its natural state is capable of floating logs without authority of the legislature. Knox v. Chaloner, 43 Me. 150, 157.

The owner of a milldam cannot interfere with the right of the public to float logs on the stream. Parks v. Morse, 52 Me. 260; Lancey v. Clifford, 54 Me. 487, 92 Am. Dec. 551.

The public right of floatage on the stream is not such as to prevent the erection of dams, drags, and flumes, which do not prevent a reasonable chance for public passage. Pearson v. Rolfe, 76 Me. 380.

The owner of a mill site cannot maintain a dam so as to interfere with the public use of the river as a stream navigable for rafts and logs. Dwinnel v.

It invaded the plaintiff's legal right by artificial means, and whereby his premises were damaged,—a burden which plaintiff was under no obligation to submit to without compensation.

The defendant does not claim that any attempt was made to condemn plaintiff's land, and we are of the opinion that its rights were restricted to the use of the stream in such case so as not to raise the water above the usual, natural, and ordinary high-water mark.

As the law does not permit the defendant to flow the plaintiff's land in this manner, and as it claims the right, intends and threatens to continue so to do, an injunction is a proper remedy. Morrill v. St. Anthony Falls Water Power Co. 26 Minn. 222, 37 Am. Rep. 899.

As the extended offer to introduce certain evidence, and excluded by the court, was not material, the court in this respect committed no error.

Order affirmed.

Veazie. 44 Me. 167, 69 Am. Dec. 94; Veazie v. Dwinel, 50 Me. 484.

The proper authorities may authorize the erection of dams across streams which are merely floatable. McLaughlin v. Hope Mfg. Co. 108 N. C. 100.

The South Carolina statute prohibits the obstruction of streams which are navigable by rafts of lumber or timber, and it was held, in State v. Culum, 2 Speers, L. 581, to apply to streams which were used for that purpose at the time the obstruction was placed in the stream.

The state may authorize the obstruction of a floatable stream. State v. Elk Island Boom Co. 41 W. Va. 796.

A witness cannot give his opinion as to the possibility of running logs down a stream in its natural state if a dam which had interfered with their running had been removed. Holden v. Robinson Mfg. Co. 65 Me. 215.

In J. S. Keator Lumber Co. v. St. Croix Boom Corp. 72 Wis. 62, it is said that the use of rivers and small streams for the floatage of logs is essential to the continued prosperity of the immense lumber and industrial interests of northern Wisconsin.

The state may forbid the running of logs loose in a stream the effect of which is to injure the property of riparian owners and endanger other persons navigating the stream. Craig v. Kline, 65 Pa. 399, 8 Am. Rep. 636; Wendt v. Craig, 67 Pa. 424.

The New Hampshire statute provides that timber to be floated on the Connecticut river must be rafted, or must be attended, and that any timber found floating without attendance will be liable to forfeiture. Barron v. Davis, 4 N. H. 338.

The Massachusetts statute providing no person shall cause or permit to be driven or floated down the Connecticut river any masts, spars, logs, or other timber, unless the same are formed and bound into rafts and placed under the charge of a sufficient number of persons to govern and manage the same, has been held to be constitutional. Harrigan v. Connecticut River Lumber Co. 120 Mass. 580, 37 Am. Rep. 387.

Conflict with other navigation.

A person running logs in a stream cannot stretch a boom in such a way as to interfere with the steamboat navigation of the stream. Crandell v. Mooney, 23 U. C. C. P. 212.

The mere fact that a stream is more useful for floating logs than for all other businesses combined does not give those using it for that purpose a right to increase its facilities for that purpose, if by so doing they interfere with its use for other purposes. So, booms cannot be constructed, although they greatly facilitate the rafting business, if they interfere with others who have a right to navigate the stream. Cincinnati Cooperage Co. v. Com. 11 Ky. L. Rep. 629.

On a stream where the principal industry consists in cutting, floating, and manufacturing into lumber the forests in its vicinity, and where the river is more valuable for this floatage than for any other navigation, the necessity and convenience of this floatage must be considered in any rules laid down for the public use of the stream. The City of Erie v. Canfield, 27 Mich. 432.

Until Congress takes jurisdiction of a stream the state legislature may make steamboat navigation subordinate to the floating of logs and the erection of piers and booms to facilitate such use of the stream. Heerman v. Beef Slough Mfg., Boom, Log Driving & Transp. Co. 8 Biss. 334.

The legislation by Congress to exclude the authority of the state must be specific so that mere general legislation making the stream navigable, followed by the survey and improvement of the stream, will not justify the court in enjoining the use of the stream under state statutes by a logging company which obstructs the navigation with its booms and dams. United States v. Beef Slough Mfg., Boom, Log Driving & Transp. Co. 8 Biss. 421.

A court of equity will not order the removal of a boom from a stream because it was not authorized by the Secretary of War, if it was constructed under authority of the state legislature before the consent of the Secretary of War was required, and the value of timber which will be floated on the stream is many times greater than the probable value of other products which may be transported upon it, while to make the river available for bringing it to market the maintenance of the boom is necessary. United States v. Bellingham Bay Boom Co. 72 Fed. Rep. 585.

The right to tow rafts in navigable waters was impliedly recognized in The David Morris, Brown, Adm. 274, by adjudging rights of the respective parties upon the hypothesis that the raft was rightly where it was.

And the same is true of Lallande v. The C. D. Jr., Newberry, Adm. 501; The Joggins Raft, 40 Fed. Rep. 533; Seabrook v. Raft of Railroad Cross-Ties, 40 Fed. Rep. 596; The Henry Buck, 38 Fed. Rep. 611; The F. & P. M. No. 2, 36 Fed. Rep. 264; Cartier v. The F. & P. M. No. 2, 33 Fed. Rep. 511; Muntz v. A Raft of Timber, 15 Fed. Rep. 557; United States v. One Raft of Timber, 18 Fed. Rep. 796; McCoord v. The Tiber, 6 Biss. 409.

Where a raft of such shape as to be difficult to handle was floated down a river having a current of 4 miles per hour, and was permitted to crowd so near the shore that a vessel coming up without warning had not sufficient room to pass in safety: so that it drove directly through the raft, scattering its contents and causing a total loss, the owner of the raft was not permitted to recover for the loss because of his negligence. The Athabasca, 47 Fed. Rep. 651.

Conflicting rights of floatage.

If the stream is not of sufficient size to accommodate all wishing to use it, each must so conduct his driving as to give others a reasonable share of the benefit of the stream. Bearce v. Dudley, 8 Me. 410.

One log owner cannot unreasonably interfere with the rights of other persons attempting to use the stream. Page v. Mille Lac Lumber Co. 53 Minn. 492.

Each person undertaking to drive logs in a stream

An application for rehearing having been filed, the following response was handed down on July 11, 1898:

Per Curiam:

The substance of counsel's application for reargument is that we have ignored our former decisions holding that the rights of riparian owners on navigable streams are subject to the public right of navigation, and that any incidental injury which such owners may sustain, by reason of the lawful and reasonable exercise of this public right, is damnum absque injuria. In this, as in their original brief, counsel overlook the extent of, and the limitations upon, this public right of navigation as announced and explained in Re Minnetonka Lake Improvement, 56 Minn. 513, and other cases. The gist of the decision in the present case is not that the defendant was guilty of negligence in doing what it did, but that it had no right to raise the water to the extent it did without paying plaintiff compensation.

Application denied.

does so subject to the common right of other log owners to a like use of the stream. Chesley v. DeGraff, 35 Minn. 415.

The use of a navigable stream is open to everybody equally. No log owner can exclude another from it any longer than may be necessary, if he is first in occupation to float his logs by the natural current. Butterfield v. Gilchrist, 53 Mich. 22.

The mere fact that a boom in the stream is a matter of inconvenience and injury to a person wishing to use the stream for running logs does not of itself show that it is a nuisance. Atty. Gen., Muskegon Boom Co., v. Ewart Booming Co. 34 Mich. 362.

Log-driving companies.

Individuals driving their own logs have the same rights as log-driving companies in streams that are navigable for that purpose. Hall v. Tittabawassee Booming Co. 51 Mich. 377.

But the state may grant to a log-driving company the right to the use of the water of a stream so that individuals on the stream will not be permitted to use any water of the stream for the driving of their own logs which will be needed by the company for driving the logs under its charge. Mullen v. Penobscot Log-Driving Co. 90 Me. 555.

A grant of the advantages of corporate organization to persons engaged in the improvement and use of the water power of a stream for manufacturing purposes does not show that a total or partial discontinuance of the way was intended by the legislature. Connecticut River Lumber Co. v. Olcott Falls Co. 65 N. H. 290, 18 L. R. A. 823.

The right of a person to run logs in a stream is not interfered with by a legislative permission to a boom company to erect a boom which will detain all logs running in the stream, and hold them while logs of other persons are being sorted out. Osborne v. Knife Falls Boom Corp. 32 Minn. 412, 50 Am. Rep. 590.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

George A. DEVLIN

Samuel DALTON et al.

(.....Mass.....)

1. Certiorari will not lie to review the decision of a board of military examiners respecting the competency of a person to be a militia officer, as the proceedings of the board are not judicial.

2. A writ of certiorari does not lie to review a decision of a question of fact upon evidence heard.

(May 21, 1898.)

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County for the opinion of the full bench of a petition for a writ of certiorari to review the action of defendants as board of examiners for volunteer militia finding petitioner disqualified to act as captain of a militia company. Petition dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hesselstine & Hesselstine, for petitioner:

The petitioner cannot be deprived of his right and privilege to the office of captain of the volunteer militia of the commonwealth of Massachusetts without due form of law. No arbitrary acts or unlawful power can remove him from that office.

To remove an officer duly elected, examined, and qualified, there must be some clear, definite, express provision by the legislature, prescribing how and under what circumstances, for what cause, and in what manner he may be tried and removed from his office. The legislature has provided for this by §§ 135, 136, etc., and 150 of said act.

There never has been a system of discipline in the United States by which an officer could be ordered before an examining board, tried upon secret charges, question put to him as to his acts while in the service; no right given to challenge any member of the court, with no right to appear by counsel to know the testimony and witnesses against him; no right to produce evidence, then condemned on a simple report "failed to pass" with no opportunity for review and correction of error, dismissed from the service and disgraced. This is military law and discipline unheard of out of this commonwealth, contrary to all sense of justice,—a violation of the rights of an officer in service.

A writ of certiorari lies to a court of summary as well as inferior jurisdiction.

Haven v. Essex County Comrs. 155 Mass. 467; Merrick v. Arbelia Twp. Board, 41 Mich. 681; People, New York, v. Nichols, 79 N. Y. 582; Stone v. New York, 25 Wend. 157; Starr v. Rochester, 6 Wend. 564.

A court of summary jurisdiction is created and limited by law. The petition demands and Nixon v. Reeves (Minn.) 33 L. R. A. 506, as to authority of captain to imprison a member of his company.

the full record of the court, and in default of a complete record a statement of facts should be made sufficient to enable the court to correct error and injustice done.

Haven v. Essex County Comrs. 155 Mass. 467; Spelling, Extraordinary, Relief, § 2016; Cecil v. Barber, 8 Wis 297; Orcutt v. Cahill 24 N. Y. 578; Blair v. Hamilton, 32 Cal. 49.

A summary court cannot take advantage of its own negligence to sustain a wrong. The board should state in their answer the proceedings, all facts as they occurred before them, and it was error to refuse the motion of the petitioner for the board to amend stating the facts.

Tewksbury v. Middlesex County Comrs. 117 Mass. 555; Sedgwick v. Dawkins, 17 Fla. 555; Wells v. Flowers, 41 Ga. 327; Spelling, Extraordinary Relief, § 2018; Harris, Certiorari, § 547.

Where the record reported, although not complete, is sufficient to show injustice, it is the duty of the judge to revise proceedings.

Phillips v. Parr, 19 Tex. 91.

Whatever is put into the return by way of explanation or otherwise, beside what is ordered to be returned, is put in without warrant, and is not to be regarded.

Bacon, Abr. Certiorari, H., and authorities there cited; Stone v. New York, 25 Wend. 157.

Mr. J. M. Hallowell, for board of examiners:

On a petition for a writ of certiorari, the court cannot examine the evidence given at the trial below, unless it appears upon the record that objection was there taken to its competency.

Cousins v. Cowing, 23 Pick. 208; Stratton v. Com. 10 Met. 217; Farmington River Water Power Co. v. Berkshire County Comrs. 112 Mass. 206.

Nor can the court examine the merits of a case and set aside a verdict as against evidence. Whether the evidence was sufficient to support the finding is a question of fact upon which the judgment of the board is final.

Nightingale, Petitioner, 11 Pick. 168; Cousins v. Cowing, 23 Pick. 215; Stratton v. Com. 10 Met. 217; Farmington River Water Power Co. v. Berkshire County Comrs. 112 Mass. 206.

The proceedings of the board can be quashed only for want of jurisdiction or for manifest error in point of law.

Hayward, Petitioner, 10 Pick. 358.

The composition of the board has been the subject of much thought by the legislature. It is the final body for determining questions of fact. The practical objections are many against inquiring into the grounds of its decisions, especially when officers who are examined and who have complaints against the board always have the remedy open to them of applying to the commander in chief for redress.

Ex parte Dunbar, 14 Mass. 393; Hannum v. Belchertown, 19 Pick. 311; Murdock v. Sumner, 22 Pick. 156; Chadbourne v. Franklin, 5 Gray, 312; Bridgewater v. Plymouth, 97 Mass. 382; Woodward v. Leavitt, 107 Mass. 458, 9 Am. Rep. 49; Warren v. Spencer Water Co. 143 41 L. R. A.

Mass. 155; State v. Newport, 18 R. I. 381; Ex parte Vallandigham, 1 Wall. 243, 17 L. ed. 539.

The board having jurisdiction and the finding being a judicial act, the latter was not void, but was merely voidable, and is valid until reversed.

Parks v. Boston, 8 Pick. 218.

The order of discharge was issued by the commander in chief, and being based upon a valid finding, was therefore itself valid.

The court cannot by certiorari review the action of the commander in chief.

People, Leo, v. Hill, 37 N. Y. S. R. 112, citing Cochran and Shaw's Cases; People, Leo, v. Hill, 126 N. Y. 497.

The petitioner having rested for more than two months, and until after his successor had been chosen and was qualified and commissioned, he is debarred by his laches from bringing this writ.

Simon v. Hoboken, 52 N. J. L. 867; Fractional School Dist. No. 1 v. Joint Bd. of School Inspectors, 27 Mich. 3.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The 4th Amendment to the Constitution provides that "all officers commissioned to command in the militia may be removed from office in such manner as the legislature may by law prescribe." Stat. 1898, chap. 367, § 43, provides that an officer elect shall be commissioned and notified to appear before the examining board provided in § 53. Section 53 provides that "every commissioned officer [with certain exceptions not now material] shall upon being notified as provided in § 42, appear before an examining board, to consist of the permanent commanders of brigades, regiments of infantry, battalions of artillery and cavalry, the naval brigade and corps of cadets. The board shall examine the said officer as to his military, moral, and general qualifications.

. . . If in their opinion such officer is competent, the fact shall be certified to the commander in chief. . . . Any officer who fails to appear before the board of examiners within forty days from the date of his election or appointment, or who fails to pass a satisfactory examination before said board, shall be forthwith discharged by the commander in chief." Section 64 is as follows: "An officer who fails to pass the board of examiners or fails to appear before said board, as provided in § 53 of this act, and any officer who may at any time be ordered before said board of examiners, and who fails to pass, shall be discharged by the commander in chief."

The first portion of § 64 is a repetition of the provision last quoted of § 53, but the latter portion provides for a new examination by the same board at any subsequent time, when so ordered. This provision had its origin in Stat. 1884, chap. 230, § 9, and it was repeated in Stat. 1887, chap. 411, § 64; and it was no doubt intended to meet cases where experience raised a question as to the qualifications of officers who had passed the examination provided for in § 53, shortly after their election. The scope and purpose of the later examination are the same as in the original one, namely, to ascertain as to the officer's military, moral, and general qualifications, and to determine whether, in the opinion of the board of examiners, he is competent for his position. The petitioner, therefore, lawfully might be ordered to appear before the board of examiners for a subsequent examination, although he had passed a satisfactory examination upon his election in 1893.

The petitioner also contends that he was in reality tried before the board of examiners on secret charges which had been filed against him by his colonel, who was a member of the board, and that the board acted virtually as a court, though without having formal charges filed, or allowing him to be represented by counsel, and that, being a court, a writ of certiorari may issue to correct its proceedings. But this is a misconception of the position and doings of that board, which was acting in no sense as a court of inquiry, or court martial, or court of any kind, but only as a board of examiners, to ascertain and determine if the petitioner was competent for his position. Following the usual course of proceedings on a petition for a writ of certiorari, that board has made a return of its doings, by which it appeared that the petitioner was examined by and in the presence of the board as to his military, moral, and general qualifications; that he answered some of the questions put to him, and refused to answer others; that he took no specific objection or exception to any of the questions so put to him; that he failed to pass a satisfactory examination before the board; and that the result of the examination was forwarded by the board through the regular military channels to the commander in chief. A record of the result was made, but the board had no other or further records concerning any order of discharge, or relating to the proceedings in the examination, and no record of the questions asked, answered, or declined to be answered in the examination. It thus appears that the petitioner was personally before the board of examiners, who could form some opinion as to his competency to command a company of infantry from his appearance, manner, mode of speech, and conduct, as well as from a consideration of his answers, taken abstractly. It cannot be expected that we should revise their conclusion, or do anything further than to see if it appear that any error in point of law was committed. People, Leo, v. Hill, 126 N. Y. 497; Simon v. Hoboken, 52 N. J. L. 367. A writ of certiorari does not lie to revise a decision of a question of fact upon evidence heard. Farmington River Water Power Co. v. Berkshire County Comrs. 112 Mass. 206. And especially a court of law is not a proper tribunal to determine the competency of a military officer. We are unable to see that any error in law was committed by the board of examiners in reaching their conclusion. The fact that it did not act as a court disposes of most of the objections urged against its proceedings. An examining board, with a view to ascertain the petitioner's qualifications, might put questions touching any matter which would aid it in its decision, and we have no occasion to consider whether or not he properly declined to answer any questions so put. The grounds of its decision are not stated.

None of the minor objections taken by the petitioner can avail him. Since, in these proceedings, the board of examiners did not act as a court, his petition must fail, because a writ of certiorari is issued only to revise proceedings which are judicial in their nature (Atty. Gen. v. Northampton, 143 Mass. 589), and, in any case, it does not lie to correct formal or technical mistakes, when no substantial injustice is shown to have been done (Haven v. Essex County Comrs. 155 Mass. 467).

The motion for a further return or answer was rightly overruled.

Petition dismissed.

1. The jury may draw such inference as common knowledge will suggest respecting negligence in lying down and going to sleep in a barn upon hay or straw, with a lighted pipe in one's mouth.
2. Lying down to smoke, on hay or straw, in a barn, and going to sleep with a lighted pipe in one's mouth, may be found by the jury to constitute negligence.
3. The owner of a building taking fire from another building which is set on fire through the negligence of another person, without any intervening cause, has a right of action against the person whose negligence started the fire.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Ottawa County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent burning of some of plaintiff's property. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George A. Farr, for plaintiff in error:

There was a legal duty resting upon the defendant to exercise reasonable care in the management of his property so as not to endanger that of the plaintiff.

The question of the defendant's negligence, and whether it was the proximate cause of plaintiff's loss, were questions for the jury.

The facts being undisputed, no evidence being adduced by the defendant, it became a question of law for the court whether defendant was negligent or not, and if so, whether his negligence was the natural, direct, and proximate cause of the loss and damage to plaintiff.

Montgomery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action on the case for the destruction of plaintiff's house, barns, hay, and grain, orchard, and other property by fire claimed to be caused by the negligence of the defendant. The plaintiff and defendant were farmers living on opposite sides of a highway running east and west through the township of Wright in Ottawa county. The proofs tend to show that the defendant had a barn upon his premises on the south side of the highway, and abutting upon it, which upon the 27th day of July, 1894, was filled with straw, hay, and other combustible material. Over the floor on the south side was a scaffold some 6 feet above the floor, with straw and other things upon it. Across the highway were the barns of the plaintiff, some 10 or 12 rods distant. The barns were filled with hay, and some 20 acres of wheat were stacked near it. The barns substantially joined. The dwelling was about 2 rods from the nearest barn. On the 27th day of July, 1894, the weather was very hot and a drought had prevailed for some time. On that day the wind had risen with the sun, and had steadily blown from the direction of the sun, there being in the middle of the day quite a breeze. This had occurred regularly for several days prior to July 27. At about 1 o'clock on the 27th the wind came almost directly from the defendant's barn to those of the plaintiff. After dinner, on the 27th day of July, 1894, and a little before 1 o'clock, the defendant lit his pipe, went into his barn, and lay down on the hay or straw on the scaffold over the floor, smoking. He fell into a doze the pipe fell into the straw, and, igniting it, set fire to the barn. This fire was rapidly communicated to the premises of plaintiff, and his barns, with hay, grain, dwelling house, furniture, orchard, shade trees, fences, and personal property, to the value of nearly $3,000, were destroyed. There was no contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff.

When the plaintiff rested his case, counsel for the defendant moved that the court direct a verdict for the defendant, for the reason that the plaintiff had not by his proofs shown a cause of action. Thereupon the court directed the jury to render a verdict for the defendant for the reason that the negligence of the defendant was not the proximate cause of the injury.

It is argued in this court that there was no evidence that the origin of the fire was the defendant's pipe. The evidence does, however, show that the defendant admitted that he lighted his pipe, and went into the barn, and laid down in the midst of the combustible material, and went to sleep, and that he stated that he supposed that his pipe must have slipped from his mouth while he was asleep. While it is true that this mere expression of opinion would not be conclusive, we think the facts shown were such as to require the submission of the origin of the fire to the jury.

It is also insisted that there was no evidence of negligence. It is said there is no evidence of the danger of going into a barn with a pipe lighted or unlighted; there is no evidence of communicating fire from a lighted tobacco pipe to oat straw; and counsel cites as a parallel case Wood v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 51 Wis. 198, in which the testimony was that a lighted lamp was left burning in a building which took fire, and the court seems to have expressed the opinion that the origin of the fire rested in mere conjecture, although the conclusion of the court apparently rests upon the ground that the leaving of a lighted lamp in a house is not negligent. Without discussing the soundness of that case, we think the distinction between leaving a lighted lamp in a house and lying down to smoke in the presence of straw or other combustibles is obvious, and that it was competent for the jury to draw such inference from the proved facts as common knowledge would suggest.

The meritorious question is, Was the defendant liable for the consequences of the fire spreading from his own building to that of the plaintiff, if the fire in defendant's building be found to have originated in consequence of his negligence? In the absence of an intervening cause, it seems to us clear that the bare fact that the defendant may have suffered a loss of his own property through the same negligent act does not render him any the less liable to the plaintiff for a loss ensuing to him through that neglect. Whatever may have at one time been held under the statute (6 Anne, chap. 31, 41 L. R. A.

§ 6), which provides that no action shall be maintained against any person in whose house or chamber any fire shall accidentally begin, that statute is not applicable here. The subsequent statute (14 Geo. III. chap. 78, § 86), which enlarges the statute of Anne, had received no judicial construction prior to the Revolution. Since then, however, it has been construed in Wilder v. Phippard, 11 Q. B. 347, and it is held not to include fires set or induced by negligence. See also Smith, Lead. Cas. 477; Ray, Negligence Imposed Duties, p. 641; 2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 665; McNally v. Colwell, 91 Mich. 532. Was the defendant's negligence the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff? The question is not different than it would be if the building first fired through the defendant's negligence had belonged to a third person or the plaintiff. The question is whether the owner of a building taking fire from another building, which is set on fire through the negligence of another, has an action against that other for the injury. This question has received consideration by this court. In Hoyt v. Jeffers, 80 Mich. 199, Mr. Justice Christianity, speaking for the court, said: "If such other buildings are satisfactorily shown to have actually burned by the fire of the Sherman House, caused by the negligence of the defendant, and especially if this was, under the circumstances, the natural and probable, as well as the actual, result of the fire so caused, and without any contributory negligence of the plaintiff, I can see no sound principle which can make the defendant's liability turn upon the question whether the buildings thus burned by the fire of the first were 5, 6, or 50 feet, or the one-hundredth part of an inch from it. And though a building thus burned by the fire of the first might be at such a distance that its taking fire from the first might not, a priori, have seemed possible, yet if it be satisfactorily shown that it did in fact thus take fire, without any negligence of the owner, and without the fault of some third party, which could properly be recognized as the proximate cause, and for which he could be held liable, the principle of justice or sound logic, if there be any, is very obscure, which can exempt the party through whose negligence the first building was burned from equal liability for the burning of the second. If it be said that this extent of liability might prove ruinous to the party through whose negligence the buildings were burned, it may be said, in reply, that, under such circumstances, it is better, and more in accordance with the relative rights of others, that he should be ruined by his negligence than that he should be allowed to ruin others who are innocent of all negligence or wrong." See also Cooley, Torts, p. 701; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Salmon, 39 N. J. L. 299, 33 Am. Rep. 214; Perley v. Eastern R. Co. 98 Mass. 414, 96 Am. Dec. 645; Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 24 L. ed. 256.

Was the wind an intervening cause? The evidence tends to show that it was an existing condition at the very time the negligent act occurred, and did not constitute an intervening efficient cause. The fact that the consequences of the defendant's negligent act were more serious than would have followed under other more favorable conditions of the atmosphere does not relieve the defendant. Hoyt v. Jeffers, 30 Mich. 199; 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 80; Fent v. Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. 59 Ill. 349, 14 Am. Rep. 13; Perley v. Eastern R. Co. 98 Mass. 414, 98 Am. Dec. 645.

It was a question for the jury as to whether the consequences of the defendant's negligent act ought to have been foreseen, and this is but another statement of the proposition that negligence is the absence of such care as persons of ordinary prudence are expected to exercise under like circumstances. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 24 L. ed. 256; Ross v. Ionia Twp. 104 Mich. 320.

MOBILE & OHIO RAILROAD COMPANY.

(.....Miss.....)

The blindness of a person does not justify his rejection as a passenger of a railroad when unaccompanied by some other person, unless he is otherwise incompetent to travel alone.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Clarke County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for refusal to sell plaintiff a ticket over defendant's road. Reversed.

Plaintiff was blind. He attempted to purchase a ticket to travel on defendant's road which defendant refused to sell to him. Defendant as a special plea to the declaration set up a rule to the effect that no sick, insane, imbecile, cripple, invalid, or blind person would be received by conductors, or sold tickets by agents, for transportation, unless accompanied by some person specially charged with their care and comfort while traveling.

Further facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Buckley & Halsell and D. W. Heidelberg for appellant.

Mr. J. A. P. Campbell for appellee.

Whitfield, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The demurrer to the special plea should have been sustained. The former opinion of this court settled this. The blind man in this case

NOTE.—For report of former appeal in this case, see Zachery v. Mobile & O. R. Co. (Miss.) 36 L. R. A. 346.

"had at the times referred to in the declaration when he applied for tickets and permission to travel on defendant's cars, as much skill and ability to travel without help or attendance as any blind man could have." The declaration avers that, though blind, he was otherwise qualified to travel on the railroad cars, and in fact had traveled for several years constantly on appellee's railroad, without objection. The demurrer to this declaration was overruled and the present demurrer to the special plea presents the same objections, and, of course should have been sustained. It is not every sick or crippled or infirm person whom a railroad regulation can exclude, but one so sick or so crippled or so infirm as not to be able to travel without aid. And so it is not every blind person, but one who, though blind, is otherwise incompetent to travel alone on the cars; otherwise we would have been compelled to hold that one suffering from sickness, no matter how slight, or one who had lost an arm or leg, or one, no matter how active physically, and no matter how expert a traveler, if merely blind, could be shut out by such a rule. And this ought not to be, and cannot be sound law. We are asked to hold that a regulation that no blind person whatever, no matter how skillful or expert a traveler he may have been, or may be, and no matter how perfectly qualified in every other respect, may travel on cars unaccompanied, is a reasonable rule. This cannot be sound. Each case must depend on its own facts, and the reasonableness of the refusal to sell the blind person a ticket must, on principle, depend, not on a universal, arbitrary, and indiscriminating rule like this one, but on the capacity to travel unaccompanied of the particular blind person, as shown by the proof on that point in his case.

Judgment reversed, demurrer to special plea sustained, and remanded.

1. The right of the mother of an unmar-

3. The amount in dispute for the purpose of determining jurisdiction on appeal is that claimed in the petition where a nonsuit is granted, although the sum allowed by the jury on a former trial was much smaller, and the action is for killing a minor whose earnings at the rate received at the time of his death would not have amounted to the sum claimed before his maturity.

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jackson County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's minor son. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Beebe & Watson, for appellant:

The petition states a cause of action under §§ 4426 and 4427, Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889, and it was not necessary to allege or prove that deceased at the time of his death was the servant of plaintiff.

Buel v. St. Louis Transfer Co. 45 Mo. 564; Owen v. Brockschmidt, 54 Mo. 285; Philpott v. Missouri P. R. Co. 85 Mo. 184; Parsons v. Missouri P. R. Co. 94 Mo. 286; Tobin v. Missouri P. R. Co. (Mo.) 18 S. W. 997; Habel v. Union Depot R. Co. 140 Mo. 159.

This is an action based on §§ 4426 and 4427, supra, and not a common-law action for loss of services.

See authorities supra; Barker v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 91 Mo. 91; Tobin v. Missouri P. R. Co. (Mo.) 18 S. W. 997, and cases cited; 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 846, and cases cited.

A cause of action was given under this statute which did not exist at common law. The right of recovery in such an action is not predicated on the relation of master and servant, but upon the relation of parent and child, for if a parent emancipates his child the child will be entitled to its own earnings.

Ream v. Watkins, 27 Mo. 519, 72 Am. Dec. 288; Philpott v. Missouri P. R. Co. 85 Mo. 184.

If emancipated, the relation of master and servant does not exist, yet the parent can recover under this statute, because the right to recover is not made to depend upon services which the deceased could have rendered to the parent.

In an action under this statute this court has repeatedly held that, "there being thus no general right of recovery open to all persons representing the estate of the deceased or interested in his life, only such persons can recover in such time and in such manner as is set forth in the statute."

Cooter v. Moore, 81 Mo. 576; Barker v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 91 Mo. 94.

The fact that plaintiff had remarried did not change the relation of parent and child.

If remarriage by the wife destroyed a right to maintain an action under this statute, as sole survivor, for the death of her minor child, then a priori it would destroy the right of action in the husband had he survived and remarried. But this is not so.

Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Garr, 57 Ga. 277, 24 Am. Rep. 492; Buel v. St. Louis Transfer 41 L. R. A.

Co. 45 Mo. 564; Davis v. Guarnieri, 45 Ohio St. 470; International & G. N. R. Co. v. Kuehn, 70 Tex. 587.

Mr. Benjamin T. Hardin for respondent.

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action for $5,000 damages for death of a minor son of plaintiff. Thomas Donlin, an unmarried minor, thirteen years old, was the son of plaintiff by her former marriage. After her second marriage, the stepfather supported the minor. His mother permitted him to work for defendant, and he turned over his wages to his mother, who used them to buy clothing for him. The death is alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant in not providing proper appliances and safeguards in its factory to prevent injury to the employee, who was required to work close to, but not with or on, the defective appliances. The plaintiff obtained judgment for $900. The defendant appealed to the Kansas City court of appeals, where the judgment was reversed, and the cause remanded. Hennecy v. Bavarian Brewing Co. 63 Mo. App. 111. The case was tried anew in the circuit court upon exactly the same pleadings and evidence on plaintiff's part as it was on the first trial. Pursuant to the opinion of Kansas City court of appeals, the circuit court sustained a demurrer to the evidence, and entered judgment for defendant. Plaintiff then appealed to this court.

1. The Kansas City court of appeals based its decision upon two grounds: (1) That the petition did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that it did not allege a loss of services to the plaintiff by the death of her son; and (2) that the evidence does not establish such a loss. The first conclusion is predicated upon the idea that "the right to recover for loss of service is founded on the relation of master and servant, and not on that of parent and child" (63 Mo. App., loc. cit. 116), and that, upon the death of the child's father, the mother was obliged to support him during minority, and hence was entitled to his services during her widowhood, but that, upon her remarriage, the "stepfather would stand in the place of the natural parent, and the reciprocal rights, obligations, and duties of parent and child attach" if the stepfather "admitted the child into his family, and treated him as a member thereof, and thereby assumed the relation of parent." The second conclusion rests upon the facts deduced from the evidence that the stepfather did admit the child into his family, treated him as a member thereof, and assumed the relation of parent to him, and that the relation of master and servant between the mother and child ended as soon as the stepfather so acted, and that, as the mother was no longer obligated to support the child, she was not entitled to his services, and, not being entitled to his services, she lost nothing by his death, but that notwithstanding the stepfather was in this case obliged to support the child, and therefore was entitled to his earnings, he could not maintain an action of this character, because neither under the statute of this state nor at common law could a stepfather maintain an action for the death of a minor caused by the wrongful act of another. Bluntly, but logically, stated, this reasoning asserts the startling proposition that if a widow with a minor child remarries, and the stepfather admits her child into his family as a member of it, and assumes the relation of father to him, and if a third party wrongfully kills the child, there is no civil liability to anyone therefor,—not to the mother, because her rights were cut out by her second marriage and the assumption by the stepfather of the natural father's place towards the child; and not to the stepfather, because neither the common law nor the statute gives a stepfather a right to maintain such an action. The error that underlies such conclusions arises from confusing the common-law obligation of the parent, natural or standing in loco parentis, to the child, to support it during minority, carrying with the obligation the correlative right to the earnings of the child, with the right, conferred by statute, upon the father (natural) and mother, or the survivor of them, to maintain an action against a third party for the wrongful killing of their child. The case of St. Ferdinand Loretto Academy v. Bobb, 52 Mo. 357, is a fair illustration of all the cases cited by the Kansas City court of appeals in support of the first conclusion. That case was an action by a third person against a stepfather, who stood in loco parentis, for necessities furnished the child. The legal proposition announced in the case is that, when a stepfather so acts towards a stepchild, "the presumption in such case is, that they deal with each other as parent and child, not as master and servant. This relation being established, the reciprocal rights, duties, and obligations pertaining to it arise between them, the same as if he were their natural father." Id. loc. cit. 361. While at common law, and in states like ours, where the common law has been adopted, this correlative duty and right exists between a stepfather and a stepchild, it rests, not upon contract, as in case of master and servant, but upon the relation of parent and child. It continues only during the minority of the child. At common law, neither the natural father, nor the stepfather standing in loco parentis, could maintain a civil action for the wrongful killing of the child, because at common law such actions were unknown. The principle of the common law was, "Actio personam moritur cum persona." Hence cases which decide the relative duties and rights of parent and child with respect to suits for necessities furnished by third persons to the child, or for wages earned by the labor of the child, have no possible application to cases like this. Likewise, cases which hold that, after the remarriage of the widow and the assumption by the stepfather of the obligations of a natural father to his stepchild, the mother is released from liability for necessities furnished the child, and loses the right she had during widowhood to recover against third persons for services performed by the child, are of no value in determining the question here involved. They rest upon entirely different principles, and involve rights arising out of the relation of parent and child, and not questions of tort.

The fact that in some cases it has been held that the measure of damages in cases of this kind, arising under a statute like ours is the loss of services of the child, during minority, minus the expense of maintenance, plus the expense of medical attendance during the child's last illness and of the funeral, does not establish the right to maintain this character of action, nor determine the person on whom that right is conferred by the statute. And it is proper here to say that the damages here allowed are both compensatory and penal, and that in Parsons v. Missouri P. R. Co. 94 Mo. loc. cit. 294 et seq., this court speaking through Brace, J., construed the meaning of our statute fixing the measure of damages, and said: "The law allows the parent of such minor substantial damages, and they may be measured by the experience and judgment of the jury," etc. In cases like this, under the statute, the father and mother do not recover the value of services rendered by their child, as the father or stepfather does, as a corollary to the obligation to support in cases arising ex contractu or in assumpsit; but they recover, in tort, on the right which the child would have had if he had survived the injury, and which right died with the injured party at common law, but has been by our statute expressly transmitted to them, eo nomine. No new right of action is given by our statute. It is solely a preserved, transmitted right. Proc'or v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 64 Mo. 112; White v. Mazey, 64 Mo. 552; Elliott v. St. Louis & I. M. R. Co. 67 Mo. 272; Gray v. McDonald, 104 Mo. loc. cit. 311; Miller v. Missouri P. R. Co. 109 Mo. 850. By the common law, no such right of action was transmitted to anyone. The stepfather therefore had no such right, notwithstanding his right to recover for services performed by the child when he stood in loco parentis to it. Our statute, upon which the right alone rests, and by which it has been transmitted from the child, vests it expressly in the father and mother, eo nomine (who must join in the suit, and each have an equal interest in the judgment), or, if either of them be dead, then to the survivor. The fact that the mother is given an equal interest with the father marks the difference between actions of this character and suits for the recovery of the wages of the child, which can only be recovered by the father or stepfather standing in loco parentis, and demonstrates the impropriety of attempting to solve questions of this character by reference to cases which involved necessities furnished to or wages earned by the child.

The fact that the statute intended to transmit the rights of the deceased child to the father and mother, and that the relation between them as husband and wife does not affect their rights as parents, and the dissolution of the marital relations between them does not dispense with the necessity for joining both in the litigation, and that neither can maintain the action alone, and that the remarriage of the wife after the dissolution of her former marital relations makes no difference as to her rights as the mother of the deceased, is aptly illustrated by the history of the cases of Buel v. St. Louis Transfer Co. 45 Mo. 562, and Crockett v. St. Louis Transfer Co. 52 Mo. 457. The child of Ruth and Samuel F. Buel was killed by the alleged negligence of the defendant. The father and mother were divorced persons. The father refused to join the mother in the suit, so she instituted it as sole plaintiff and joined the husband as a codefendant. After the expiration of the year from the time the accident occurred, the petition was amended so as to make the father a coplaintiff instead of a codefendant. Speaking of the divorce, this court said: "There is no force in the objection that Mr. and Mrs. Buel, the plaintiffs, had been divorced prior to the accrument of the cause of action sued on. They do not sue as husband and wife, but simply as parents. The divorce did not affect the fact of parentage. The statute does not give the action to the husband and wife, as such, but to the father and mother, as the parents of the deceased minor. The circumstance of the divorce explains the fact that the suit was originally commenced by Mrs. Buel as a feme sole." 45 Mo. loc. cit. 564. And, as to the right being in the father and mother, the court held that the action could not be sustained by one without joining the other. Id. loc. cit. 563. Before the case was retried in the circuit court, Mrs. Buel married John Crockett, and he was made a party plaintiff. Thus, there were Mrs. Buel-Crockett and her former husband, Buel, and her then husband, Crockett, parties plaintiff, and the court held they were all necessary parties.—Mr. Buel as father, and Mrs. Buel-Crockett as mother of their deceased child, and Mr. Crockett as the then husband of the mother. Crockett v. St. Louis Transfer Co. 52 Mo. 457. In this case Crockett was never the stepfather of the child, as he married the child's mother after the death of the child, and was joined as plaintiff because the statute then required the husband to be joined with the wife. But it is direct authority upon the construction to be placed upon the statute as to who are proper parties in a proceeding under the statute, and for holding that the mother's right to maintain an action of this character is vested in her because of her relation of mother to the deceased, and that such right is personal to her, and is not affected by a divorce from her former husband or by her remarriage. In this case the father was dead, and the mother as survivor alone had a right to maintain this action. Her second husband was not the father of the deceased, and hence has no right to maintain the action; and her marriage a second time did not sever her relation of mother to her son, nor take away from her the right which the statute transmitted to her as mother to recover damages which her son might have recovered if he had survived the injury. The judgment of the Kansas City court of appeals was therefore erroneous on both propositions decided by it, and, as the circuit court on the trial de novo followed that decision, its judgment is likewise erroneous.

3. The contention that the decision of the Kansas City court of appeals is res judicata and binding upon this court is untenable. The cases cited by the learned counsel for respondent apply only where the second appeal is taken to the same court that formerly decided the case. This court has not decided this case before, and the decision of the Kansas City court of appeals is not binding on this court.

8. The amount in dispute in this case is the amount claimed in the petition, which is $5,000 (State v. Gill, 107 Mo. 45; State, Hartley, v. Rombauer, 180 Mo. 388, and this brings this case within the appellate jurisdiction of this court. The fact that on the first trial the plaintiff recovered judgment for $900 fixed that sum thereafter as the amount in dispute, and made the case properly appealable to the Kansas City court of appeals, because, if that judgment stood, it was all the plaintiff could recover or the defendant could be made to pay. But, when that judgment was reversed by the Kansas City court of appeals, the amount in dispute immediately became, as it originally was before any judgment was rendered, $5,000. It is argued, however, that the evidence shows that deceased was only receiving $4 per week, and that at this rate he would have earned less than $2,500 before he attained his majority, not making any deductions for his maintenance, and hence that in no event could a judgment ever be rendered which would make the case properly one within the appellate jurisdiction of this court. This argument is based upon the erroneous premise that the son would never during his minority earn more than he was able to at the age of thirteen or fourteen years. Instances are not infrequent in our day and generation when youths who started on small wages worked their way to good paying positions in life, even before attaining their majority. And this possibility is confined to no one favored class. It is open to everyone, without regard to the station in life in which he was born. We cannot judicially declare how much any given minor would earn between the ages of fourteen and twenty-one. That is a question to be decided by the facts in each case. The only safe rule is to regard the amount claimed in the petition as the amount in dispute, until the claim has been merged into a judgment. Vineyard v. Lynch, 86 Mo. 684.

As the action of the circuit court was predicated solely upon the decision of the Kansas City court of appeals, and as the merits of the case have not been discussed by counsel, and no point has been made as to whether the plaintiff made out a prima facie case on the facts, we express no opinion thereon; but, for the error in taking the case from the jury for the legal reasons assigned, we reverse the judgment of the Circuit Court, and remand the cause for further proceedings by that court.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT.

Frank GAGNON

v.

Joseph DANA et al.

(.....N. H.)

1. A gratuitous lender of brackets for use in a staging is not liable for an injury to a servant of the borrower caused by a defect in the brackets of which the lender did not know, even though he should have known of it.
2. The fact that there was no competent evidence to sustain a verdict for plaintiff when a motion for a nonsuit was made at the close of plaintiff's evidence is immaterial, where defendant introduces evidence which supplies the deficiency.
3. An instruction that the relation of master and servant did not exist between plaintiff and defendant at the time of an injury to the former should be given in an action based upon such relation where such relation did not in fact exist at the time of the accident, although it had previously existed and the servant was temporarily loaned for a particular service, while the accident is alleged to have happened because of defects in brackets gratuitously loaned by defendant to plaintiff's employer at the time for use in a staging.

EXCEPTIONS by defendants to rulings of the trial court for Hillsborough County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence which resulted in a verdict in plaintiff's favor. Verdict set aside.

Mr. Bradley was engaged in making some repairs to a building. Dana & Provost were carpenters and building contractors employing plaintiff, who was by trade a carpenter. Bradley applied to Dana & Provost for men, offering them a slight advance over their regular wages to work for him. Plaintiff, among others, was sent to work for Bradley. Bradley also obtained from Dana & Provost certain wall brackets for constructing a staging upon the building. For the use of these brackets no compensation was charged. While upon a staging constructed by the use of one of these brackets plaintiff was precipitated to the ground and injured by reason of a defect in the bracket. The court instructed the jury that if they found the facts to be as stated then Dana & Provost could not be liable for plaintiff's injury unless they knew or ought to have known that the brackets furnished were unsafe and unsuitable for use on the building.

Further facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. F. M. Topliff, D. A. Taggart, and R. E. Walker for defendants.

Messrs. Burnham, Brown, & Warren and Isaac W. Smith, for plaintiff:

If you find the facts to be as stated, then Dana & Provost cannot be liable for Gagnon's injury unless they knew or ought to have known that the brackets furnished were unsafe and unsuitable for use on the buildings.

When the question is raised by exceptions the only inquiry is whether there is any evidence proper to submit to the jury as having a tendency to support the legal propositions which charge the defendants with liability.

Ford v. Fitchburg R. Co. 110 Mass. 240, 14 Am. Rep. 598.

It was not necessary for the plaintiff to introduce affirmative evidence of the exercise of due care.

A man who delivers an article, which he knows to be dangerous or noxious, to another person, without notice of its nature and qualities, is liable for any injury which may reasonably be contemplated as likely to result, and which does in fact result, therefrom, to that person or any other, who is not himself in fault.

Wellington v. Downer Kerosene Oil Co. 104 Mass. 64; Farrant v. Barnes, 11 C. B. N. S. 553; George v. Skittington, L. R. 5 Exch. 1; Thomas v. Winchester, 6 N. Y. 897, 57 Am. Dec. 455; Brass v. Maitland, 6 El. & Bl. 470; 1 Addison, Torts, § 654.

If the defendants had sold these brackets to Bradley, or to the plaintiff, or had loaned them for hire, knowing the use that would be made of them, and knowing their unsuitableness, there would be no doubt that they would have been liable to the plaintiff. What difference can it make that they were loaned without hire, the defendants knowing that they were unsuitable.

Townsend v. Wathen, 9 East, 277; Carter v. Towne, 98 Mass. 567, 96 Am. Dec. 682; Higgins v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 8 Misc. 433; Thomas, Neg. p. 352; Addison, Torts, §§ 596, 1206.

It is difficult to distinguish the present case (the defendants knowing, as the jury have found, that the brackets were unsuitable, and knowing the use to which they were to be put), from Dixon v. Bell, 5 Maule & S. 198, where an injury having been received from a loaded gun, the owner was held liable for leaving a dangerous instrument in a state capable of doing mischief, although the mischief was caused by a girl taking it up, pointing it at a child and snapping the trigger after the priming had been withdrawn.

The lender is bound to give notice to the borrower of the defects of the thing loaned; and if he does not, and conceals them, and an injury occurs to the borrower thereby, the lender is responsible.

The lender owes a duty to the borrower to disclose defects in the things lent.

Story, Bailm. 9th ed. § 275, note; Broom, Legal Maxims, p. 392; MacCarthy v. Young, 6 Hurlst. & N. 829.

Blodgett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The brackets having been loaned by the defendants for the use of the borrower, without any reward or compensation to be received by them from him, their only duty in respect of defects was to inform him of any of which they were aware, and which might make the use of the loan perilous to him or to his servants, one of whom was the plaintiff. "The ground of this obligation is that, when a person lends, he ought to confer a benefit, and not to do a mischief." Shirley, Lead. Cas. 43, 44, and authorities generally. But the obligation of a mere lender goes no further than this, and he cannot, therefore, be made liable for not communicating anything which he did not in fact know, whether he ought to have known it or not. McCarthy v. Young, 6 Hurlst. & N. 329; Blakemore v. Bristol & E. R. Co. 8 El. & Bl. 1035, 1050, 1051; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 8d ed. § 197, note; 2 Parsons, Contr. 5th ed. 109; 1 Addison, Contr. 361; 2 Wait, Act. & Def. p. 268; Schouler, Bailm. § 79; Story, Bailm. § 275. Resting upon such authority, and being so consonant to reason and justice that it cannot but be the law, the rule thus enunciated necessarily renders erroneous the reiterated instruction to the jury that the defendants might be liable for the plaintiff's injury "if they knew, or ought to have known, that the brackets furnished were unsafe and unsuitable for use on the building." While a gratuitous lender "must be taken to lend for the purpose of a beneficial use by the borrower," and is rightfully "responsible for defects in the chattel, with reference to the use for which he knows the loan is accepted, of which he is aware, and owing to which directly the borrower is injured" (Blakemore v. Bristol & E. R. Co. 8 El. & Bl. 1035, 1050, 1051, per Coleridge, J.), it would be the greatest injustice as well as extending the law beyond any recognized principle, to subject him to liability for defects of which he is not aware; and especially in a case like this, where the defect complained of was apparently as open to ascertainment by the plaintiff as it could possibly have been to the defendants. The instruction that "it is not material whether anything was paid for the use of the brackets, or not," was no less erroneous upon the question of the defendant's liability. While in many respects the duties and liabilities of the parties are materially different in the case of a gratuitous bailment and one for hire, it is enough for the present purpose to observe that while in the former the benefit is exclusively to the bailee, and therefore the liability of the bailor for defects in the thing loaned extends only to those which are known to him and not communicated to the bailee, in the latter, the bailment being for the mutual benefit of both alike, the bailor's obligation is and of right ought to be, correspondingly enlarged; and it is therefore his duty to deliver the thing hired in a proper condition to be used as contemplated by the parties, and for failure to do so he is justly liable for the damage directly resulting to the bailee or his servants from its unsafe condition. This distinction is fundamental, and of universal recognition. The relation of master and servant not existing between the plaintiff and the defendants at the time of his injury, their request to have the jury specifically so instructed should have been granted. The duties and obligations of a master to his servant in respect of tools and appliances for performing the labor for which he is engaged differ widely from those of a gratuitous lender to the borrower, and a radically different rule obtains in the one case than in the other. The defendants' additional requests, making actual knowledge of the defect the test of their liability, should have been given not only because the law is so, but because under the instructions which were given, the jury might well have found that the defendants did not know of the defect, and still have found them chargeable with it, on the ground that they ought to have known it. In view of the errors to which attention has been called, it is deemed unnecessary to go further, and specifically consider other exceptions relating to the instructions given and refused; but we think it should be added that, owing to the misapprehension by the court of the obligations of the defendants to the plaintiff and of the legal relation between them, the instructions generally were not such as the case required.

The defendants can take nothing by their exceptions to the denial of their motions for a nonsuit, and to direct a verdict in their favor. If at the time the plaintiff rested, he had not adduced competent evidence to sustain a verdict in his favor (as to which no intelligent opinion can be expressed without additional facts), it is now immaterial, because the defendants, instead of resting their case upon their exception to the denial of their motion for a nonsuit, went on with the trial and introduced their evidence, and the deficiency, if any, of the plaintiff's evidence, was supplied by one side or the other before the case went to the jury, inasmuch as it is found that at some stage of the trial there was testimony from numerous witnesses to and against the defendants' knowledge of the bracket's defective and unsound condition, so that when all the proof was in the case, there was no ground of exception for the reason of its insufficiency to sustain a verdict for the plaintiff; and this being so it is wholly indifferent by which party the proof was introduced. Fletcher v. Thompson, 55 N. H. 308, 309, and authorities cited; Oakes v. Thornton, 28 N. H. 44, 47, per Woods, J. And this testimony also rendered the renewal of the motion at the close of the evidence unreasonable (Brown v. Massachusetts Mut. L. Ins. Co. 59 N. H. 298, 307, 47 Am. Rep. 205) and precluded the granting of the motion to direct a verdict for the defendants (Shepardson v. Perkins, 58 N. H. 355). The result is that the defendants' exceptions on this branch of the case are overruled, and their other exceptions, hereinbefore considered, sustained.

Verdict set aside.

Clark, J., did not sit. The others concurred.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Charles I. BERG, Resp't.,

v.

Henry PARSONS, Appt.

(156 N. Y. 109.)

1. The negligence of a contractor or his employee in blasting rock on a vacant city lot, causing damage to a building upon an adjoining lot, does not make the proprietor who hires the contractor responsible for the damage.

2. The negligence of an independent contractor or his employee in blasting out a ledge of rock which extends close up to the wall of a building on an adjoining property is not chargeable to his employer, who engaged him to excavate the lot preparatory to building thereon.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the general term of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of the New York County Circuit in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent injury of plaintiff's property by blasting on property belonging to defendant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Alexander Thain, for appellant:

There was no proof of want of care on the part of defendant.

Where in making an excavation upon his own lands, for lawful purposes, a person is obliged to resort to blasting, the fact that the use of such means caused injury to a building on adjoining land does not alone render him liable. It must also appear that he failed to exercise due care.

Booth v. Rome, W. & O. T. R. Co. 140 N. Y. 267, 24 L. R. A. 105.

The presumption is, until the contrary be shown, that every man has performed his duty, and it is incumbent on one who alleges a failure in this respect as a foundation to a right in an action, to prove facts from which an inference of negligence may properly be drawn, and proof of a mere fact that an accident has happened will not, in the absence of any contractual relations between the parties, authorize such an inference.

Cosulich v. Standard Oil Co. 123 N. Y. 118.

Defendant is not liable under the doctrine of respondent superior.

The action being for negligence, and not for trespass or for creating a nuisance, the defendant, proving that the act of negligence complained of was not his, but that of an independent contractor, is not liable.

Roemer v. Striker, 142 N. Y. 184; Ferguson v. Hubbell, 97 N. Y. 507, 49 Am. Rep. 544; Wyllie v. Palmer, 187 N. Y. 248, 19 L. R. A. 285; King v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 66 N. Y. 181, 23 Am. Rep. 37.

To hold the defendant liable for the negligence of his contractor it must be made to appear at least that he made his contract with knowledge that the contractor was unskilful or incompetent, or that the reputation of the contractor for carelessness was such that defendant must be presumed to have known of it.

Benoit v. Troy & L. R. Co. 154 N. Y. 228; Park v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 155 N. Y. 215; Baulee v. New York & H. R. Co. 59 N. Y. 356, 17 Am. Rep. 325; Whart. Neg. § 288; Olive v. Whitney Marble Co. 108 N. Y. 292.

Assuming all for which plaintiff contends, contracting with Tobin was not culpable negligence on the part of the defendant. It was at most a mere error of judgment for which he cannot be held liable.

Benoit v. Troy & L. R. Co. 154 N. Y. 228; Harley v. Buffalo Car Mfg. Co. 142 N. Y. 81.

Plaintiff had a right to interfere with Tobin, while defendant had not. Defendant had no cause for complaint, as there was no chance of injury to his property by reason of careless blasting. Plaintiff, after having been warned that Tobin was carrying on his work in a manner likely to endanger his property, might have applied for and obtained, before the accident, the injunction which he procured after the injury had been done.

It is no longer sufficient, to authorize the submission of a case to a jury, that there be a mere scintilla of evidence. There must be proof to sustain a verdict if rendered.

Dwight v. Germania L. Ins. Co. 103 N. Y. 341, 57 Am. Rep. 729; Corcoran v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 47 N. Y. S. R. 147; Baulee v. New York & H. R. Co. 59 N. Y. 356, 17 Am. Rep. 325; *Cadwell v. Defendant was not liable for any criminal act of the contractor, nor for his recklessness.

Wright v. New York C. R. Co. 25 N. Y. 562.

Mr. Charles W. Pierson, with Messrs. Alexander & Green, for respondent:

A person employing an independent contractor to perform a dangerous work upon his premises, requiring skill and likely to injure his neighbors if improperly done, is bound to exercise due and reasonable care to select a competent contractor, and is liable for injuries resulting from his failure to exercise such care.

It loses sight of the familiar principle that means of knowledge is equivalent to actual notice.

Martin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The doctrine of respondet superior is based upon the relation of master and servant or principal and agent. As no such relation existed between the parties, I find no ground upon which the judgment in this action can be sustained.

The rule that where the relation of master and servant or principal and agent does not exist, but an injury results from negligence in the performance of work by a contractor, the party with whom he contracts is not responsible for his negligence or that of his servants, is well established by the authorities in this state. Bake v. Farris, 5 N. Y. 48, 45 Am. Dec. 804; Pack v. New York, 8 N. Y. 222; Kelly v. New York, 11 N. Y. 482; McCafferty v. Spuyten Duyvil & P. M. R. Co. 61 N. Y. 178, 19 Am. Rep. 267; King v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 41 L. R. A.

66 N. Y. 181, 23 Am. Rep. 87; Pierrepoint v. Loveless, 72 N. Y. 211; Ferguson v. Hubbell, 97 N. Y. 507, 49 Am. Rep. 544; Herrington v. Lansingburgh, 110 N. Y. 145; Roemer v. Striker, 142 N. Y. 134.

In Blake v. Ferris the defendant had a license to construct, at his own expense, a sewer in a public street. He engaged another person to construct it for a stipulated price. The sewer was left at night in a negligent manner by the workmen who were employed in its construction. It was held that the immediate employer of the servant, through whose negligence the injury occurred, was responsible, but that the primary principal employer was not.

In Pack v. New York, which was an action for damages caused by the alleged negligence of a contractor in blasting rocks, which resulted in injury to the plaintiff's house, in personal injury to his wife, and in killing one of his children, it was held that, as the work was being prosecuted under a contract with a person who was to perform it, the corporation was not liable, but that a recovery for such an injury could be had only against the person actually guilty of the wrongful act, or against one to whom he stands in the relation of servant or agent, and that the contractor in such a case was not the servant or agent of the corporation.

The Kelly Case was also an action for damages occasioned by negligence in blasting. In that case there was a contract between the city and a contractor to grade a certain street, and it was held that the city was not liable for damages occasioned by negligence in the performance of the work, but that the contractor was alone liable, although the contract provided that the work should be done under the direction and to the satisfaction of the officers of the corporation.

The McCafferty Case was for an injury to the plaintiff's store and property by alleged negligence in blasting rocks necessary for the construction of the defendant's road. There the corporation had let the work of constructing the road by contract, and the negligence was that of the contractor or his employees, and this court held that the defendant was not liable, and that there was no distinction between real and personal property, so far as its negligent use and management were concerned, or of negligent acts upon it by others.

In the King Case the owner of real property was held not liable for injuries resulting from negligence on the part of a contractor or his employees engaged in performing a lawful contract for specific work upon the premises of the defendant, and the rule that the law will not impute to one person the negligent acts of another, unless the relation of master and servant or principal and agent exists, was again asserted.

The same doctrine was held in the Pierrepoint Case, where the Blake and Pack Cases were followed, and it was declared that a contractor or his employees did not stand in the relation of servants to a person who was the owner of the property and with whom the contract was made, and that the latter was not answerable for their negligence.

In Ferguson v. Hubbell, where the injury for which a recovery was sought resulted from the act of a contractor, it was again decided that the contractor was, in no sense, the servant of the defendant, and that the doctrine of respondent superior did not apply.

The Herrington Case was for damages occasioned by carelessness in blasting. The work was done by contractors, and the court followed its previous decisions, and held that the defendant was not liable, but that the injury was occasioned by the negligence of the contractors, and that they alone were responsible.

The Roemer Case was also for negligence in blasting and excavating on the defendant's premises which adjoined the premises of the plaintiff. The work was done by a contractor, and the owner was held not liable.

It seems to me that the principle of these decisions is decisive of the case at bar, and is directly adverse to the contention of the respondent. The only authorities in this state cited as sustaining the doctrine contended for are Blake v. Ferris, 5 N. Y. 48, 55 Am. Dec. 304, and Storrs v. Utica, 17 N. Y. 104, 72 Am. Dec. 487. The Blake Case, we have already referred to, which is a direct authority against the doctrine it is cited to sustain. In the Storrs Case the facts were different and the principle of the decision has no application. There the doctrine of the Blake, Kelly, and Pack Cases was expressly indorsed in the opinion of Judge Comstock, who said: "Now, in these two cases of Pack v. New York, and Kelly v. New York, the general doctrines so well set forth in Blake v. Ferris were applied with entire precision and accuracy." While the learned judge doubted the propriety of the application of that doctrine to the case of Blake v. Ferris, he expressly recognized its correctness and its applicability to a case like this. The decision of the court in the Storrs Case was placed upon the sole ground that it was the duty of the corporation to keep its streets in a safe condition for public travel, and for a failure to discharge that duty the corporation was liable. The question of the negligent manner in which the work was performed was entirely excluded by the opinion in that case.

There are certain exceptional cases where a person employing a contractor is liable, which, briefly stated, are: Where the employer personally interferes with the work, and the acts performed by him occasion the injury; where the thing contracted to be done is unlawful; where the acts performed create a public nuisance; and where an employer is bound by a statute to do a thing efficiently and an injury results from its inefficiency. Manifestly, this case falls within none of the exceptions to which we have referred. There was no interference by the defendant. The thing contracted to be done was lawful. The work did not constitute a public nuisance, and there was no statute binding the defendant to efficiently perform it. In none of those exceptional cases does the question of negligence arise. There the action is based upon the wrongful act of the party, and may be maintained against the author or the person performing or continuing it. In the case at bar the work contracted for was lawful and necessary for the improvement and use of the defendant's property. Consequently, no liability can be based upon the illegality of the transaction, but it must stand upon the negligence of the contractor or his employee alone. It seems very obvious that, under the authorities, the defendant was not responsible for the acts of the contractor or his employees, and that the court should have granted the defendant's motion for a nonsuit. If a contrary rule were established it would not only impose upon the owners of real property an improper restraint in contracting for its improvement, but would open a new and unlimited field for actions for the negligence of others which has not hitherto existed in this state, and practically overrule a long line of decisions in this court which firmly establish a contrary doctrine.

It follows that the judgment should be reversed.

Parker, Ch. J., O'Brien and Vann, JJ., concur with Martin, J., for reversal.

Gray, J., dissenting:

The question is whether in a case like the present one, where the work contracted for is obviously and necessarily hazardous, it is an assumption inconsistent with the doctrine of exemption for the acts of an independent contractor that a legal duty is imposed upon him who employs the contractor to use a reasonable amount of care in the selection of one who is both competent and careful, and that for a failure to perform that duty he may be held for the damages occasioned by negligence.

The plaintiff and the defendant were owners of adjoining pieces of real estate in the city of New York. Upon the plaintiff's property there was a dwelling house. The defendant's property was vacant and was covered with a mass of rock, which extended above the curb. The defendant made a contract with one Tobin to excavate his plot to the depth of 10 feet below the curb line, preparatory to building thereon. In the performance of the contract, Tobin appears to have proceeded unskillfully and with considerable recklessness, and, in the work of blasting, he caused some damage to the plaintiff's house, both within and without. For the damage so sustained the plaintiff brought the present action. The complaint charged, and the case went to the jury upon the theory, that the defendant had failed to exercise proper care, or a due regard for the safety of the plaintiff's premises in the selection of a competent and careful contractor to do the dangerous work of excavating the earth and rock. The defense was, in substance, that the person employed by the defendant for the purpose was an independent contractor, having the entire control and management of the work, and that as the result of inquiries, showing him to be a competent, skillful, and careful contractor, the defendant had made the contract with him. Upon the trial the evidence showed that the defendant had committed to one Squier the supervision of the construction of the building upon his land, and that he acted for him in all pertinent matters. Squier was a builder of very considerable experience, and had had much to do with contracts in the building of houses in the city. He had never heard of Tobin before giving him the contract for the work in question. That work was shown to have been plainly of a hazardous nature; inasmuch as it necessitated the blasting out of a ledge of rock, which extended close up to the wall of the plaintiff's adjoining house. There was evidence to the effect that it was quite possible to do this work of excavation without causing injury to the adjoining building, and that work of that description was being constantly done in the city, with safety to adjoining premises. The way that Tobin performed his contract warranted a belief that he was incompetent and reckless. He was the lowest bidder for the work. The evidence showed him to be an illiterate person and of intemperate habits, whose appearance and surroundings might permit inferences adverse to his fitness to do responsible work of such a nature. There was testimony concerning two previous jobs of a similar nature, from which it might be inferred that Tobin was either reckless, or lacked skill. Squier testified, for the defendant, to having inquired of the representative of a real-estate operator about Tobin, who spoke of him as a good and careful blaster, and he visited two places, to which Tobin had referred him, to see work that he had done. That inquiry satisfied him. He denied any knowledge of Tobin's habits; but he made no inquiry concerning them. A witness testified to having employed Tobin upon rock excavation, and to having found him satisfactory in his work. While there was evidence of some care having been exercised by the defendant's agent, was it of that conclusive nature which precluded criticism? As the case stood, it could not be said, as matter of law, that the defendant had discharged his whole duty towards the plaintiff, in the matter of the selection and employment of a proper person to perform the required work. There was a fair question upon the evidence, whether, in initiating a work which, under the particular circumstances, was necessarily fraught with some danger to the adjoining property, the defendant had exercised a reasonable degree of prudence in the employment of Tobin. The plaintiff was not obliged to show that the defendant knew about the characteristics and previous conduct of Tobin; but, there being evidence, in the testimony of the witnesses, affecting his capacity and habits, previously to the employment, it became a question whether defendant's inquiries were sufficient and such as a prudent man would have made, who realized the hazards involved to the adjoining property and who intended to proceed about the employment of a contractor, as he would have expected to be done by if the positions were reversed. The plaintiff recovered a verdict for the amount of the expense to which he had been put in repairing the damage done to his house. It is, of course, evident from that verdict that the evidence had failed to satisfy the jury that the defendant had proceeded in the matter without due regard for his neighbor's rights, or that Tobin was the kind of man to be intrusted with a job demanding both skill and a sense of responsibility.

If there was evidence raising a question as to whether the defendant had exercised reasonable care in contracting out this work to Tobin, then I think it was properly submitted to the determination of the jury. What is there in 41 L. R. A.

the doctrine, behind which the defendant seeks to shelter himself, which should interfere with the trial and submission of the issue which was tendered by the complaint and accepted by the answer; namely, whether proper care had been exercised by the defendant in committing the work to Tobin? The argument for the defendant is, as Tobin was performing his work as an independent contractor, that he and his men were not under the supervision or control of the defendant, and that, as no relation of master and servant existed, the defendant could come under no liability for Tobin's negligent acts.

The doctrine which exempts a person from liability for damages caused by the negligence of an independent contractor employed by him is well established in this state. It rests upon a basis of justice and of reason, and was a departure from the general doctrine of the responsibility of the master for the servant's acts which the courts, both in England and this state, have agreed upon within comparatively recent years. Quarman v. Burnett, 6 Mees. & W. 499; Reedie v. London & N. W. R. Co. 4 Exch. 253; Blake v. Ferris, 5 N. Y. 48. 55 Am. Dec. 304; Storrs v. Utica, 17 N. Y. 104 72 Am. Dec. 437.

Formerly, the rule respondent superior was deemed controlling, and the legal relation of master and servant, to which it was applicable, received the broad extension, within which the employer of another became responsible for the other's acts, upon the principle qui facit per alium facit per se. That, as a maxim, handed down from the Roman Code, meant that the agency of the servant was an instrument of his employer. Any man having authority over another's actions, who commands him to do an act, or who may be deemed to have impliedly commanded him in the ordinary course of his employment or business, becomes responsible for his acts, as for his own. The injustice, however, of applying this principle to a situation where a person is engaged in doing a piece of work, under an employment or a contract, in the performance of which he uses his own means and his own servants, without any control upon the part of the general employer, became apparent. It was evident that the relation of master and servant did not exist, when the relation between the parties was governed by such an engagement or contract. Whereas, under the operation of the rule respondent superior, the injured person might hold the master responsible and disregard the servant, who was the immediate author of the injury; under the introduction of the reasonable modification of that rule, the independent contractor, and not the general employer, became responsible for negligent acts, committed in person, or by those under his orders.

The principle of the decision below, in the present case, in my judgment, in no respect weakens the doctrine of the exemption of the general employer from liability for damages caused by the negligence of the independent contractor; nor, in any wise, threatens its stability. Nor does it affect it, otherwise than by establishing a reasonable safeguard against too broad a claim for exemption. It seems to me a proposition, as clear as it is reasonable, that the assumption that there has been an exercise of due care in the selection of a competent and careful contractor, is a part of the foundation for the doctrine. I do not think that it would do to hold that a person, by the mere act of employing a contractor to do some work of a nature in itself obviously hazardous to others, thereby discharges himself of all responsibility. Something more is required of him. With that due regard for his neighbor's rights, which is obligatory upon all, in the use which they make of their own property, he should be held to the exercise of reasonable care and of some deliberation in the selection of a contractor. We are referred to decisions of the courts of other states, where this duty on the part of a general employer seems to have been distinctly recognized (Norwalk Gaslight Co. v. Norwalk, 68 Conn. 495; Brannock v. Elmora, 114 Mo. 55), and while precisely a similar case to this may not be found in our reports, the reasonableness of the proposition commends and sustains it. As I have suggested, it may be assumed as an inherent element of the employer's claim for exemption. See Whart. Neg. § 181; Story, Agency, 9th ed. § 454a, at p. 556, note; Cuff v. Newark & N. Y. R. Co. 35 N. J. L. 17, 10 Am. Rep. 205; Ardesco Oil Co. v. Gilson, 63 Pa. 146; Sturges v. Society for Promotion of Theological Education, 180 Mass. 414, 39 Am. Rep. 463.

In the text-books and cases just referred to, it will be observed that the assumption I mention is recognized as one associated with the employment of an independent contractor. I do not think it needs much argument to vindicate the entire propriety of the assumption. The exemption from liability should not be so broad as to exclude the consideration of the manner in which the independent contractor was selected for the particular work. When we consider the hazards incident to the work of blasting in a city block, there ought to be no question, where the work is obviously and necessarily of a dangerous nature, as to the propriety of imposing upon the owner of the property to be improved thereby a legal duty to exercise proper care in the selection of his contractor. If that be true, then the question of the exercise of due care becomes one of fact upon the evidence. If there is evidence proving, or tending to prove, that the contractor was an incompetent, or a reckless, or an unfit person to be intrusted with the job, and that it was possible for the defendant to have discovered these facts by inquiry, then it is for the jury to render their verdict upon the issue between the parties. It is not essential that the defendant be shown to have known of the acts of incompetency, or of the conduct from which unfitness may be inferred. It is sufficient if it appear that no sufficient inquiry had been made, and that a careful inquiry might have revealed the incompetency or the unfitness. The circumstances of the selection of the contractor might be such as to justify a belief that there was a failure to exercise care and prudence in the matter.

The conclusion, therefore, which I reach after a careful consideration of the question, is that the defendant, in employing a contractor to blast out the rock upon his premises,—a work obviously dangerous to the adjoining owner,—owed a legal duty to the plaintiff to carefully select one who was both competent and careful, and that for a failure to perform that duty, under the circumstances of this case, he became responsible for any injury to the plaintiff's property resulting from the contractor's negligence. I think that there was evidence adduced from which the jury might infer that the defendant had not proceeded with that care and due regard for the plaintiff's rights which were incumbent upon him. It may not have been very strong; but it cannot be said that there was none giving rise to inferences. Minds might differ upon the question; but that only goes to show the necessity of leaving it to the arbitration of a jury. The learned justices below have thought that there was a question for the jury upon the evidence. I think that they were right and that there are no errors calling for a reversal of this judgment.

Bartlett and Haight, JJ., concur with Gray, J., for affirmance.

(156 N. Y. 316.)

1. A trust created by a debtor under which he is the beneficiary is not affected by 1 Rev. Stat. p. 730, § 63, which prohibits a person beneficially interested in a trust for the receipt of rents and profits of lands from assigning, or in any manner disposing of, such interest.

2. A person cannot place his property in trust with remainder over, reserving to himself the beneficial interest for his life, subject to the expenses of the trust, and thereby put his life interest beyond the reach of subsequent creditors.

APPEAL by defendant Barnes from an order and interlocutory judgment of the appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Second Department, reversing a judgment of a Special Term for Kings County sustaining demurrers to the complaint in an action brought by a creditor to reach the interest of his judgment debtor in a trust fund of real estate created by himself in which he reserved to himself a life interest. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. Jay & Candler, for appellant:

The trust deed was made some three years before the plaintiff's judgment was obtained, and it has been held that if the conveyance and trust were made prior to the time when the plaintiff's claim accrued or judgment was obtained, it is immaterial with what intent such conveyance was made, the defendant not having been given credit based upon his possession of the real estate, which is covered by the deed of trust.

Holmes v. Little, 86 Hun, 226; Howe v. Striker, 5 Misc. 309.

The plaintiff should allege facts on which could be predicated a claim that there was remaining, after providing for the proper support of the cestui que trust and his family, a surplus income, and that the same is subject to the payment of his or her claim as a judgment creditor.

As the trust is governed by the Revised Statutes, the whole estate in law and equity is vested in the trustee, and the appellant has no estate or interest in the lands.

Noyes v. Blakeman, 6 N. Y. 567.

The appellant has no interest whatever in the subject of the trust, except the right to enforce the same, and he cannot in any manner anticipate the income.

What he cannot do by way of anticipation, the court cannot do, except in so far as it may be authorized to do by virtue of the statute, which would empower the court to apply the surplus income to the satisfaction of the claims of creditors as above suggested.

Messrs. John W. Hutchison, Jr., and Walter S. Newhouse, for respondent:

Prior to the Revised Statutes, plaintiff would have been entitled to the relief sought under the common law, and in no other state would her right to such relief be questioned.

Such an interest could have been reached by a bill in equity prior to the Revised Statutes.

Bartlett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal certifies two questions: "First. In case a party, when solvent, executes a deed of trust of real property situate in this state, whereby he conveys the same to a trustee, reserving to himself the payment to him from time to time during his life of the net income from the trust estate, subject to the necessary expenses of the trustee, with a remainder over, and with full power to sell in said trustee, can a party who at the time of the creation of the trust was not a creditor of the creator or beneficiary of the trust, but who subsequently became a creditor, and who thereafter obtained a judgment upon his debt, and issued an execution upon the judgment against the property of the said beneficiary, and had the same returned unsatisfied in an action like the present one, recover any relief or any judgment which will authorize the sale of the right, title, or interest of the beneficiary in the said trust, or a judgment requiring the trustee to pay over to said creditor the entire net income from the said trust estate as it accrues? Second. Whether in such a case an interest reserved for his own benefit by the founder of a trust is subject to the claim of his subsequent creditors; and, if so, to what extent?"

The main question is whether a person can place his property in trust, with remainder over, reserving to himself the beneficial interest for his life, subject to the expenses of the trust, and thereby put the life interest beyond the reach of creditors whose claims arose after the creation of the trust. The special term answered this question in the affirmative, and the appellate division has taken the contrary view. We are of opinion that the appellate division reached the proper conclusion. While it is true that in this and other states the English rule has been modified, which makes the interest of a beneficiary under a trust created for his benefit by a third party subject to the claims of his creditors, yet we have not ignored the general policy of the law, that creditors shall have the right to resort to all the property of the debtor not protected by statute. The provisions of the Revised Statutes, as construed by the courts, render this clear. In 2 Rev. Stat. p. 178, § 88, is the following provision: "Whenever an execution against the property of a defendant shall have been issued on a judgment at law, and shall have been returned unsatisfied, in whole or in part, the party suing out such execution may file a bill in chancery against such defendant, and any other person, to compel the discovery of any property or thing in action, belonging to the defendant, and of any property, money, or thing in action, due to him, or held in trust for him; and to prevent the transfer of any such property, money, or thing in action, or the payment or delivery thereof, to the defendant, except where such trust has been created by or the fund so held in trust has proceeded from, some person other than the defendant himself." This section has been substantially preserved in Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1871, 1879. It was at first contended that this statute protected absolutely the interest of a debtor in a trust created for his benefit by a third party, but it is now the settled law that this provision must be read with 1 Rev. Stat. p. 729, § 57, providing that the surplus income of a trust estate shall be liable in equity to the claim of the creditors of the cestui que trust. Williams v. Thorn, 70 N. Y. 270; Graff v. Bonnett, 31 N. Y. 9, 88 Am. Dec. 236. The statute quoted (2 Rev. Stat. p. 178, § 88), clearly implies that a trust created by the debtor, under which he is the beneficiary, does not protect his interest from the pursuit of creditors, as it is, in contemplation of law, property which he has put aside for his own use, and consequently a part of his estate, to which creditors are entitled. This general principle is also recognized by Code Civ. Proc. § 2463. A trust created by a debtor, and under which he is the beneficiary, is not affected by the provision of the Revised Statutes (1 Rev. Stat. p. 730, § 63) which prohibits a person beneficially interested in a trust for the receipt of the rents and profits of lands from assigning or disposing of the same. The policy of this statute is clear, when applied to trusts created by third parties, but is without force when the debtor creates the trust. The statute is obviously designed to assist the creators of trusts in protecting and caring for the beneficiaries who are the natural objects of their solicitude and care, but it cannot be invoked by a debtor to protect a trust which he has created to serve in time of need as a refuge from his creditors. The defendant Barnes, being out of debt in October, 1893, was at liberty, if he saw fit, to give away all his property, real and personal, to those of his blood, or to strangers. There would be no creditor to complain if he was moved to act in so unusual and improvident a manner. As matter of fact, he did at that time, as to the real estate in question, divest himself of the legal title; reserving under a conveyance, in trust, a beneficial interest in the property for life, with remainder over. The present action in no way challenges the right of Barnes to thus divest himself of the legal title to this real estate; but plaintiff, as a subsequent creditor, seeks to have appropriated to the payment of her judgment such interest as Barnes reserved to himself in the property, and nothing more. It would be a startling and revolutionary doctrine to hold that this reserved interest cannot be reached by the plaintiff, as a creditor. If such is the law, it would make it possible for a person free from debt to place his property beyond the reach of creditors, and secure to himself a comfortable support during life, without regard to his subsequent business ventures, contracts, or losses. In Massachusetts and Pennsylvania it has been held that no such result can be accomplished. Pacific Nat. Bank v. Windram, 183 Mass. 175; Mackason's Appeal, 42 Pa. 380, 82 Am. Dec. 517. The prayer of the complaint in the case at bar asks the court to determine the amount of the interest which defendant Barnes reserved to himself in the trust fund, and to order it sold and applied on the judgment. A person for whose benefit a trust is created takes no estate or interest in the lands, but he can enforce the performance of the trust in equity. 1 Rev. Stat. p. 729, § 60. This right to enforce is a chose in action, and personal property in the hands of defendant Barnes in the case before us, and liable in equity for his debts. Tompkins v. Fonda, 4 Paige, 448; Payne v. Becker, 87 N. Y. 158. It is the settled policy of this state that where property is held in trust for a debtor, and the fund proceeds from a third party, the creditor can only reach the surplus income after providing for the proper support of the cestui que trust; but, if the debtor created the trust, his entire reserved interest is a fund to which his creditors can resort. Graff v. Bonnett, 31 N. Y. 9, 88 Am. Dec. 236. (Hogeboom, J., in the case last cited (p. 14, 88 Am. Dec. 240.) said: "In other words, it was a legislative declaration, in language intended to be explicit, but possibly liable to some misconstruction, that property held in trust for the debtor, when such trust proceeded from himself, was in no case to be protected for his benefit; but, where the trust or the fund proceeded from some other source, the liability of the property to, or its exemption from, judicial seizure, was to depend upon the general provisions of law applicable to trust property.")

We are asked to answer two questions, which may be thus stated: (1) Can this plaintiff, under the circumstances disclosed, recover a judgment which will authorize the sale of the debtor's interest in this trust, or require the trustee to pay over the entire net income as it accrues? (2) Where the founder of a trust reserves an interest for his own benefit, is it subject to the claim of his subsequent creditors; and, if so, to what extent? The second question differs little, if any, from the first, and seems to put the inquiry merely in a changed form. Under § 190 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the jurisdiction of the court of appeals is confined to the review of actual determinations made by the appellate division of the supreme court. The idea that a question may be certified to this court for its decision, whether it arose in the case, and was passed upon by the appellate division, or not, seems to prevail to some extent, at least. It is, however, an erroneous conception of the powers and duties of this court, which has only such jurisdiction as is conferred upon it by statute, wherein is not included the power of determining abstract questions, or those which have not been actually determined by the court certifying them. We have already held that the court will decline to answer any question certified unless it is sufficiently definite to prevent different answers under differing circumstances. We have also held that we will not answer abstract questions, nor those that have not been decided by the court below. Granman v. Westchester Racing Assn. 153 N. Y. 449; Barter v. McDonnell, 154 N. Y. 432, 486; Hearst v. Shea, 156 N. Y. 169.

Following the principle of those cases, it must be held that the questions certified in this case can be reviewed only so far as they actually arose, and were determined by the appellate division. To that extent we answer them in the affirmative; but, so far as they were not determined by that court, we decline to answer them. The learned appellate division [25 App. Div. 160], in its opinion, uses this language: "In what manner the debtor's life interest shall be appropriated to the plaintiff's claim,—whether by collecting the rents and applying the income from time to time upon the judgment, or by a sale of the life estate for a similar object,—it is unnecessary to determine. We hold that in some manner or other the debtor's interest is subject to the plaintiff's judgment." It is quite possible that the demurrer to the complaint, when strictly construed, entitled the plaintiff to specific directions from the appellate division as to the precise manner in which the life estate of defendant Barnes is to be dealt with in the event of final judgment against him. These directions were not given, however, and we confine ourselves to the determination of the appellate division.

The order and interlocutory judgment appealed from should be affirmed, with costs, and the questions answered as above stated.

Haight, Martin, and Vann, JJ., concur.

Gray, J., concurring:

I think that this judgment should be affirmed, upon the broad ground that the Revised Statutes of this state have only changed the common-law rule, which subjected the interest of the beneficiary of a trust to the claims of his creditors, so far as to protect that interest when under a trust created by another than the beneficiary. The statutory provision relied upon as affording a general protection to all beneficiaries, irrespective of the manner of the creation of the trust, does not, when fairly read, imply a trust founded by the beneficiary himself. That "no person, beneficially interested in a trust for the receipt of rents and profits of land, can assign, or, in any manner, dispose of, such interest," not only imports, by the language, that the founder of the trust and the beneficiary are two different persons, but such is the meaning required by the policy of the law. The changes effected by the adoption of our Revised Statutes in the rules of the common law proceeded upon a sound policy and principle, and not arbitrarily. Both policy and principle were opposed to granting immunity to a beneficiary against the claims of his creditors, if his interest was one reserved in a trust created by himself for his own benefit. The principle which underlay the statutory provision making the interest of the beneficiary in a trust created by another inalienable was that of affording protection to a provision which, in theory of law, had been made for the helpless, the unfortunate, or the improvident. That is a just principle, and one which the policy of the law sanctions. The creditor cannot complain if he is unable to reach the estate of his debtor under a trust created in the property of a third person. But neither principle nor policy can justify the protection of the debtor's estate against the claims of his creditors, when it is one of his own creation. Although, as in the present case, a person may have placed the legal title to his property in another, nevertheless, if he has in the conveyance reserved to himself a life interest in the enjoyment of the rents and profits, it is clear that he has not divested himself of anything more than the legal title and the power of disposition. He still has that interest which made the legal possession of the property valuable, namely, the enjoyment of the income. In other words, what the appellant sought to do in this case was to place his own property in such a legal situation that, while he might enjoy its income, his creditors could have no resort to it in order to satisfy the debts which he might incur. Sound public policy condemns such a proposition. As it is clearly shown in the opinion of Justice Cullen, it was never contemplated by the authors of the Revised Statutes that the section above quoted and relied upon was intended to apply to a case where a debtor himself created the trust. I think that we may safely rest the affirmation of this judgment upon that broad ground, and without resort to other provisions of the statutes to make clear the conclusion reached, that one may not secure to himself the enjoyment of a life interest in his own property which shall be beyond the reach of the just claims of his creditors.

Parker, Ch. J., dissenting:

I am unable to agree in the decision about to be made, for the reason that it seems to me clear that the legislature has established the law applicable to this case adversely to the holding of the court. It appears that the defendant Barnes in October, 1883, while he was out of debt, conveyed real estate to a trustee in trust, "reserving to himself the beneficial interest in the said property for life, subject to the necessary expenses of the said trustee, with remainder over, and with full power of sale in said trustee;" that the said trustee accepted his trust, and at the time of the commencement of this action was in possession of the property. Since that time Barnes seems to have become indebted to the plaintiff, who now seeks by this action to collect her claim out of the property so conveyed in trust. It is the law in England that the interest or income of the equitable life tenant (with the single exception of a trust for a married woman) is alienable by the beneficiary, passes to an assignee in bankruptcy, and is at all times subject to the claims of creditors. Such was formerly the law in this state, and in many of our sister states. The legislature, in its wisdom, saw fit to disregard the views of the judges, and to reverse the law as settled by the courts. No good purpose can be accomplished by a discussion of the question whether the courts or the legislature were in the right. The legislature had the power to change the law on that subject absolutely, and did it. The statute reads: "No person beneficially interested in a trust for the receipt of the rents and profits of lands, can assign or in any manner dispose of such interest; but the rights and interest of every person for whose benefit a trust for the payment of a sum in gross is created, are assignable." 1 Rev. Stat. p. 780, § 68. What the beneficiary cannot grant by way of anticipation, the court cannot, except to the extent declared in another provision of the statute, which reads, "The surplus of such rents and profits beyond the sum necessary for the education and support of the beneficiary, shall be liable for the claims of his creditors." Revised from 1 Rev. Stat. p. 729, § 57. See 3 Birdseye's Rev. Stat. 2d ed. p. 2618, § 78. It is not alleged in this complaint that there is any surplus of income over and above that needed for the support of Barnes, and therefore this provision is not applicable to the case in hand. A person, therefore, who is "beneficially interested in a trust for the receipt of the rents and profits of lands," cannot dispose of the income by way of anticipation, nor can his creditors claim it, except as to the surplus, as prescribed by the provisions of the statutes quoted. Douglas v. Cruger, 80 N. Y. 15; Lent v. Howard, 89 N. Y. 169. That would seem to leave only the question whether there was a valid trust created in the lands in controversy. It is not pretended that it is invalid against the plaintiff, upon the ground that it was made to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors. The deed is in due form, and was properly executed, its trust provisions are in harmony with the statutes bearing upon that subject, and there is no claim that it was not valid at the time of the creation of the trust. That being so, the trust is governed by the Revised Statutes, the whole estate in law and equity became vested in the trustee, and the appellant has no estate or interest whatever in the lands. 1 Rev. Stat. p. 729, § 60. It has been said in this case, with reference to the assertion that a creditor cannot reach the beneficial income in the trust estate, that "the proposition itself would seem to shock our sense of justice." That was the position which the courts formerly took as to the beneficial income of all trusts in lands. Recognizing that the statute has some force, and cannot be altogether ignored, the decision is to the effect that, where trusts are created by third parties, only the surplus of income can be obtained by the creditor, but that a different rule applies where the income goes to the founder of the trust. There is no such distinction pointed out in the statute. It does not speak of a person beneficially interested in a trust created by third parties, or by the founder of a trust. It refers to persons beneficially interested in a trust "for the receipt of the rents and profits of lands." This language is broad enough to include all trusts in land created in conformity with the statutes, and the rules of statutory construction require that the language employed should be so construed. The greater includes the less, and I see no escape from holding that it covers every valid trust in lands created under the Revised Statutes, and this must be conceded to be such a trust. If the public interests require that a distinction shall be made as to the disposition of the income to creditors where the trust is created by a third party, and where the founder of the trust is the person beneficially interested in the income, then the legislature can, and probably will, make the change. But it is not the province of the court to make it. I advise a reversal of the judgment.

O'Brien, J., concurs with Parker, Ch. J., for reversal.

SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

(.....N. C.)

1. Contributory negligence of a brakeman in coupling cars will not preclude a recovery for injury caused by the absence of self-couplers, which constituted continuing negligence of the master and existed subsequently to his negligence.

NOTE.—The above case is believed to be a pioneer in holding that the failure to equip freight cars with self-couplers constitutes negligence per se. The doctrine of continuing negligence presents an important modification of the law of contributory negligence. It seems to have been acted upon without expressly adopting it, in Thompson v. Salt Lake Rapid-Transit Co. (Utah) 40 L. R. A. 172. This doctrine materially restricts the rule of the "last clear chance."

See also 44 L. R. A. 313.

2. Failure to equip freight cars with self-couplers constitutes negligence per se.

3. An extension of time procured from the interstate commerce commission by railroad companies for placing self-couplers upon freight cars merely relieves the companies from the penalty provided in the act to regulate commerce, but does not relieve them from the legal liability to employees for failure to provide suitable appliances in general use.

4. A brakeman's knowledge that cars are not furnished with self-couplers does not make him assume the risk by continuing to couple cars without self-couplers. It seems to have been acted upon without expressly adopting it, in Thompson v. Salt Lake Rapid-Transit Co. (Utah) 40 L. R. A. 172. This doctrine materially restricts the rule of the "last clear chance."

ing in the service and coupling the cars in the course of his duty.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for McDowell County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. Charles Price, G. F. Bason, and A. B. Andrews, Jr., for appellant:

When a man contracts to do a thing in a certain way, and not to do it in another way, the rule of the "prudent man" has nothing to do with the case. He must perform the work in the way he contracted to do it; and when he attempts to do it in the way he was warned not to do it, he violates his contract, and he cannot recover for any injury he sustains in violating his own contract.

Bailey, Master's Liability for Injuries to Servant, pp. 71 et seq.

The plaintiff had two ways of doing his work, the one safe and the other perilous. He adopted the perilous way, and cannot recover.

The rules of the master, if they are reasonable, are as much a part of the contract between him and the servant as the price per month agreed to be paid.

State v. Christmas, 51 N. C. (6 Jones, L.) 471; Smith v. Sasser, 50 N. C. (5 Jones, L.) 383.

The defendant had a right to have its theory of the case presented to the jury by the specific instructions asked because it was supported by evidence, and the instructions were properly requested.

Poole v. Consolidated Street R. Co. 100 Mich. 379, 25 L. R. A. 744; Russell v. Carolina C. R. Co. 118 N. C. 1098; Stokes v. Suffolk & C. R. Co. 107 N. C. 178.

On rehearing.

There was no allegation in the complaint that the negligence causing the injury was the failure of the company to equip its cars with automatic couplers.

Messrs. J. T. Perkins and E. J. Justice, for appellee:

If the jury find plaintiff was not negligent, and his superior signalled a car to be kicked down upon him when he could not see it, and if they find that it was the duty and custom of such superior to warn plaintiff of his danger under these circumstances, and he failed, and the injury was a direct result, such failure and conduct on the part of the vice principal would constitute negligence.

Russell v. Carolina C. R. Co. 118 N. C. 1098; Michael v. Roanoke Mach. Works, 90 Va. 492.

If there was error in submitting the question of whether reasonably safe appliances were furnished, it was a harmless error, and cured by verdict.

The jury was properly left to pass upon the question of plaintiff's and defendant's conduct under the rule of the prudent man.

Hinsaw v. Raleigh & A. Air Line R. Co. 118 N. C. 1047; Russell v. Carolina C. R. Co. 118 N. C. 1098.

Clark, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In any aspect of this case, the defendant is liable, whether the plaintiff was or was not guilty of contributory negligence; for the negligence of the defendant in not having self couplers, and in not sending a man to couple cars at all, was a continuing negligence, which existed subsequent to the contributory negligence, if there had been any, of the plaintiff, and was the proximate cause—the causa causans—of the injury. Six years ago in Mason v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 111 N. C. 482, 18 L. R. A. 845, 846, the court, in considering "whether the defendant company was negligent in failing to provide what is known as the Janney, or some other improved coupler, which would obviate the necessity, under any circumstances, of going between the ends of cars in order to fasten one to another," said: "We think that the time has arrived when railroad companies should be required to attach such couplers . . . on all passenger cars, . . . and the new couplers have now become so cheap, as compared to the value of the lives and limbs of servants and passengers, that it is not unreasonable to require that they provide them on peril of answering for any damage which might have been obviated by their use." While the court declined, on account of the expense, to hold that the same was true at that time as to freight cars, it added: "Doubtless, the day will soon come" when it would be negligence not to attach them to freight as well as passenger cars. Congress so thought, and passed an act (27 Stat. at L. 531) requiring self couplers and air brakes to be placed on all cars, freight as well as passenger, by January 1, 1898; and this had been complied with as to "over 60 per cent of the freight cars," besides nearly all passenger cars, operating in interstate commerce, by that date. In Witsell v. West Asheville & S. S. R. Co. 120 N. C. 557, the above citation from Mason v. Richmond & D. R. Co. was approved, and the court held that, while it was not negligent to fail to provide the latest improved appliances, a railroad company was liable for any injury caused by the failure to use approved appliances that are in general use. The railroad companies have of late procured from the interstate commerce commission an extension, till January 1, 1900, of the time by which self couplers should be placed upon all freight cars used in interstate service; but this was for their accommodation, and did not and could not relieve them from the legal liability incurred for injuries caused by their failure to provide "suitable appliances in general use" where the use of such would have prevented the injury. It only relieved them from the penalty provided in that act. The eleventh annual report (1897) of the Interstate Commerce Commission issued by authority of the United States government, and based upon the reports of the railroad companies themselves, shows (p. 80) that, of railroad employees (leaving out passengers altogether), 1,861 were killed and 29,969 were wounded in the year ending June 30, 1896, being greater loss than in many a battle of historic importance. Of the trainmen, this report (p. 130) shows that nearly 1 in 9 had been killed or wounded that year,—total of over 17,000. Of these casualties, it is officially stated, 229 were killed and 8,457 were wounded in this single particular of coupling and uncoupling cars. As those figures are reported by the corporations themselves, it is not probable that they are overstated. If the railroads not reporting to the Interstate Commerce Commission (because not engaged in interstate carrying) should be added, the figures of killed and wounded from this cause would doubtless be largely increased. By these figures, for the last year reported, nearly 9,000 men had been killed and wounded in coupling and uncoupling cars. As the corporations, on their own motion, or under compulsion of congressional action and judicial decision, have adopted self-couplers on the passenger cars, and on "over 60 per cent" of the freight cars, it will be seen how many thousand of lives and bodies have been saved thereby; but that still nearly 9,000 men should in one year be killed or wounded "coupling and uncoupling" the freight cars which up to June 30, 1896, still required that duty, for lack of self-couplers, is the highest proof of the duty of the courts to enforce liability for failure to provide self-couplers in every case where an injury occurs from that cause. That nearly 9,000 men should still be killed and wounded in one year for failure to furnish appliances which are so widely in use, and which would entirely prevent such accidents, points out the duty of the courts.

In Witsell's Case, 190 N. C. at page 562, this court says: "If an appliance is such that the railroads should have it, the poverty of the company is no sufficient excuse for not having it." But in fact this defendant reports that this railroad has issued bonds and stocks for $76,557 per mile. N. C. R. R. Com. Report, 1896, at page 246. This is presumed to have been paid in by its issuing the bonds and stocks, and hence it should be able to furnish appliances which will protect its employees from such injuries as this, and should be held liable for failure to do so, for the Interstate Commerce Commission report shows the self-couplers can be added for $18 per mile. In a large majority of the states, as well as by the Federal government, railroad commissions have been created to supervise and regulate the charges and the conduct of these corporations. The courts will be very derelict in their duty if they do not enforce justice in favor of employees as well as the public. Six years ago this court said it would soon be negligence per se whenever an accident happened for lack of a self-coupler. Congress has enacted that self-couplers should be used. For their lack, this plaintiff was injured. It is true, the defendant replies that the plaintiff remained in its service knowing it did not have self-couplers. If that were a defense, no railroad company would ever be liable for failure to put in life-saving devices, and the need of bread would force employees to continue the annual sacrifice of thousands of men. But this is not the doctrine of "assumption of risk." That is a more reasonable doctrine, and is merely that when a particular machine is defective or injured, and the employee knowing it continues to use it, he assumes the risk. That doctrine has no application where the law requires the adoption of new devices to save life or limb (as self-couplers), and the employee, either ignorant of that fact, or expecting daily compliance with the law, continues in service with the appliances formerly in use. The defendant, after notice of six years from this court, and with notice of the act of Congress, and also from the general adoption of self couplers, that it should use them, was guilty of negligence in failing to do so. The injury to the plaintiff could not have occurred save for the failure of the defendant to comply with its duty in this regard, and the court below should have held it liable to the plaintiff upon the defendant's own evidence.

Affirmed.

Furches, J., dissenting:

The plaintiff was an employee of the defendant company as a laborer in its yard, at its station in Asheville, and, while so employed, was injured by defendant, for which he brings this action. The yard was under the management and control of one Adams, under whom the plaintiff worked, and Adams had the right to discharge the plaintiff for disobedience of his orders. A part of the business of the plaintiff was to couple and uncouple cars, and, when he was employed, he was told he must not couple with his hands, but with a stick. At the time of the injury, Adams and his force, among whom was the plaintiff, were engaged in making up a train on a side track by taking cars off the main track, and putting them on the side track. This was done by what is called "kicking the cars;" that is, by pushing a car with the engine at the start, and then letting the car run by its own momentum. There had been two cars kicked down the track, and they had become stationary, and the plaintiff was injured when the third car was kicked down. The plaintiff contends that he was injured between the first and second cars kicked down, and the defendant contends that he was hurt between the second and third cars kicked down.

The plaintiff contends that he was injured in attempting to put in a coupling link, which could only be done with the hand; and the defendant contends that the plaintiff was hurt in attempting to make a coupling with his hand, instead of with a stick, as he was directed to do, and in this way contributed to his injury, and that this negligence was the proximate cause of the injury, and plaintiff cannot recover on that account. It was in the night (dark) when all this occurred, and the plaintiff had a lantern, and his theory is that the second car being between him and the engine, he could not see the engine and the third car; that it was this third and last car kicked down the track, striking the second car, which caused it suddenly and violently to crash against the first car, that caused the injury; that Adams knew he was between these cars; that he had just before the injury told plaintiff "to hurry up with coupling the cars on the side track, as train No. 44 was coming, and he wanted to get out of the way." The plaintiff offered other evidence besides his own tending to sustain his contention, and the defendant offered evidence to contradict the plaintiff—to show that the injury of plaintiff was received between the second and third cars while attempting to effect a coupling with his hand, contrary to orders. And among other evidence introduced for this purpose was the testimony of Dr. Hilliard, who testified that he was the surgeon of the defendant, and was required by the company to examine—to poll—the plaintiff as to how he got hurt. And if he got anything favorable to the company, we suppose he was to become a witness for it. This evidence was objected to by the plaintiff, but we think it competent, as declarations of the plaintiff to be taken by the jury for what it was worth, considering the circumstances under which it was taken. The defendant contended that it was competent as a part of the res gestæ, and cited Southerland v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 106 N. C. 100, as authority for this position. Southerland v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. is based upon entirely different principles. In that case it was as to what the engineer—a third person—said, and, of course, it was hearsay, unless it was a part of the res gestæ.

This appeal depends upon the charge of the court, upon prayers given and prayers refused, as there seems to have been no charge except what is contained in the prayers for instruction. It was important to determine the question whether the injury was received between the first and second cars, as plaintiff contended, or between the second car kicked down and the last car, as defendant contended. If between the first two cars, as contended by plaintiff his theory is consistent whether correct or not; while, if it occurred between the last two cars kicked down, his theory would appear to be inconsistent with his contention that he could not see the approaching car, as there would be no intervening car to prevent his seeing the approach of the last car, if he was hurt between the last two cars kicked down. It does not seem to us that the jury were sufficiently instructed as to this; and it also seems to us that there is too much said in plaintiff's prayer for instructions (which were given) about the pin not being in its proper place, and having to be hunted by the plaintiff, this not being supported by evidence in the case. There was no written contract between plaintiff and defendant that plaintiff should not couple cars with his hands. But it was in evidence and admitted by the plaintiff that when he hired to the defendant, he was instructed never to couple cars with his hands. But the court was asked by the plaintiff to charge the jury that plaintiff had signed no written contract not to couple with his hands, and this being so, the rule of the prudent man applies; that is, did the plaintiff act with ordinary prudence and care in attempting to make this couple, if he was making a coupling? and if he did, he would not be guilty of negligence. The court gave this instruction, and defendant excepted. In this there was error. There is no special virtue in contracts of this kind being in writing. There is no statute requiring them to be in writing, and it does not appear to us that this was a contract, but an instruction from Adams, the man who employed the plaintiff.

But the plaintiff contends that, whether it was a contract or an instruction, it was abrogated by Adams saying to the plaintiff: "Hurry up with your coupling! No. 44 is coming, and I want to get out of the way." If Adams said this, it does not revoke or tend to revoke the instruction before given "not to couple with his hands." Mason v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 114 N. C. 728, 18 L. R. A. 845. There is no evidence showing or tending to show that Adams knew or had reason to know that the plaintiff could not effect a coupling as quickly with his stick as with his hand. If plaintiff's contention were correct, it would be dangerous for a railroad "boss" to hurry up his hands, lest he abrogated all former orders and directions. This order was not inconsistent with the previous instruction, and does not fall within Shadd v. Georgia, O. & N. R. Co. 116 N. C. 968; Patton v. Western N. O. R. Co. 96 N. C. 456.

There were other exceptions discussed by counsel, but they will probably not arise on a new trial, and we do not discuss them. The plaintiff by accepting service under the defendant to work in its yard in shifting and coupling cars, accepted all the ordinary risks of this service, without the special instruction not to couple with his hands. But it seems to us that as a matter of economy, to say nothing of the suffering and loss of human life, railroads would be induced to get and use the more modern and safer appliances. They will have to do this soon, or answer for damages caused by the lack of them.

This was written as the opinion of the court; but, since it was written, the court has changed its opinion, and I file it as my dissenting opinion.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

MOBILE & OHIO RAILROAD COMPANY,
Pff. in Err.,

v.

POSTAL TELEGRAPH CABLE COM-

(.....Tenn.....)

1. A condemnation of the right of way for a telegraph line over a railroad right of way is authorized by Acts 1885, chap. 185 (Shannon's Code, §§ 1868-1871), conferring the right to take the property or easements of private corporations for public purposes and internal improvement.

2. Only nominal damages can be given to a railroad company for the use by a telegraph line of the space occupied by its posts and wires along the railroad right of way through an agricultural section of country, when the use and occupation of the right of way for railroad purposes is not interfered with or encumbered in any way.

WRITS of error to the Circuit Courts for Gibson and Madison Counties to review judgments against the railroad company in proceedings by the telegraph company to acquire a right of way for its poles along the railway right of way. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Caruthers & Mallory, Deason & Rankin, and McCorry & Bond, for plaintiff in error:

Under the laws of Tennessee, a telegraph company has no power or authority to condemn the right of way of a railroad company. Such company is authorized by law to condemn only the property of private individuals.

The act of 1885, chap. 66, in express terms, gives telegraph companies the power to condemn rights of way upon, along, and parallel to any of the railroads of the state.

The failure of the speaker of the house to sign the bill in open session, and the failure to have the fact of such signing noted on the house journal renders said bill inoperative, and it was never constitutionally passed.

The presumption of the regularity of the passage of an act when signed by both speakers in open session, and the fact of that signing noted on the journals, may be rebutted by the affirmative showing of the journal that other constitutional requirements have been disregarded.

Brewer v. Huntingdon, 86 Tenn. 784.

It must affirmatively appear by the journals that the constitutional requirement has been complied with.

Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 48.

Section 1816, Code of 1858, is as follows: "Any person or company may construct a telegraph line along the public highways and streets of this state, or across the rivers, or over any lands belonging to the state free of charge, and over the land of private individuals as hereinafter provided, and may erect the necessary fixtures therefor."

In the absence of a legislative definition extending the meaning of the word "individual" it could not be held to include a railroad company; for the natural meaning of the term "private individual" is far from the same as a railroad company.

Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 887; 3 Elliott, Railroads, § 955; Cooley, Const. Law, p. 833; Harding v. Goodlett, 8 Yerg. 52, 24 Am. Dec. 546; Clack v. White, 2 Swan, 541; Memphis Freight Co. v. Memphis, 4 Coldw. 421; Anderson v. Turberville, 6 Coldw. 152.

The construction of the legislative grant in the first taking is strict; but it should be even more strict in case of the second taking.

Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 338; 3 Elliott, Railroads, § 964; Postal Telegr. Cable Co. v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 83 Va. 921.

The true measure of damages in such a case is the fair cash market value of the property taken, estimated as if the owner were willing to sell and the other party desired to buy that particular quantity or that particular property, at that particular place and in the particular form in which it is found, together with incidental damages.

Alloway v. Nashville, 88 Tenn. 518, 8 L. R. A. 128; Woodfolk v. Nashville & C. R. Co. 2 Swan, 434; Taylor v. Chandler, 9 Heisk. 863; Moses v. Sanford, 11 Lea, 733; East Tennessee & V. R. Co. v. Love, 8 Head, 67; Paducah & M. R. Co. v. Stovall, 12 Heisk. 4; Mississippi R. Co. v. McDonald, 12 Heisk. 54.

The right of eminent domain is a prerogative of sovereignty, and is in derogation of private rights. The delegations of this power must be strictly construed, and the courts will not extend the right beyond the plain letter of the grant.

Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 887; 3 Elliott, Railroads, § 955; Cooley, Const. Law, p. 833; Harding v. Goodlett, 8 Yerg. 52, 24 Am. Dec. 546; Clack v. White, 2 Swan, 541; Memphis Freight Co. v. Memphis, 4 Coldw. 421; Anderson v. Turberville, 6 Coldw. 152.

Where the property already devoted to public use or purpose is sought to be condemned a second time, and appropriated to a different use, the construction of the legislative grant of authority is construed even more strictly than where it is the first appropriation.

Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 888; 3 Elliott, Railroads, § 964.

Messrs. Hays & Biggs and J. R. McIntosh, for defendant in error:

By § 62 of Shannon's Code a "person" includes a corporation, and an "individual" is defined to be a "person."

While the journals would be considered in determining the validity of an act of legislature, every reasonable inference and presumption would be drawn and indulged in favor of the regularity of its passage, and where it did not affirmatively appear not to have passed, and such legitimate construction could be given to the record as sustained the law, it would be done.

Land already taken by the exercise of eminent domain for a public use, and actually used for that purpose, may be taken by legislative authority for other purposes. When so taken, it is presumed that the former use has ceased, or become detrimental, or relatively of less importance, or that the second use is not inconsistent or destructive to the former use. A right of way for a telegraph company may be condemned along a railroad track.

Wilkes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These two cases involve in the main the same questions, and are heard together by request of counsel. The actions were brought in the circuit courts of the respective counties of Gibson and Madison by the telegraph company against the railroad company to acquire rights of way for telegraph purposes along, upon, and over the right of way of the railroad company. The petitions in both cases were demurred to, and demurrer overruled, and they proceeded to hearing and disposition on the merits, and for the assessments of damages; the Madison county case being heard on appeal from the report of the jury of inquiry, before the judge without a jury, and the Gibson county case by the judge and a jury. In the Madison county case the trial judge held that nothing but nominal damages could be had; and in the Gibson county case the learned judge charged the jury that they could give as damages nothing except the value of the land occupied as post holes by the telegraph company. The cases are before us on appeal by the railroad company; but the real party in interest is the Western Union Telegraph Company, a competing line, with which the railroad has a contract for an exclusive line over its right of way, and which has the right under its contract, to use the name of the railroad company in any suit to resist the attempt of any competing line to construct any other line upon its right of way. This contract appears to be based upon a valuable consideration, of services to be rendered.

The first question raised is that the telegraph company has no power to have condemned a right of way over land already condemned for railroad purposes, in the absence of express legislative authority. 3 Elliott, Railroads, § 964. It is conceded that such right is conferred by chapter 66 of the Acts of 1885, but it is insisted this act is invalid for constitutional reasons, and that there is no other law conferring such right. The Constitution provides (art. 2, § 18) that "no bill shall become a law until it shall have been read and passed, on three different days in each house and shall have received on its final passage, in each house, the assent of a majority of all the members to which that house shall be entitled under this Constitution, and shall have been signed by the respective speakers in open session,—the fact of such signing to be noted on the journal." There is no entry on the house journal showing that the speaker of the house ever signed this bill. There is no other irregularity or defect alleged against its passage. The journals of each house show that it has passed on three separate readings on three different days in each; and the journal of the senate shows that it was signed by the speaker of the senate, and the fact noted on the senate journal, and it was then transmitted to the house for the signature of the speaker of the house, but there is no entry upon the journal of the house that it was signed by the speaker of the house. It was approved by the governor upon the next day thereafter. It is said this defect vitiates the whole act; that the provision of the Constitution is mandatory, and unless complied with, the act does not become a law, or have any validity. This presents a question of grave difficulty and doubt, but, if we concede this act to be invalid, still, in our opinion, chapter 185 of the Acts of 1885 (Shannon's Code, §§ 1868, 1871) does confer the right to condemn and take the property privileges, rights, or easements of private corporations for public purposes and internal improvement; and the construction of a telegraph line is a species of internal improvement, and expressly so regarded and treated in other portions of the act, and as embraced by it. Shannon's Code, §§ 1869-1871. It is said that this act of 1885 (chap. 185) has reference to the remedy or mode of procedure to condemn property, and does not confer any right, and that the right was intended to be conferred by chapter 66. While the act does prescribe the manner of proceeding, it also clearly gives the right to take the privileges, rights, or easements of private corporations in the same manner and to the same extent as in case of the property of individuals. Shannon's Code, §§ 1868-1871.

This being true, the next question that arises is as to the measure of damages; and the mode of ascertaining the same. In the Madison county case it was held, as before stated, that the railroad company was entitled to only nominal damages. In the Gibson county case the court charged the jury that the measure of damages was the value of the land taken, and occupied as post holes, but refused to charge that the proper measure of damages was the fair cash market value of said right of way or easement taken, estimated as if the railroad company was willing to sell, and the telegraph company desired to buy, that particular right of way or easement, and to give the fair cash market value of the right of way or easement taken, without deduction. The contentions of the parties are thus shown to be that complainant insists that the damages are purely nominal, while the defendant insists, according to the request, that they are the fair cash market value of the right acquired or easement secured, as if it were a matter of contract between the parties. In its petition the telegraph company disclaims any right or purpose to obstruct, impede, or interfere with the railroad in its use of its right of way for railroad purposes, and proposes, whenever the railroad company desires to use any part of its right of way occupied by the telegraph company for additional side tracks or other railroad use, to remove its poles, and replace them at such other places on its right of way as may be mutually agreed on by the two companies. It proposes to plant its poles or posts 80 feet from the outside edge of the rail of the track of the railroad, and upon the side of the track opposite that of the Western Union Telegraph Company's lines. The interest or estate which a railroad company acquires in lands over which its right of way extends, when they are acquired under condemnation proceedings, has been so often defined that it is familiar law. It does not acquire any estate in fee. It only acquires an easement or right of way, and this only for railroad purposes. While its right of way extends to a certain distance upon each side of its track, it has no right to occupy the way beyond its track, cuts, and fills, or to such distance and to such extent as to maintain its track and operate its trains. It can only go beyond these limits for necessary railroad purposes. It cannot sell, transfer, encumber, or use its right of way, except as its necessities and convenience may demand for the proper operation of its road. It cannot license the appropriation of any part of such right of way to private business purposes, nor to public purposes, except so far as needful, and helpful to the operation of the road itself. Jones, Easem. § 883. Its right of way can therefore have no market value, because it cannot be placed upon the market, either at private sale or public outcry. A railroad company is entitled to have a right of way by process of condemnation, because it is a work of internal improvement,—a quasi public use. But it has been held that land already taken by the exercise of eminent domain for a public use, and actually used for that purpose, may be taken by legislative authority for other public uses not inconsistent with or destructive to the former use. Mills, Em. Dom. § 45, and cases there cited. It is not insisted in this case that the use of the right of way and construction of the telegraph line will be any detriment or obstruction to the railroad, but, on the contrary, it is shown that it would be a benefit and convenience. A telegraph line along a railroad line is not only a convenience, but a necessity, and is very properly treated as a railroad appurtenance. A railroad company may therefore construct a telegraph line along its right of way, or permit another to do so; but it acquires, and can confer, no exclusive right to do so. Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Baltimore & O. Telegr. Co. 19 Fed. Rep. 660; Western U. Telegr. Co. v. American U. Telegr. Co. 65 Ga. 160, 88 Am. Rep. 781; Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Burlington & S. W. R. Co. 11 Fed. Rep. 1; Pensacola Telegr. Co. v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 96 U. S. 1, 24 L. ed. 708; 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1st ed. pp. 885, 886.

Under this view of the estate and interest which railroad companies have in their rights of way, it is difficult to see how the damages sustained by the road can be anything but nominal. We are not now considering the rights of the holders of contiguous lands, who own the fee in the lands over which the railroad has its right of way. Such rights are in no wise involved in this case, and we make no intimation upon this feature of the matter. Neither is the question raised in these cases about the measure of damages when the railroad spans a large stream by means of a bridge, and the telegraph company seeks to use the superstructure of the road as a support for its wires or fastenings. Such a condition of affairs is not presented by the record in this case, but we have only the ordinary case of the construction of a telegraph line over the railroad right of way, extending through an agricultural section of country, when the telegraph company simply desires to plant its posts in the ground, and string its wires overhead along the right of way. Neither are we considering the possible contingency that may arise when it may become necessary or expedient for the railroad company to erect and maintain its own telegraph line for the proper conduct of its railroad business, and when the erection of such line by the railroad may conflict with any other line erected by a third person or company. This is simply a case where the railroad is not using the space occupied by the posts and wires, and when it cannot convey it to another for any purpose, in which case only nominal damages arise.

It is said, with much earnestness, and with some degree of plausibility, that it would be unjust to allow a telegraph company to plant its poles along the right of way, when a railroad company had expended thousands of dollars to clear and keep it free of obstructions, and yet pay nothing for the privilege. But this view is more specious than sound; for the railroad must incur this expense for its own purposes, whether the telegraph line is there or not, and must keep its right of way clear of obstructions, whether it is occupied by a telegraph line or not, and there is no greater burden or expense because of the presence of a telegraph line. The learned trial judge in the Madison county case held, "The measure of damages to the defendant is the amount of decrease in the value of the use of the right of way for railroad purposes, when it is jointly used for telegraph purposes." This rule was, no doubt, adopted from the rule laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Chicago, 166 U. S. 248, 41 L. ed. 988. That was a case where the city of Chicago desired to open a street across a portion of the railroad right of way in the city, and instituted condemnation proceedings in the courts of Illinois. The jury awarded nominal damages of $1. The supreme court of Illinois affirmed this verdict and judgment. The case was removed to the Supreme Court of the United States. It was attempted to be shown by the railroad company that, in consequence of opening the street across its right of way, it would be put to the extra expense of erecting gates, maintaining flagmen, and planking the crossing; but this evidence, as well as evidence of the market or salable value of the land, was excluded; and the Supreme Court of the United States held that it was not error to exclude such evidence of the salable value of the land, nor the estimated increase in maintaining the roadbed, flagmen, etc. And the court laid down the rule as before stated, as applicable to railroads, though in the same proceedings and by the same jury full damages were awarded to contiguous land-owners for their lands, estimated on their value for all purposes. See also Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Cincinnati, S. & C. R. Co. 30 Ohio St. 604; Lewis, Em. Dom. §§ 499, 491, 492. It is said that the statute (Shannon's Code, § 1857) prescribes that the jury shall give the value of the land, without deduction. But this has reference to the land of owners, which may be used for all purposes. It does not refer to telegraph companies. But by § 1870, Shannon's Code, it is provided, as to these, that juries shall not be required to lay off the property privileges, rights, or easements sought to be condemned by metes and bounds, and it shall be discretionary with the jury of inquest whether they view the premises or not.—a provision which is mandatory in cases of private property taken and condemned. The right of the railroad company being simply to occupy and use the right of way for railroad purposes, it follows that it can suffer only nominal damages when that use and occupation is not interfered with or encumbered in any way.

A question is raised in the Madison county case as to the right of the defendant to have a jury trial on appeal to the circuit court on the quantum of damages; but in the view we have taken, that the defendant was only entitled to nominal damages, that question is unimportant. In the Gibson county case, damages of $12.50 were assessed upon the wrong basis; but as they are nominal in amount, and not complained of, that case will not be reversed for the error, but both are affirmed, with costs.

UTAH SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Utah, ex rel. Morgan RICHARDS, Jr., State Auditor,
v.

Francis ARMSTRONG et al.,
Salt Lake County Board of Equalization.

(.....Utah.....)

*1. Section 2579, Rev. Stat., in so far as it provides that a county board of commissioners "may remit or abate the taxes of any insane, idiotic, infirm, or indigent person to an amount not exceeding $10 for the current year," is in conflict with §§ 2 and 8 of article 13 of the Constitution of Utah, and is therefore void.

2. The word "abatement" comes as well within the prohibition of the Constitution as the word "exemption."

3. Where the legislature attempts to do indirectly, by enactment, that which it cannot do directly, under the Constitution, its enactment is void.

4. To prevent the legislature from exempting property not included within the exceptions of the Constitution, express words of inhibition are not necessary. A positive direction in the Constitution as to what property shall be exempt contains an implication against an exemption of any other property by the legislature.

5. Whether an enactment of the legislature is void because of repugnancy to the Constitution is always a question of much delicacy, and in a doubtful case should seldom, if ever, be decided in the affirmative. PETITION for a writ of prohibition to prevent the respondents from remitting or abating taxes on property of insane persons.
Granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. C. Bishop, Attorney General, for plaintiff:

Except where the Constitution has imposed limitations upon the legislative power, it must be considered as practically absolute, whether it operates according to natural justice or not in any particular case. The courts are the guardians of the rights of the people only when these rights are secured by some constitutional provision which comes within the judicial cognizance.

Exemptions are granted on considerations of general public policy.

Where a state Constitution provides a general class of property which may be exempted, such as charities, property devoted to educational and eleemosynary purposes, etc., the legislature can make no exemptions outside of such specified classes.

Messrs. Waldemar Van Cott, Graham F. Putnam, and Ray Van Cott, for defendants:

The primary meaning of the word "abatement," or "abate," is to take away or reduce a certain amount from the original sum.

"Exempt" means to be free from obligation; to release, as to be exempt from military duty, or from jury service, or from fear or pain, or from a tax—to be freed.

When property is "exempt" from taxation, it means that it cannot be taxed at all. But that is not the meaning of the word "abate." "Abate" means that the property is subject to taxation, that it can be taxed; but the law is in such a case, that a part, or the whole, of the amount may be abated, that is taken away, according to the circumstances.

In finding what restrictions are placed upon the state legislature in enacting laws, we must remember that they may legislate on every subject, so far as this case is concerned, except as expressly taken away by the state Constitution.

See Hughes v. Murdock, 45 La. Ann. 935; State, Hovey, v. Noble, 118 Ind. 850, 4 L. R. A. 101; Fox v. McDonald, 101 Ala. 51, 21 L. R. A. 529.

In construing the section of our Constitution under consideration, we are to construe and expound it in the light of the conditions existing at the time of its adoption.

Johnston v. State, Sefton, 128 Ind. 16, 12 L. R. A. 235.

When a word is used in a statute or Constitution, it is presumed to have the same meaning wherever used.

Pitte v. Shipley, 46 Cal. 161.

Prohibitions contained in the Constitution are not to be enlarged by construction.

Hughes v. Murdock, 45 La. Ann. 935.

The question whether a law is void for its repugnancy to the Constitution is at all times a question of much delicacy, which ought seldom, if ever, to be decided in the affirmative in a doubtful case.

Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch, 128, 3 L. ed. 175.

Bartch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an original proceeding in this court for a writ of prohibition to prohibit the defendants, who constitute the board of equalization of Salt Lake county, from remitting or abating the taxes of insane, idiotic, infirm, or indigent persons, under § 2579, Rev. Stat. Utah, in which it is provided, "The board may remit or abate the taxes of any insane, idiotic, infirm, or indigent person to an amount not exceeding $10 for the current year." The petitioner insists that the statute is unconstitutional and void, and that the legislature had no power, under the Constitution, to exempt any property from the burdens of taxation, except such as is expressly exempted by virtue of that instrument, and maintains that the remitting or abating of a tax is virtually an exemption. Counsel for the defendants concede that, if an abatement of the taxes is in effect the same as an exemption thereof, then the board of equalization has no authority to abate such taxes. The question, therefore, is whether an abatement of taxes on taxable property which is owned by an insane, idiotic, infirm, or indigent person is prohibited by the Constitution as being in effect an exemption of property from taxation which is not included within the list of exemptions contained in the fundamental law.

In Const. art. 13, § 2, it is provided: "All property in the state, not exempt under the laws of the United States, or under this Constitution, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as provided by law." This provision is clear and explicit, and, under its command, no property within this state, except such as is exempt by virtue of the laws of the United States, or of the Constitution of this state, can escape the burden of taxation. Id. § 8, reads as follows: "The legislature shall provide by law a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation on all property in the state, according to its value in money, and shall prescribe by general law such regulations as shall secure a just valuation for taxation of all property; so that every person and corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his, her, or its property: provided that a deduction of debts from credits may be authorized: provided further, that the property of the United States, of the state, counties, cities, towns, school districts, municipal corporations, and public libraries, lots with the buildings thereon used exclusively for either religious worship or charitable purposes, and places of burial not held or used for private or corporate benefit, shall be exempt from taxation. Ditches, canals, and flumes owned and used by individuals or corporations, for irrigating lands owned by such individuals or corporations, or the individual members thereof, shall not be separately taxed so long as they shall be owned, and used exclusively for such purpose." In construing this section, this court in Judge v. Spencer, 15 Utah, 242, said: "This provision made it incumbent upon the legislature to provide a uniform system by which every species of property within the state, not exempt by the organic law, should equally and ratably bear its due proportion of the public burden, and the legislature had no power to exempt property not exempt under the Constitution. The intention manifest from the several provisions of that instrument, respecting revenue and taxation is not only that previous territorial legislation, as to such exemptions should be repealed, but also that no power should exist in the state government to grant exemptions other than those mentioned in the Constitution." It will be observed that the classes of property which shall be exempt from taxation are specifically mentioned, but neither one of those classes, by any principle of interpretation can be made to include the property of either an insane, idiotic, infirm, or indigent person. It is manifest, therefore, that the property of none of these classes of persons is exempt under the provisions of the Constitution, and exemptions cannot be enlarged by interpretation. "The presumption is that all exemptions intended to be granted were granted in express terms. In such cases the rule of strict construction applies, and in order to relieve any species of property from its due and just proportion of the burdens of the government the language relied on, as creating the exemption, should be so clear as not to admit of reasonable controversy about its meaning, for all doubts must be resolved against the exemption." Judge v. Spencer, 15 Utah, 242.

But counsel for the defendants maintain that an abatement of taxes, as provided in the statute, is not an exemption as provided in the Constitution, that "abatement" does not mean the same thing as "exemption," and that therefore, the statute is not in excess of legislative authority, and is valid. It is true that the terms "exemption" and "abatement," in their literal sense, have different shades of meaning. This is so, to a certain extent, of the meaning of these terms, as employed in the Constitution and statute; for an exemption prevents any assessment or levy of tax in the first instance, and in that way relieves the property from the burden of taxation, while in the case of an abatement the property is relieved of its share of the burdens of taxation after the assessment has been made and the tax levied. The difference in the sense of these terms, therefore, relates to the method, rather than the effect; for the ultimate result, whether by exemption or abatement, is precisely the same. In either case the property is relieved from the burden of taxation. Now it is apprehended that the intention of the framers of the Constitution, by exempting certain property, was not so much to prevent an assessment and levy of tax thereon as to free it from the burden of maintaining the government. When the tax is abated or remitted after it has been levied, the same object is accomplished; and therefore the mandates of the Constitution, that such burdens "shall be equal and uniform" on all property within the state, except such as is exempt by the fundamental law, and that "every person and corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his, her, or its property," may be violated by either method. It is true that the statute does not permit the abatement of all the tax, as does an exemption under the Constitution; but it is equally true that if the legislature has power to enact a statute releasing property, not exempt by the paramount law, from a portion of the tax, it has power to enact one abating all the tax on such property. The same legal principles apply in either case. The meaning and intent manifest from the Constitution are that no property shall be relieved from the burden of maintaining the government, except such as was defined and specified for exemption by that instrument. No one would contend for a moment that the legislature of this state has power in express terms to exempt property from taxation, other than that enumerated for exemption in the Constitution; and yet in the enactment of the statute in question the legislature has undertaken to indirectly exempt property not so enumerated. This is an attempt to do indirectly that which could not be done directly, and the statute therefore is in violation of the Constitution, and is void, as in excess of legislative authority. To prevent the legislature from exempting property not included within the exemptions of the Constitution, express words of inhibition were not necessary. The positive direction that "all property . . . not exempt under the laws of the United States, or under this Constitution, shall be taxed," and that the rate of assessment and taxation shall be "uniform and equal," so that "every person and corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his, her, or its property," with the enumeration of the property exempted, contains an implication against an exemption of any other property by the legislature. That direction itself operates as a restraint upon the legislative power. Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 209; Konold v. Rio Grande W. R. Co. 16 Utah, 151.

A similar question to the one herein considered was before the supreme court of California in Wilson v. Sutter County Supers. 47 Cal. 91. In that case the board of supervisors, under a provision of a statute requiring the board to remit certain taxes in certain taxing districts, made an order remitting taxes in accordance with that statute. The court held that the order, and the clause of the statute under which it was made, were in violation of the provisions of the Constitution that "taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the state," and that "all property in this state . . . shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as provided by law." The court, in its opinion, said: "An order which remits the taxes upon any property within the district, causes the taxation within the district to be unequal, and is virtually an exemption of such property from taxation; and if the order remits a part of the tax on such property, the result is the same, it differing only in degree. The clause of the 20th section of the act above mentioned, providing that said board in their discretion, and for good cause shown, shall remit such other tax in said district as may to them seem just and proper, and the order of the board of supervisors, purporting to remit such taxes are, in our opinion, repugnant to the provisions of the Constitution above cited, and must be held null and void." Cooley, Taxn. 180, 204; Zanesville v. Richards, 5 Ohio St. 589; Exchange Bank v. Hines, 8 Ohio St. 1; Hunsaker v. Wright, 80 Ill. 146; Gunnison County Comrs. v. Owen, 7 Colo. 467.

In arriving at the conclusion that the provision of the statute in controversy is null and void, we were not unmindful of the fact that the question whether an enactment of the legislature is void because of its repugnancy to the Constitution is always one of much delicacy, and in a doubtful case should seldom, if ever, be decided in the affirmative. Where, however, the mind is convinced of the unconstitutionality of the law, the duty which devolves upon the court to declare it so is imperative, even where, as in this case, the statute appears to be in consonance with justice and humanity. That the law itself would be beneficent can be of no avail in this case because its effect and operation would be to exempt property, against the mandate of the fundamental law.

We are of the opinion that the demurrer to the petition must be overruled, and that a writ of prohibition must issue, restraining absolutely further proceeding under the clause of the statute herein declared void.

It is so ordered.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

Peter ANDERSON, Reapt.,

(..... Wash.)

A telephone company's lineman who is injured by contact with a span wire charged with electricity by a trolley wire an insulator of which was broken is chargeable with negligence which will preclude his recovery of damages, where he failed to test the insulator, although he had apparatus by which he could do it, and knew that there was no inspector, other than the linemen, to make such tests.

(July 1, 1898.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Spokane County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Blake & Post for appellant.

Messrs. Wirt W. Saunders and W. J. Thayer for respondent.

Dunbar, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The respondent, a servant of the Inland Telephone & Telegraph Company, brought an action against the said telephone company and the Spokane Street-Railway Company. The complaint alleges that, at the time the accident occurred, the plaintiff was a lineman in the employ of the Inland Telephone & Telegraph Company; that the two defendants used in common a pole located on the corner of Olive and Hamilton streets, in the city of Spokane; that the telephone company used said pole for holding up telephone wires, and the street railway company had fastened to said pole a span wire or guy wire, which ran to the pole from the trolley wire used by the street-railway company; that the plaintiff ascended said pole for the purpose of stringing a wire on the pole, and, while on the pole, came in contact with the span wire belonging to the street-railway company, touched the same, received an electric shock, and fell to the ground, breaking his leg, as a result of said fall; that the wire which plaintiff touched, which belonged to the street-railway company, was not designed or intended to carry electricity, but was used as a support for the trolley wire used by said street railway company, but, through the careless and negligent acts of the street-railway company, said wire was at the time charged with a strong current of electricity, and was negligently left by the street railway company uninsulated, and in a dangerous and unsafe condition; that both of the defendants knew, and by the exercise of reasonable care might have known, and that plaintiff did not know, and by the exercise of reasonable care could not have known, the fact that said wire was charged with electricity. Upon the trial of the cause, by stipulation, the street railway was dismissed from the action, and a judgment was obtained against the appellant, the Inland Telephone & Telegraph Company. From such judgment this appeal is taken.

The contention of the respondent is that it is the duty of the master to furnish the employee with a safe place to work, and with safe and suitable machinery or appliances, and that this duty is a continuing one, which is imposed upon the master during employment. There is no doubt that this proposition of law is a correct one, and it may be stated as a corollary to the proposition enunciated above, that the law charges the master with knowledge which he ought to have had; and it is settled law that he ought to know that which by the exercise of reasonable care he would have discovered. Also, it may be accepted as universally conceded law that the responsibility of the master cannot be transferred to another, and that when a duty is imposed upon him, and another is employed by him to perform that duty, the negligence of the agent will be imputed to the master. But this case must be considered with reference to another universally accepted proposition, viz., that, when a servant enters into an employment which is necessarily hazardous, he will be presumed to have assumed all the ordinary risks incident to such service; and the fact that the service is necessarily a dangerous one does not increase the master's liability if the injury resulted from the natural and ordinary incidents of the undertaking, presuming, of course, that the servant is a person of mature years and common understanding. The trouble in this case is not so much to determine what the law is in regard to the duties of master and servant as it is to apply the group of circumstances in the case to the law. It is the insistence of the appellant that, under the circumstances of this case, there was no duty resting upon the master to inspect the insulator which was the cause of the current flowing from the trolley wire to the span wire. It may be stated here that the insulator, which was a porcelain one, broke, by reason of which the guy wire came in contact with the charged wire of the railway company, and this guy wire, being attached to the post which the respondent was climbing, was the wire with which he came in contact. We have examined with particular care both the record in this case, and the cases cited by respondent and appellant, and all other authority bearing upon the case which we have been able to find, but have not been able to find a case exactly in point, it being conceded by the authorities generally that the proper application of well-known principles governing the responsibilities of masters depends largely upon the circumstances of each case. But, from such an investigation as we have been able to make, we are forced to the conclusion that no absolute duty rested upon the master in this case to prevent the charging of this guy wire, or, in other words, to preserve inviolable the insulators, so far as the safety of the respondent is concerned. The respondent here was a lineman, and had been in the employ of the company for something over two years, working first as a groundman, and for two years or more had been working as a lineman.

It is contended by the respondent that the question of whether or not the respondent was an inspector is a question of fact, upon which the testimony is conflicting, and that, therefore, the verdict of the jury upon that proposition is binding upon the court. We think, in any event, the judgment would have to be reversed by reason of the instructions given by the court; but, with the view that we take of the master's liability under the undisputed testimony, it will not be necessary to notice these errors. It is true that the respondent testified that he was not an inspector, and that he also testified, notwithstanding the fact that he had alleged in his complaint that he was a lineman, that he was not a lineman; but the testimony was evidently with reference to a definition or a statement of the lineman's duty as given by Mr. Hopkins, the superintendent of the telephone company, and the later testimony, not only of the appellant, but of the respondent and his witnesses, shows conclusively, it seems to us, that, while not nominally an inspector, the duties of a lineman embraced the duties of an inspector. Corporations of this kind act through employees. Necessarily, they cannot act in any other way. An inspection of their lines and posts and insulators must be made by the employees. In this case it is an admitted fact that there was no regular inspector and no inspectors other than the linemen. It is true that some of the railroad cases cited by the respondent decided that it was the duty of the company under certain circumstances to have inspectors, but we think none of those cases are in point here. In this case the respondent and the other linemen testified that they knew that the line or wire which occupied the insulator jointly with the wire with which respondent came in contact was charged with electricity. The respondent testified that he knew the power of electricity, and the danger that would be incurred by coming in contact with a live wire that he knew that, if the insulator broke, the result would be that the wire which he touched would be charged; and he knew also that porcelain insulators frequently did break. It seems to us that this brings him within the rule which we have announced above,—that when he accepted the employment, that was necessarily hazardous, he assumed this risk, which, under all the testimony, was an ordinary risk, and that he did not exercise the discretion which he ought to have exercised in testing this wire. The testimony shows that, shortly after the accident, one of the appellant's witnesses, Mr. Dart, observed the insulator, and separated it from the wires, and it was made an exhibit in court. He also testified that the insulator when it was exhibited was in the same condition that it was immediately after the accident, when he first discovered it. About one half of the insulator was gone, and there was some contention developed in the trial as to whether the broken part of the insulator was towards the post which respondent climbed; and it was conceded this might have been detected by a lineman who was accustomed to looking at such things, if the broken part of the insulator had been next to the post. We think, and such was the opinion of the lower court who heard the testimony, that it is demonstrated that it was a physical impossibility for the broken part of this insulator to have been in the opposite direction from the post without making a complete insulation. This, therefore, must be considered an established fact in the case. The respondent says that he glanced at the insulator when he went to ascend the post, but did not give it any particular attention, and did not make any test. The testimony of the other linemen was—and it is not controverted—that linemen carried apparatus by which they could test insulators, and that they understood that they had to look out for themselves so far as danger was concerned. It appears from the testimony that the respondent must have known that no other inspector was kept by the company, and, even if there had been, it is impracticable for an inspector to make tests that would protect workmen at all times. An inspector cannot be maintained at every insulator. An insulator might be tested and found sound at one hour of the day, and the next hour it might be broken, so that it would not insulate the wires, and the only way in which workmen could be protected would be to make these tests themselves; and it was testified in this case by the respondent that it would only have required a moment's time. While there is no gainsaying the rule that under ordinary circumstances the employee has the right to rely upon the fact that the master will furnish him a safe place to work and safe appliances, yet the law does not intend that this shall be a blind and unreasonable reliance, but that reasonable men shall exercise in a reasonable manner the faculties of which they are possessed. It seems to us it would only have been such reasonable exercise of prudence upon the part of the respondent in this case to have tested this wire before he touched it.

While there has been possibly some conflict in authority over cases which, in principle, were something like the case at bar, we think the great weight of authority sustains the view which we have taken. The first case cited by appellant—Flood v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 131 N. Y. 603, was an action for the death of the servant while working as lineman on the telegraph pole, caused by leaning his weight on one of the cross-arms, so that it broke, causing him to fall. The court there decided that the defendant's inspectors (and it seems conceded in that case that they had inspectors) were not required to climb each pole, and examine the arms; and the deceased knew this, having been employed by defendant for several years, part of the time as inspector, and the rest of the time as a lineman. The court, among other things, said: "The linemen all discharge their duties in the daytime. They have frequent occasion to climb the poles, and work about the arms, and obviously they are the persons who are expected to see the condition of the arms, and if they find them insufficient, to replace them, or to report the fact." And so in this case it was the linemen, and the linemen only, who were in the habit of climbing these poles; and under the undisputed testimony, there being no one else to inspect them, it was the duty of the linemen, before taking hold of the wire which might become dangerously charged with electricity, to test the same. So well understood are the general duties of a lineman, and the opportunities which he has for examining the poles and the instruments with which he works, that it was held in McGorty v. Southern N. E. Teleg. Co. 69 Conn. 635, that a lineman in the employ of the telephone company could not recover for an injury caused by the fall of a pole upon which he was at work, notwithstanding a prior statement by the foreman that he had been up the pole, and that it was safe, where plaintiff knew that it was the rule and custom for each lineman to test the pole for himself, and that suitable appliances were at hand for making such test, and for securing the pole in case the lineman doubted its safety.

It seems to us that the circumstances of this case are parallel with the circumstances surrounding the case at bar, although there is an attempt by respondent in his brief to distinguish them. It was true that the trial court found in that case "that it was the rule and custom, in this branch of the work, that 'each lineman should look out for his own safety in climbing poles,'" but the undisputed testimony in this case is to the same effect. Bergin v. Southern N. E. Teleg. Co. 70 Conn. 54, 89 L. R. A. 193, was a case where a telephone company and an electric railroad company used the same pole for their wires; and the court held that the law did not absolutely require the telephone company, as between it and its linemen, to inspect and test guy wires and circuit breakers put in by such railroad company, to discover whether they were in a safe condition, but whether the employer or employee should discharge such duty depended on the circumstances of the particular case. In commenting on the testimony in that case, the court said: "Linemen are employed by the telephone company, among other things, for the purpose of doing work which is dangerous, by reason of the possible contact of the telephone wires with highly-charged wires of the street railway or other companies. The linemen are to do their own testing in such work; the telephone company has no other men than the linemen to do the testing, as the linemen knew; there was nothing to prevent Delaney [who was the plaintiff in the case] from testing the guy wire; and the linemen on this job were furnished with all the tools, appliances, and wires with which to test wires of the electric street-railway company." This case seems to us in principle to be almost parallel with the case at bar. It is insisted by the respondent that the first case cited (Flood v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 131 N. Y. 603), is inconsistent with the previous case in the same court (viz. Bushby v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 107 N. Y. 374), in which it was held that the defendant was liable to a brakeman on account of a wooden stake breaking because of a latent defect. We think the circumstances of this latter case were altogether different, and it was evidently considered by the court deciding the case of Flood v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 131 N. Y. 603, that no inconsistent principles were applied in the two cases, for the former case is not overruled or mentioned in the latter opinion. Dizon v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 68 Fed. Rep. 630, was a case where the plaintiff was an employee of the telegraph company, and, when engaged with others in stringing wires on its poles, was instructed to climb a pole belonging to another company, to get certain wires out of the way. While descending, after performing the work, he fell, in consequence of one of the spikes being insufficiently secured. It was held that the danger from which the accident resulted was one of the risks of plaintiff's employment, which was assumed by him, and for which his employer was not liable. That case, however, is not as strong a case in favor of the master as the case at bar, for there the plaintiff was directed by the foreman, who was at the time acting for the defendant. The court laid down the rule in that case as follows: "The employer is not an in-suror of the safety and sufficiency of the tools, machinery, or appliances furnished to the employee for his use, nor is he a guarantor of the safety of the place where or upon or about which the employee is required to work. The duty cast by law upon the employer is to use ordinary and reasonable care to furnish safe and sufficient tools, machinery, and working places. If he has done this, he has performed the full measure of his duty. The employee, in order to recover for defects in the appliances or working places of the business, must allege and prove that the appliance was defective, or the working place insecure; that the employer had notice or knowledge thereof, or that, by the exercise of ordinary and reasonable care, he might have had such notice or knowledge; and that the employee did not know of the defect, and had not equal means of knowing with the employer." The last sentence in this proposition must be given as much force as the preceding ones; for if the employee does know of the defect, or has equal means of knowing with the employer, then, certainly, it is his unquestioned duty to investigate before proceeding. In Griffin v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 124 Ind. 326, the rule was announced that, "where the danger is alike open to the observation of all, both the master and servant are upon an equality; and the master is not liable for an injury resulting from the dangers of the business." In this case, certainly, the danger was not only as open to the observation of the respondent as it was to the master, but the undisputed testimony shows that the master obtained his knowledge of the danger through the respondent and his fellow servant. In Larson v. McClure, 95 Wis. 538, it was held that, "when the danger is alike open to the observation of all, both the master and servant are upon an equality, and the master is not liable for an injury resulting from the dangers incident to the employment." In Bedford Belt R. Co. v. Brown, 142 Ind. 659, the court said: "Every service has its own peculiar hazards, and the law does not hold the master accountable for such hazards as ordinarily and naturally belong to any service,"—and quoted approvingly Day v. Cleveland, C. O. & St. L. R. Co. 137 Ind. 206, where it was said: "In a case where the servant is one of mature age and experience, as in this case, the law never imposes the duty on the master of becoming eyes and ears for his servant, where there is nothing to prevent the servant from using his own eyes and ears to avoid danger. . . . The law requires that men shall use the senses with which nature has endowed them; and when without excuse one fails to do so, he alone must suffer the consequences, and he is not excused where he fails to discover the danger if he made no attempt to employ the faculties nature has given him." The rule is thus announced in Wood, Mast. & Serv. § 328: "When a servant is employed upon work which, equally, within the knowledge of the master and the servant, is of a dangerous nature, the master is not liable for the consequences of an accident occurring to the servant in the course of that employment, unless there be negligence on the part of the master, and the absence of rashness on the part of the servant. A servant is bound to exercise his own skill and judgment, so as to protect himself in the course of his employment, and the master is not regarded as warranting, generally, his safety. He is himself bound to exercise proper care, and cannot claim indemnity from the master for an injury resulting to him which might have been prevented if he had himself been reasonably vigilant." Substantially the same principle is announced in § 866, et seq.: "A master is not liable for injuries to his servant while using machinery in the employment . . . if the servant has the same knowledge of its defects, or the danger incident to its use, as the master [or if, in the exercise of due care, he ought to have such knowledge], and, at or before the time the accident occurred there was nothing to indicate any danger such as demanded or suggested precautions which were omitted" by the master. In this case it was equally within the knowledge of the master and the servant that this was a dangerous employment, and it cannot be said that there was negligence on the part of the master, and absence of rashness on the part of the servant, or that the servant used his skill, to protect himself in the course of his employment. He had sufficient skill, according to the undisputed testimony, to protect himself, and he had the apparatus at hand for testing the insulator and the wires. "If the servant is to recover damages," says Mr. Beach, in his work on Contributory Negligence (§ 289), "he, like any other plaintiff, comes into court under the legal obligation of showing, or having it sufficiently appear, that his own negligence has contributed in no legal sense to the injury." And in § 346 of the same work it is said: "Knowledge on the part of the employer, and ignorance on the part of the employee, are of the essence of the action; or, in other words, the master must be at fault and know of it, and the servant must be free from fault and ignorant of his master's fault, if the action is to lie. The authorities all state the rule with these qualifications." There is a wilderness of authority to the same effect, but it would serve no good purpose to reproduce it here. We have examined with patience the authorities cited by the respondent, and, except in one or two cases, notably cases with reference to damages arising from the falling of posts, which we think are in conflict with the cases cited on that subject by the appellant and noticed above, they are not in point. In all of them it appeared that the injury was caused by defects or dangers which were not apparent to the servant, or which would not have been apparent to him if he had exercised ordinary care,—such care as was consistent with the dangers incident to the employment. The citation from 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 880, to the effect that "it is the duty of a master, not only in the first instance to make reasonable efforts to supply his employees safe and suitable machinery, tools, etc., but also thereafter to make like efforts to keep such machinery, etc., in safe and serviceable condition, and to that end he must make all needed inspections and examinations," and 2 Bailey, Personal Injuries relating to Master & Servant, §§ 2619, 2620, to the same effect, are, of course, accepted as the law; but we do not think that acceptance will avail the respondent in this case, for the reason, as we before intimated, that these tests were made through the linemen for this company. The same rule is announced in Comben v. Belleville Stone Co. 59 N. J. L. 228, cited by appellant, where it is announced that the rule is subject to the qualification that the servant is without knowledge of the danger, and cannot observe and acquire the knowledge in the exercise of ordinary care in the employment. This qualification of the rule runs through all the cases.

The respondent alleges in his complaint that the plaintiff did not know, and by the exercise of reasonable care could not have known, the fact that said wire was charged with electricity. By this allegation he recognized the principle of law which we have just enunciated, and it was necessary for him to make this fact appear. We think, from an investigation of the whole case, that it appears from undisputed testimony that plaintiff did not exercise reasonable care in the investigation of the dangers which he knew were incident to his employment, and that had he exercised such care, and made the tests which reasonable prudence would have dictated, he would have had knowledge of the danger which beset him.

The accident was unfortunate, and the result most lamentable; but, with our view of the law governing the case, the judgment must be reversed, and the cause is remanded to the lower court, with instructions to dismiss the same.

WEST VIRGINIA COURT OF APPEALS.

NORFOLK & WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Plf. in Err.,

v.

PINNACLE COAL COMPANY.

(.....W. Va.....)

- *1. In the absence of legislative enactment, a justice of the peace has no authority to determine the rate of freight charges of a railroad corporation.
2. Although a justice of the peace has jurisdiction of civil actions of debt, he exceeds his legitimate powers whenever he extends such jurisdiction to include matters of controversy or causes of action unknown to the common law, and unauthorized by legislative enactment.
3. Where an enactment of the legislature which authorized such causes of action has been repealed, the jurisdiction of the justice of the peace over the same is repealed therewith, and he cannot, under the pretense of deciding whether such enactment has been repealed or not, take jurisdiction of such causes of action, and, if he does so, he is guilty of exceeding his legitimate powers, subjecting him to restraint by prohibition.
4. Under pretense of determining its jurisdiction, an inferior tribunal cannot usurp a jurisdiction which is denied to it, nor, having jurisdiction of the subject-matter in controversy, abuse or exceed its legitimate powers.
5. The jurisdiction of inferior tribunals is fixed by law, and for such a tribunal, even though in good faith, to extend its jurisdiction beyond the limitations of law, is to make it guilty of usurpation and abuse of power.
6. In all cases of usurpation and abuse of power, when the inferior court has not jurisdiction of the subject-matter in controversy, or, having such jurisdiction, exceeds its legitimate powers, prohibition now lies as a matter of right, and not as a matter of sound judicial discretion.

7. Subsections 7, 8, & 82c, chap. 54, Code 1891, as to classification of freight and rates of charges therefor, are repealed by chapter 17, Acts 1895.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Mercer County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover for an alleged overcharge for transporting coal. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. W. Reynolds and Johnston & Hale, for plaintiff in error:

The law upon which judgment for the Pinnacle Coal Company was rendered by justice of the peace W. T. Epperly was not in force, having theretofore been repealed by the act of the legislature passed February 16, 1895, and approved February 21, 1895; and the amount of the judgment being less than $15, the Norfolk & Western Railway Company, the defendant in said action, had no remedy by appeal, certiorari, or otherwise than by writ of prohibition.

The entire act of 1895 shows an intention to legislate upon the whole subject, and the act does, in fact, cover the whole subject regulating the freight charges to be made by common carriers for the transportation of freights within this state, and was intended as a substitute for the former act. The later act is so complete as to contain a provision to secure its enforcement by fine for any violation of its provisions. It is not dependent in any particular upon the provisions of the former act.

Where the legislature has by an act covered the whole subject under consideration in such manner as to show that it was intended that the later act shall be a substitute for the former, the former act is repealed by implication, notwithstanding the two acts may not be repugnant in all the parts.

If the coexistence of two sets of affirmative provisions would be destructive of the object for which the later set was passed, or if the same right would be made dependent on conflicting conditions, the earlier set will be impliedly repealed by the later.

23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 485.

The justice had no jurisdiction of the action, as it was statutory and proceeded upon a statute which had been repealed. In pronouncing judgment against the Norfolk & Western Railway Company he made a new creature in the law and created an action existing neither at the common law nor by statute of West Virginia.

Bodley v. Archibald, 38 W. Va. 229.

Under § 1, chap. 110, of the Code of West Virginia of 1891, a writ of prohibition lies as a matter of right in all cases of usurpation and abuse of power when the inferior court has not jurisdiction on the subject matter in controversy, or, having such jurisdiction, exceeds its legitimate powers.

This court has never hesitated to grant the writ of prohibition in any case where, as in the case at bar, a justice of the peace or other inferior tribunal has exceeded his or its legitimate powers, and there is no other remedy for the aggrieved party.

McConiha v. Guthrie, 21 W. Va. 184; Ensign Mfg. Co. v. Carroll, 80 W. Va. 532; Wood County Ct. v. Boreman, 34 W. Va. 362; Wilkinson v. Hoke, 39 W. Va. 403.

In other states, where there was no such broad and wise legislation as exists in West Virginia, the courts have nevertheless interfered in proper cases, either where there was no jurisdiction in the inferior tribunal, or where there was jurisdiction, but the inferior tribunal had gone beyond its legitimate power.

Appo v. People, 20 N. Y. 531; Sweet v. Hubbert, 51 Barb. 312; Baldwin v. Cooley, 1 S. C. N. S. 256; People, Higgins, v. McAdam, 22 Hun, 559; Long v. San Francisco City & County Super. Ct. 102 Cal. 449; State, St. Louis, K. & N. W. R. Co., v. Withrow, 133 Mo. 500; St. Louis, K. & S. R. Co. v. Wear, 135 Mo. 230, 33 L. R. A. 841.

In a proper case for prohibition the want of jurisdiction or the excess of power by the inferior tribunal may be made to appear by the averment and proof of facts dehors the record of the proceedings before such inferior tribunals.

Bodley v. Archibald, 38 W. Va. 229.

Dent, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The case of the Norfolk & Western Railway Company against the Pinnacle Coal Company and others presents but a single important question, and this is: When the legislature enacts a statute fixing a maximum rate of freight charges for railroad companies, and afterwards repeals such enactment, has a justice of the peace the jurisdiction, under the pretense of deciding whether such enactment has been repealed, to take cognizance of causes of action arising thereunder, hold such law still in force, and render judgment against alleged offending railroad companies for overcharge of freight? Our statute greatly simplifies the common-law remedy of prohibition. It is as follows (Code, § 1, chap. 110): "The writ of prohibition shall lie, as a matter of right, in all cases of usurpation and abuse of power when the inferior court has not jurisdiction of the subject-matter in controversy, or, having such jurisdiction, exceeds its legitimate powers." Two important changes are made in the common law: (1) The writ is no longer a matter of sound discretion but a matter of right; (2) it lies in all proper cases, whether there is other remedy or not. Prior to this enactment, which bears date in 1892, it was recognized as a concurrent remedy with appeal, writ of error, etc., only to be resorted to, however, when such other writs were inadequate. Swinburn v. Smith, 15 W. Va. 501; High, Extr. Legal Rem. §§ 770, 771; People, Ducheneau, v. House, 4 Utah, 369; People, Yearian, v. Spiers, 4 Utah, 385. These two Utah cases hold that when a justice is proceeding to try a case of which he has no jurisdiction, prohibition is the proper remedy, although an appeal would lie, as the latter is neither a speedy nor adequate remedy. The reason why it is given as a concurrent remedy at common law is found in High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 765: "Nor is it a writ of right, granted ex debito justitiæ, but rather one of sound judicial discretion, to be granted or withheld according to the circumstances of each particular case." The statutes of some other states, notably California, preserve the common-law doctrine intact by the addition of the words where there "is not a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law." Cal. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1102, 1103. Our statute contains no such words of limitation for the better reason that the legislature recognized the fact that in cases of usurpation of denied or abuse of conceded power on the part of an inferior tribunal prohibition alone would furnish a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy, as it acts directly on the tribunal as well as the litigant. Appeals, writs of error, and certiorari do not directly reach and cure the evil, for the reason that it may become chronic, epidemic, and highly damaging before these ordinary writs may be made effective. In cases of mere error, irregularity, or mistake, however gross, prohibition does not lie; not because, as is oftentimes erroneously stated, there exist other adequate remedies, or such remedies are inhibited, but for the reason that there has been no usurpation or abuse of power. In all cases within the purview of the statute, prohibition lies as a matter of right without regard to other remedies. In applications for prohibition under the statute, the only important question for inquiry is as to whether the inferior tribunal is guilty of "usurpation and abuse of power" beyond its jurisdiction, or, having jurisdiction of the subject-matter, has it exceeded its "legitimate powers?" An affirmative answer grants the writ as a matter of right, while a negative answer refuses it, though the applicant be bereft thereby of all remedy. In the present case, if the justice had jurisdiction of the matter in controversy, and did not exceed his legitimate powers, the writ must be denied; otherwise it issues as a matter of right, without regard to other remedies. According to law, constitutional and statutory, a justice of the peace is given jurisdiction of all civil actions except where the amount claimed, exclusive of interest and costs, exceeds $300, or the title to real estate is involved, or the action is for false imprisonment, malicious prosecution, slander, verbal or written, breach of marriage contract, or seduction. This includes all actions for the recovery of money when such recovery is authorized by common-law or statutory enactment. And it impliedly follows that he has no jurisdiction of any cause of action unknown at common law, and not authorized by statute. The legislature has the right to create new causes of action for the recovery of money, but a justice of the peace has not, and when he attempts to create a new cause of action he usurps legislative functions, and, if he illegally extends a certain class of actions within his jurisdiction to include a new cause of action of his own creation, he is guilty of exceeding his legitimate powers. Nor can he excuse himself by claiming that he acted in good faith in accordance with the law, as he understood it, and had the right to decide it; for it is not a question of good faith or honest purpose, but of excess of legitimate powers, and usurpation of jurisdiction over a subject-matter of which the law gives him no control, and ignorance of law is no justification therefore. In every case of usurpation or abuse of power the inferior tribunal always determines jurisdiction in its own favor, and, so with excess of legitimate power, and, if its holding affords the criterion to go by, there could never be any justification for the writ of prohibition; but it is because such court erroneously determines its own jurisdiction that the writ issues. High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 780. It always goes against a judicial tribunal and judicial action, and not that which is merely ministerial. A court that usurps jurisdiction only errs, but its error is of such a grievous nature as to call for prompt redress from a supervising tribunal. The statute uses the language "subject-matter in controversy." What is the subject-matter in controversy but the cause of action in this case,—“overcharges of freight?” The mere money demand is neither the cause of action nor the subject-matter of controversy. It is simply the measure of damages. While the controverted fact is the right of the railroad company to fix its freight charges. This is a right that can only be taken away from it by reasonable legislative enactment. And if the maximum fixed by the legislature is unreasonably low, the enactment has been lately held, in a case not yet reported, by the Supreme Court of the United States, to be void, as depriving the company of its property without due process of law. Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S. 466, 42 L. ed. 819. The question of the constitutionality of the act under consideration could not now be raised, since it has been repealed. And yet a right which is denied to a state legislature is claimed to be within the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace. In short, 41 L. R. A.

that he is clothed with the power to say when the charges of a railroad company are reasonable, simply because he has jurisdiction of money demands, and, if the amount for which he gives judgment is less than that for which an appeal lies, the company is without remedy. This would be nothing less than legal robbery. The action of the justice is justified under the color of law. A repealed statute is as though it never existed, and does not furnish color of law any more than if it had never been enacted. The only color of law the justice has is his own opinion. Nor does prohibition lie until this opinion takes the form of a judgment. It is said in High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 780: “When it does not appear that the tribunal against which the writ is sought has entertained jurisdiction of the matter in controversy, or that it has done any act showing an intention so to do, the relief will be denied, since it is not to be presumed that such tribunal will act in a matter over which it has no jurisdiction.” The justice must first err in his decision before he can be prohibited. Errors in excess of legitimate powers or abuse of jurisdiction are subject to prohibition, but errors of judgment in the proper trial of a matter within jurisdiction are not, such as insufficiency of process or service, or statement of cause of action, weight of evidence, or regularity or form of judgment, or necessary rulings during the progress of the trial,—nonjurisdictional. It is said in High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 767: “In the exercise of the jurisdiction by prohibition it is important to distinguish between the nature of the action which it is sought to prohibit, and the sufficiency of the cause of action as stated in the proceedings in the pending litigation. The nature of the action itself determines the jurisdiction of the court over the subject-matter, regardless of the sufficiency of its presentation or statement. If, therefore, the action is of such a nature as to fall within the jurisdiction of an inferior court, prohibition will not lie merely because of insufficiency in the statement of the cause of action in the pleadings, or because of insufficient proof to sustain the cause of action as stated.” There is a vast difference between stating a good cause of action imperfectly and stating an illegal cause or ground of action. In the former case the justice would have jurisdiction, and in the latter case he would not have, except to deny the want thereof; and the claim that he assumed jurisdiction in good faith in ignorance of law would not excuse him. A justice of the peace manufactures jurisdiction for himself just as much where he creates new causes of action unknown to the common law, and unauthorized by statute, as where he separates a claim beyond his jurisdiction into several causes of action within his jurisdiction. Bodley v. Archibald, 88 W. Va. 229. In the latter case strict justice may be done, though the justice act erroneously in assuming cognizance of such actions, but in the former he cannot do justice otherwise than by denying jurisdiction.

For these reasons the judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the writ of prohibition as prayed for is awarded.*

*That subsections 7, 8, § 82c, chap. 54, Code 1891, as to classification of freight and rates of charge,

Brannon, P., dissenting:

An action was brought by the Pinnacle Coal Company against the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company before a justice of Mercer county to recover for overcharge for carriage of coal from Bramwell to Bluefield, a distance of 18 miles, and judgment was rendered for plaintiff for $11.67 and costs, and then the defendant applied to the circuit court for a writ of prohibition to prohibit the justice from carrying the judgment into execution, and, a rule having issued to show cause why such prohibition should not be awarded, upon demurrer to the petition and motion to discharge the rule, the rule was discharged, thus refusing the writ of prohibition. The right of plaintiff to recover depends upon whether the rate of charge on coal is to be under subsection 8, § 82c, chap. 54, p. 562. Code 1891, or under § 2, chap. 17, Acts 1895; and that depends on the question whether the act of 1895 repeals said Code provision as to freight charge. I regard it as a question of repeal by implication, although counsel argues that it is not, but is an express repeal, because the later act contains the clause, "All acts and parts of acts which conflict with any of the provisions of this act are hereby repealed;" but as to apply this clause, we must first determine that the prior act does conflict with the later, such conflict would work a repeal by implication under general principles of construction without that clause. The inconsistency between the acts must be clear, so that the two cannot each be executed, to work repeal by implication. Sturm v. Fleming, 31 W. Va. 701.

The subjects covered by the Code are the classification of the various articles of freight and the charges thereon, and these are the subjects dealt with by the act of 1895, and therefore the matter seems to fall under the doctrine referred to in State v. Mines, 38 W. Va. 126, that "a subsequent statute revising the whole subject matter of a former one and evidently intended as a substitute for it, though it contains no express words to that effect, must, on principles of law as well as in reason and common sense, operate a repeal of the former law." See Totten v. Nightbert, 41 W. Va. 801; Red Rock v. Henry, 106 U. S. 596, 27 L. ed. 251. I repeat that these two laws make full and ample provision upon two subjects, and the only two they deal with,—that is, classification for the purpose of charge for transportation of all articles of freight, and the rates of such charge. Said subsection 7, § 82c, chap. 54, of the Code, says that "goods, merchandise, and all other kinds of property shall be classified; for the purpose of transportation, as follows"; then enumerating a large number of articles in various classes, and providing for unenumerated articles, plainly covering all articles transportable. The act of 1895 is just as wide, as it commands "a general classification of goods, merchandise, and all other kinds of property for the purpose of transportation." Now, turn to the subject of charges. The Code, in subsection 8, says that all railroad corporations, according to the classification in subsection 7, shall be limited to certain charges, covering the whole field of charge. The act of 1895, in § 2, does the same, providing for a tariff of rates on all the articles classified under § 1. Therefore I repeat that both statutes deal with, and contain complete provision for, classification and charges on all subjects capable of transportation, and thus the rule of law above specified applies. Are these acts inconsistent with each other? They are irreconcilably so. Both provide for classification, but while the Code itself made that classification, the act of 1895, while likewise requiring a classification, says the railroad company or other carrier shall make it, but so make it as to conform to the classification in general use on that railroad for interstate transportation under the act of Congress known as the interstate commerce act of February 4, 1897. This was done to harmonize the classification of articles of transportation within this state with the classification used on the same road for freight shipped from points in this state to points in other states, or from other states to points in this. Thus, the act of 1895 does not itself make a classification, whereas the Code did.

Next as to charges. The Code itself fixes a maximum rate per ton per mile, varying according to distance by sections of 50 miles, the charge diminishing for each 50 miles of transportation, and varying also with classification, articles in one of the several classifications being inflexibly charged a different rate from those in another classification. The act of 1895 requires the road to be cut up into sections of 10 miles, contemplating that rates may be made to vary according to distance. The rates are to be fixed by the company; and this act does not, like the Code, say just what rates shall be charged, only saying that the average rate for all classes of freight under the classification directed by the act shall not exceed five cents per ton per mile, except that coal and some other articles named shall not exceed three cents. Thus, different rates from those inflexibly fixed by the Code itself may be charged on the same articles. Thus the classification under the two acts may be different, articles under one class in the Code falling in another under the later act; and the length of sections measuring the charge are actually different, and the charges may be different. They cannot both coexist and be executed without jar and confusion. The act of 1895 plainly repeals and takes the place of said Code provision as to classification of articles of freight and the charges. The justice applied the wrong law to the case before him, and gave a judgment unwarranted by law. It was error of law.

But does prohibition lie to prohibit the enforcement of this judgment? I think not. It is urged that no appeal lies, nor certiorari, and, if prohibition is not granted, there is no redress. That is so. The law says that, unless the amount in controversy, exclusive of interest and costs, exceeds $15, no appeal shall lie. The law thus says that public policy demands the close of litigation with the first judgment in small matters, no matter how gross the error. In such case, we do not look at the degree of error in the judgment. The legislature has in this instance applied the maxim De minimis non curat lex (concerning very small things the law has no care). Counsel endeavors to bring the case under the old rule that prohibition lies where the inferior court has no jurisdiction, and bases this position on the theory that the action was a statutory one, and the statute to sustain it had been repealed. The action was not statutory. It was in nature an action of assumpsit for money had and received, an action to recover money. True, the statute fixed the rate of charge, and for excessive charge gave action, and, if there had been no statute to fix charges, there would be no action. In no other sense is it a statutory action. If there had been no statute fixing rate, and yet an action had been brought for overcharge, you would not say it was a statutory action. It would simply be a common-law action for the recovery of money on insufficient ground to warrant judgment. So the repeal of the statute made the action, in nature, just such an action. I do not see how it can be said, when a man brings a suit in any court basing his claim on a statute claimed by him to be in force, in a court which would have jurisdiction if it were still in force, and it is finally decided that the law was repealed, that the court proceeded without jurisdiction. It proceeded without valid cause of action, but within its jurisdiction. Who would say that in Curran v. Owens, 15 W. Va. 208, an action by a wife to recover damages for the sale of liquor to her husband, the circuit court had no jurisdiction because of the repeal of the statute on which alone the action rested? The question of a repeal of a law is a nice question of law oftentimes; and if, when held to have been repealed, the whole thing is void because of want of jurisdiction, vital principles would be reversed. You may as well say that when an action is based on the existence of a fact, and it is disproved, there is no jurisdiction. So where the action is predicated upon the supposed continued existence of a statute or rule of law decided by the court in the end not to exist. There is jurisdiction nevertheless. The contention of counsel fails to discriminate between want of jurisdiction and want of cause of action.

are repealed by chapter 17, Acts 1895, is too plain for argument, for they are inconsistent therewith, and expressly repealed by § 5 of said last-named act. As to this, see Judge Brannon's dissenting opinion.

It has been often laid down that no prohibition lies as for want of jurisdiction, if the court has jurisdiction of cases of the same general nature, unless it abuses its jurisdiction by exceeding its legitimate powers. Mere error or irregularity of the court in its rulings, as holding there is cause of action to sustain a judgment when there is not, will not call for prohibition, but it must be redressed by appeal or writ of error. Wood County Ct. v. Boreman, 84 W. Va. 362; Fleming v. Kanawha County Ct. Comrs. 81 W. Va. 608. In this connection I put the proposition that, as prohibition does not lie where an appeal will lie, and as, if this judgment had been $15, an appeal would lie, so, as it is less, it does not lie; in other words, the nature of the question as to the application of the writ of prohibition is the same where the judgment is under as where it is over the amount of $15. The amount does not give character to the judgment.

The railroad's counsel would also put the right to prohibition on § 1, chap. 110, Code, giving prohibition both where the court has no jurisdiction and where, having jurisdiction, "it exceeds its legitimate power." I think this latter clause does not enlarge the scope of the writ, and is only declaratory of the common-law office of the writ. This clause that the writ lies where the court "exceeds its legitimate power" cannot be used to extend the writ to every case of mere error. It must amount to an abuse or usurpation of power, where the court, in exercising lawful jurisdiction, does some collateral act, which under no circumstances it could do; not where it simply mistakes a bad for a good cause of action in law. Notice that the section does not merely give the writ where the court "exceeds its legitimate powers," but tells what it means by exceeding its powers, saying that the excess must amount to "usurpation and abuse of power," as it opens by giving the writ in cases of "usurpation of power" in those instances where there is no jurisdiction at all, or where, if there is, the court exceeds its power so far that there is no color of law for it, but it amounts to "usurpation or abuse of power." It is important to note those words when construing the words "exceeds its legitimate powers." I see that as far back as Blackstone the law gave prohibition, not only where the court had no jurisdiction to entertain a case at all, but that "if, in handling matters clearly within their cognizance, they transgress the bounds prescribed to them by the laws of England," the writ lay. 3 Bl. Com. p. 112. This was the law before our act. 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 263. Note that the Code says, "exceeds its legitimate powers," meaning doing some act outside the court's power as set by law, which under no color of law pertinent to the lawful exercise of its just power it could do; something not colorably sheltered by its powers in the case, but beyond them, so that it is as if there were no jurisdiction at all. Now, mere misjudgment in a case is not an excess of legitimate power. The mistaken decision as to the validity of cause of action is not only not an act done in excess of legitimate power, but clearly within it; for the law commands the court or justice to say whether the cause of action is in law good or bad. High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 767, says: "It is never allowed except in cases of a usurpation or abuse of power." In other words, the remedy is employed only to restrain courts from acting in excess of their powers, and if their proceedings are within the limits of their jurisdiction, prohibition will not lie. If, therefore, the inferior court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter in controversy a mistaken exercise of that jurisdiction or of its acknowledged powers will not justify a resort to the extraordinary remedy by prohibition." In § 767a, High says: "The nature of the action" is the test. "If, therefore, the action is of such a nature as to fall within the jurisdiction of an inferior court prohibition will not lie merely because of insufficiency in the statement of the cause of action in the pleadings, or because of insufficient proof to maintain the cause of action as stated." That is just this case. The justice was bound to decide whether there was in law sufficient cause of action to give judgment; in fact he could not possibly exercise his plain jurisdiction without deciding that matter; and to say that in so deciding he "exceeded" his "legitimate powers" is utterly untenable. He did just that which the law commanded him to do—decided the case, doing nothing outside his powers. He only erred. Buskirk v. Cabell County Circuit Ct. Judge, 7 W. Va. 91, upholds this doctrine, saying: "Prohibition can only be interposed in a clear case of excess of jurisdiction on the part of some inferior judicial tribunal. Where the matter is clearly within the jurisdiction of the inferior court, a mere error in the proceedings may be ground of appeal or review, but not prohibition." In McConiha v. Guthrie, 21 W. Va. 184, decided under this act now cited to sustain this application, the doctrine is held that there must be in the proceedings something done which "clearly exceeds its legitimate powers in some collateral matter arising in the cause over which it has no authority; but unless it has so exceeded its authority on an application for such writ the court will not inquire whether it has decided right or not." It further says: "The inferior court . . . has the right and authority to determine whether or not it has acquired jurisdiction of the particular case . . . and any error committed in that regard will not be an excess or abuse of its jurisdiction, but an error in adjudicating a matter within its legitimate authority." I do not see that the McConiha Case, or any of the cases since the enactment in 1881 of the act in question, tend to stretch the writ of prohibition to what is really nothing but mere error or irregularity. Frequent are the applications to this and other courts to do so, and I have said so much on the subject for that reason, though well I know the subject has been hitherto fully discussed. In McConiha v. Guthrie a prohibition was allowed where there was jurisdiction, but the court was condemning land which the law prohibited, and it was adjudged an act in excess of authority, and placed on that ground. In Wilkinson v. Hoke, 39 W. Va. 408, the circuit court rendered a judgment where the statute prohibited, and it was held to be acting in excess of its legitimate power, which is given as the ground of decision. The defendant company seeks by prohibition to reverse a recovery so small that statute law in Code, chap. 50, § 163, and chapter 110, § 2, enacts that it shall be final and irreversible, even though wrong; but we cannot allow this. In my judgment, the decision in this case takes from the justices' courts a jurisdiction plainly given by the Constitution to entertain an action of assumpsit for money overcharged by a railroad for freight. So a circuit court would not have jurisdiction. This decision says there must be a statute to give justices power to fix railroad rates. The Constitution and statute already give the power, not to "fix" in the first instance but to decide whether those charged in a given instance are unlawful.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

W. H. STACY et al., Appts.,

v.

Thomas LABELLE, Reopt.

(.....Wis.....)

An action against an Indian belonging to a tribe and a particular reservation, brought on contract in favor of a white man, is within the jurisdiction of a state court, in the absence of any Federal statute or treaty to the contrary.

(May 3, 1898.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Shawano County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the contract price of certain goods sold and delivered by plaintiffs to defendant who claimed that he was an Indian over whom the state court had no jurisdiction. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. F. M. Guernsey, with Mr. Eugene M. Wescott, for appellants:

There is no statute depriving state courts of jurisdiction over Indians in civil cases.

The only statute at all referring to such jurisdiction is § 2126, U. S. Stat. 1878.

There is no provision regulating making of contracts with Indians in these statutes, excepting §§ 2103 and 2104, and these sections have been definitely decided to refer simply to contracts for services to Indians relative to their lands or claims against the United States.

Rev. Stat. p. 493, Gould & Tucker's notes and cases there cited; Gho v. Jules, 1 Wash. Terr. 328; Ke-tuc-e-mun-guah v. McClure, 123 Ind. 541, 7 L. R. A. 782; Godfrey v. Scott, 70 Ind. 259.

An Indian residing in the United States is not a foreign citizen or subject within § 2 of article 3 of the General Constitution, and cannot as such maintain a suit in the circuit courts of the United States.

Karrahoo v. Adams, 1 Dill. 844; Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, 5 Pet. 1, 8 L. ed. 25.

There is no such restraint in the statutes of Congress; none in the enabling act of this state; none in the statutes of this state; and none in any treaty made by and between the government of the United States and the Menominee Indians.

State v. Doxtater, 47 Wis. 278.

Courts have power to appoint guardians over persons and property of Indian wards, members of an Indian tribe.

Farrington v. Wilson, 29 Wis. 383; Quinney v. Stockbridge, 33 Wis. 505.

If a statute which creates a right does not expressly indicate a remedy, one is implied, and resort may be had to the common law or the general method of obtaining relief which has displaced the common law.

Sutherland, Stat. Constr. p. 427; Wiley v. Keokuk, 6 Kan. 94.

NOTE.—For jurisdiction over crimes by or against Indians, see note to State v. Campbell (Winn.) 21 L. R. A. 189.

Indians are referred to as persons in—

U. S. Const. art. 1, § 2; and Elk v. Wilkins, 112 U. S. 94, 28 L. ed. 648; United States v. Crook, 5 Dill. 458; United States v. Shaw Muz, 2 Sawy. 364; Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 229.

Where, as in this case, Indians are within the boundaries of a state, the power of Congress is probably restricted to a mere regulation of intercourse.

10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 439.

Granting that Congress has such power if it has not seen fit to make any regulation inhibiting contracts and trade with the Indians in this state, nor limiting the jurisdiction of the state courts in actions at law over them, the courts of this state have such jurisdiction.

Mr. G. C. Dickinson, for respondent:

To the Congress of the United States is reserved the power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes.

U. S. Const. art. 1, § 8, subs. 3.

Commerce with the Indian tribes means or includes commerce with the individuals composing those tribes.

United States v. Holliday, 3 Wall. 407, 18 L. ed. 182.

An examination of the treaties made between the United States government and this tribe of Indians, shows that the relation of guardian and ward was created, and has been and is now recognized by the contracting parties.

Treaty of 1817; Treaty of 1832; Treaty of 1835; Treaty of 1837; Treaty of 1849; Treaty of 1854.

The state courts have no civil jurisdiction over the Indian tribes, or the individual members thereof.

The policy of the executive and other political departments of the government in its relations and intercourse with the tribe should be considered and followed by the court.

Suppose judgment is entered in this action against the defendant, and execution is issued thereon. The officer entering upon the reservation, armed with the execution, will not be protected by that process.

A removal of horses, cattle, or other stock might subject him to a criminal prosecution under the United States laws.

If it be true that the property in the possession of the Indian upon the reservation cannot be seized under process issued by the state courts, then it cannot be interfered with while off the reservation.

A garnishee proceeding has been commenced in aid of this action. A citizen of the state residing off the reservation has been garnisheed. If judgment is entered against the garnishee can it be pleaded in bar to an action brought by the United States against the garnishee to recover judgment for the amount of money claimed to be due and owing the defendant from the garnishee?

The United States courts have no jurisdiction over the Indians. They can neither sue nor be sued therein.

Cassoday, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is to recover the balance of $279.65 due on account for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered by the plaintiffs as copartners, to the defendant, between July 1, 1888, and October 17, 1889. The defendant answered, and alleged, in effect, that he bought the goods, wares, and merchandise as partner with another, and that he was an Indian belonging to the Menominee tribe; that he resided with the tribe upon the reservation; and that the same was under the charge, direction, and control of the United States Indian agent,—and prayed that the action be abated and dismissed. The cause was thereupon referred to a referee to hear, try, and determine; and, upon the cause being tried before the referee, he found, as matters of fact, in effect, that there was due to the plaintiffs from the defendant the amount claimed, with interest from October 17, 1889; that the defendant was an Indian, and belonged to the tribe, and resided upon the reservation; that there was nothing in any treaty with the tribe, nor any act of Congress, to prevent the state courts from taking jurisdiction; and hence that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment. The trial court modified the findings of the referee, but not essentially as to any question of fact, but found more in detail as to the status of the defendant as an Indian, and to the effect that the tribe held the reservation by treaty for their exclusive use and occupancy; that the same was under the charge, direction, and control of an Indian agent of the United States; that the goods and merchandise mentioned were furnished, sold, and delivered to the defendant by the plaintiffs on the reservation while Stacy was engaged in business as Indian trader on the reservation under and by virtue of the permit and license issued by the United States to him as such Indian trader; that the defendant was a Menominee Indian, and a member of the tribe, born upon the Menominee reservation, and enrolled as such; that his mother lived upon the reservation, and was a member of the tribe; that his father was a white Frenchman, and not a member of the tribe. As conclusions of law, the court found, in effect, that the treaties and acts of Congress precluded the state courts from taking jurisdiction in a case like this, and that the trial court had no jurisdiction over the defendant in this action, and ordered judgment against the plaintiff, dismissing this action, but without costs. From the judgment entered thereon, accordingly, the plaintiff brings this appeal.

Undoubtedly Congress has power "to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes" U. S. Const. art. 1, § 8. Under this clause of the Constitution it must be conceded that Congress has power to regulate all traffic and commercial intercourse among or with Indians, even when the tribe is located wholly within the limits of a single state. Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 419, 6 L. ed. 678; United States v. Holliday, 8 Wall. 407, 18 L. ed. 182; United States v. Mayrand, 154 U. S. 532, and 18 L. ed. 699. In making such regulations Congress may, undoubtedly, give to the Federal courts exclusive jurisdiction. State courts may be precluded from taking jurisdiction in such cases, not only by congressional enactments, but by treaty between the particular tribe and the Federal government; since such treaty, when made, under the Constitution becomes a part of "the supreme law of the land." U. S. Const. art. 6; Worcester v. Georgia, 6 Pet. 515, 8 L. ed. 483; United States v. Forty-three Gallons of Whiskey, 98 U. S. 188, 23 L. ed. 846; Ex parte Crow Dog, 109 U. S. 556, 27 L. ed. 1080; Farrington v. Wilson, 29 Wis. 383. But it does not follow from such mere grant of such powers to the Federal government that the state courts are precluded from taking jurisdiction in such cases, as seems to have been held by the trial court. On the contrary, the Supreme Court of the United States has frequently held, as was declared in the Federalist before the adoption of the Constitution, in effect, that the powers delegated to the Federal government were exclusive of the powers reserved to the states in only three classes of cases. One class is where the particular power granted is therein expressly stated to be exclusive; another class is where the power is granted in one clause, and then in some other clause or clauses, the states are expressly prohibited from exercising the like authority; and the other class is where the power granted is, inherently and absolutely, repugnant to the exercise of a like power by the states,—as, for instance, powers which cannot be fully exercised within the limits of a single state, like the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states." No. 31 Dawson's (No. 32) Federalist; Cooley v. Philadelphia Port Wardens, 12 How.

we must hold that a state court may take jurisdiction of an action on contract in favor of a white man, and against an Indian belonging to a tribe and a particular reservation. Stokes v. Roimon, 5 R. I. 405; Swarzell v. Rogers, 3 Kan. 374; Ingraham v. Ward, 56 Kan. 550; Godfrey v. Scott, 70 Ind. 259; Ke-tuc-e-mun-guah v. McClure, 122 Ind. 541, 7 L. R. A. 782; Gho v. Jules, 1 Wash. Terr. 326. In one of these cases it was held that "the fact that the lands of the defendant, who is an Indian, are not liable to levy and sale under a judgment, is no ground for refusing a judgment against him."

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to enter judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, and against the defendant, in accordance with the findings of the referee.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

CINCINNATI, HAMILTON, & DAYTON
RAILROAD COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

Village of BOWLING GREEN.

(57 Ohio St. 386.)

- * 1. Where a railroad company is operating a railroad, the track of which extends within the limits of any incorporated city or village in this state, such city or village is authorized by § 2494, Rev. Stat., to require such railroad company to light that part of its track which lies within the corporate limits, although the company so operating such railroad is neither the owner nor the lessee thereof.
2. The city or village has authority in such case to prescribe the kind of light that shall be employed for that purpose.
3. Where, in such case, an electric-light plant is in operation within such city or village, lighting its streets and furnishing light to its inhabitants, an ordinance is not unreasonable because it requires a railroad company to use in lighting its track the particular kind of lamp and illuminating material in use for lighting the streets of such city or village.
4. An ordinance prescribing that "the number of hours that said electric lights shall be required to be lighted during each period of twenty-four hours shall be the same as the said council does now, or may hereafter, require for electric lamps within the limits of said village for lighting streets, shall be lighted," is sufficiently definite to advise the railroad company of what it is required to do.
5. An electric-light company, owning an electric plant, and engaged in furnishing light to the inhabitants of a city or village, and in lighting the streets thereof, has so far devoted its property to a public use that it is bound to furnish light within such city or village impartially to all applicants, at a reasonable price.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wood County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in

* Headnotes by BRADBURY, J.

NOTE.—Compelling railroad to light track in city.

A city has no power, independently of statutory provision, to pass an ordinance requiring railroad companies to light their tracks within the city limits. Shelbyville v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 146 Ind. 66.

But the legislature, in the exercise of the police power, may constitutionally require railroad companies to light such portions of their railroads as 41 L. R. A.

favor of plaintiff in an action brought to compel defendant to reimburse to plaintiff the amount which it had paid for electric lights which it was defendant's duty to furnish. Affirmed.

Statement by Bradbury, J.:

This action was brought in the court of common pleas of Wood county by the village of Bowling Green to recover of the railroad company, plaintiff in error, a sum of money to reimburse the village for expenditures incurred by it in maintaining electric lights at certain places that by ordinance it had required the railroad company to maintain, and which the latter had neglected to do. The village prevailed in the court of common pleas, and the judgment there rendered in its favor was affirmed by the circuit court. To reverse the judgments thus rendered is the object of the proceedings in this court.

Messrs. Swayne, Hayes, & Tyler, for plaintiff in error:

The legislature cannot vest in the municipal corporations of this state the power to require railroad companies to light any portion of their tracks by the use and maintenance of a particular kind of a light.

The ordinance is void because it limits and unreasonably interferes with the right of the plaintiff in error to contract.

Wheeling Bridge & Terminal R. Co. v. Gilmore, 8 Ohio C. C. 658.

It is void because unreasonable in its requirements, in that electric lights are not necessary to accomplish the purpose designated by the statute.

1 Beach, Mun. Corp. § 90; State, Atty. Gen., v. Cincinnati Gaslight & C. Co. 18 Ohio St. 262.

Mr. R. B. Moore, for defendant in error: An ordinance cannot be held to be unreasonable, which is expressly authorized by the legislature. The power of a court to declare an ordinance unreasonable and therefore void is practically restricted to cases in which the ordinance was passed under the supposed incidental power of the corporation merely.

are within the limits of a city or incorporated village. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Sullivan, 22 Ohio St. 154.

And, under the police power, the legislature may authorize cities to require railroad companies to light their crossings throughout the corporate limits. Shelbyville v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 146 Ind. 66.

A law designed for such a purpose is of the same nature as laws requiring railroad companies

A Coal-Float v. Jeffersonville, 112 Ind. 19; 1 Beach, Pub. Corp. § 513.

The franchise of erecting poles and wires in the streets and ways of a city or village and furnishing electric lights to the inhabitants thereof, being in the nature of a public use, or natural monopoly, carries with it the duty to supply all with light impartially and at reasonable rates.

Bradbury*, 106 Ind. 1.

Bradbury, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in error, a railroad corporation, was operating a line of railway within this state, part of which lay within the incorporated village of Bowling Green, defendant in error. The village, deeming it necessary that a part of the railway track lying within its limits should be lighted, and there being then an electric-light plant in operation in said village, on December 21, 1891, passed the following ordinance:

"Ordinance.

"An ordinance to provide for the lighting of the track of the Cincinnati, Hamilton, & Dayton Railroad Company (operating the Bowling Green Railroad Company), within the corporate limits of the incorporated village of Bowling Green, Ohio.

"Sec. 1. Be it ordained by the council of the incorporated village of Bowling Green, Ohio, that the Cincinnati, Hamilton, & Dayton Railroad Company, possessing and operating a line of railway within the corporate limits of said village, be, and it hereby is required,—the same being deemed necessary by said council,—to light a portion of its said railway within the corporate limits of said village, with electric lights, by causing one electric lamp with the necessary attachments, similar in all respects to the electric lamps and attachments now used in lighting the streets of said village of Bowling Green, Ohio, by erecting over said railway tracks within the limits of said village at each of the following places, to wit: At the intersection of said track with the Ridge road, Adams street, Ordway avenue, Pearl street, West Wooster street, Wallace avenue, Morton avenue, and the Brown road, and by lighting said lamps with electric lights as hereinafter provided.

to fence their tracks, to build cattle guards, to whistle at road crossings, to stop at railroad crossings, to keep flagmen at street crossings, to provide spark arresters for engines, to regulate rate of speed through towns and cities, to keep headlights of certain reflecting power upon engines, to place bell and whistle upon engines, to provide bridges between cars, to provide certain kind of lighting apparatus for cars, and to keep on hand certain means of escape in case of collision, fire, etc. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Sullivan, 38 Ohio St. 154.

"Sec. 2. The number of hours that said electric lights shall be required to be lighted during each period of twenty-four hours shall be the same as the said council does now, or may hereafter, require for electric lamps within the limits of said village for lighting streets, to be lighted.

"Sec. 3. The work of lighting said parts of said railway shall be begun within twenty days after the date on which said company shall be notified of the passage of this ordinance, and the clerk of said village is hereby directed to cause notice to be given said railway company of the passage of this ordinance according to law, and in case said company shall fail to comply with the requirements of the same for a period of twenty days from the delivery of said notice, then said village of Bowling Green, Ohio, shall cause said lamps to be erected and said lighting to be done at the expense of said railway company, and the said railway company shall pay to the said village, the full costs thereof, which shall be a lien upon all the real estate and leasehold interests of said the Cincinnati, Hamilton, & Dayton Railroad Company, situate or being within Wood county, Ohio."

On January 9, 1892, notice of the adoption of the ordinance was duly given to the railroad company. The twenty days prescribed by the ordinance having elapsed, and the railroad company neglecting to comply with the provisions thereof, the village, about the 1st of March, 1892, caused an electric lamp, of the kind prescribed, to be placed at each of the five points specified by the ordinance, and thereafter, until the 1st of the ensuing September, maintained lights therein. The railroad company failing to pay the expense incurred in this behalf, the village passed the following ordinance:

"An ordinance to assess the cost of lighting the Cincinnati, Hamilton, & Dayton Railway, upon the property thereof.

"Sec. 1. Be it ordained by the council of the incorporated village of Bowling Green, Ohio, that the following cost and expense of lighting the Cincinnati, Hamilton, & Dayton Railway, and incurred under the ordinance for that purpose, heretofore passed by this council, to wit: Five arc lights for the months of March, April, May, June, 1892, $132.05, be, and the same is hereby, levied and assessed upon all the real property and leasehold interests of the Cincinnati, Hamilton, & Dayton Railway Company, situated in the county of Wood, in the state of Ohio; and if the same be not paid within ten days from the date hereof, the city solicitor is hereby directed to cause the same to be collected by an action brought for that purpose in a court of competent jurisdiction.

Thus, Ohio Rev. Stat. § 2494, authorizing a village to require a railroad company whose tracks run through it to light its tracks, constitutes a reasonable exercise of police power, and is not unconstitutional as imposing a heavy burden without due process of law, and as failing to provide for notice and hearing with relation to questions of fact under the Federal Constitution. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. St. Bernard, 15 Ohio C. C. 388.

And a municipal corporation may require a railroad company operating its road within its limits to light its tracks at street intersections, and on

"Sec. 2. This ordinance shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage and legal publication."

The railroad company failing for more than ten days to pay the sum thus demanded, this action was begun in the court of common pleas to enforce its payment. A number of defenses were interposed by the railway company, upon which the cause went to trial. No substantial dispute was had, however, over any fact which we deem necessary to establish a right of recovery in the village. The evidence disclosed that the plaintiff in error, at the time the ordinance was passed, and ever since, operated a line of railroad that extended into the village; that the ordinance prescribing the lights was duly passed, and notice thereof duly given to the plaintiff in error; that it did not maintain the prescribed lights; that the same were, during the period for which recovery was sought, maintained by the village; that the village had not been reimbursed for the money expended in that behalf; and that the city solicitor had been authorized to sue for its recovery. The right of the village to a recovery rested upon the facts just recited, and was established whenever those facts were established, provided the village had authority to require the railroad company to maintain the lights in question. The real defense was a denial of this authority.

The provisions of the statute upon which the village depends for its authority in the matter reads as follows:

"Sec. 2494. When it is deemed necessary by the council of any city or village to have any bridge or railway, located in whole or in part, in such corporation, owned, possessed, or operated by any individual, company, association, or corporation, or any portion of the same, lighted, the council shall pass an ordinance for that purpose, requiring the individual, company, association, or corporation owning, possessing, or operating the same, to light such bridge or railway within a specified time.

proper notice procure the lighting to be done, in case of failure on the part of the railroad to do so, at the expense of such company. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Bowling Green, 9 Ohio C. C. 524.

So, the Indiana act of 1893, p. 302 (Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, § 5173), authorizing cities to require all railroad companies to maintain lights at crossings on its tracks within their limits similar to those maintained by such city, authorizes an ordinance providing for electric lights where the city maintains electric lights. Shelbyville v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 148 Ind. 66.

And in Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Jacksonville, 67 Ill. 37, 16 Am. Rep. 611, involving the validity of an ordinance of a city requiring a railroad company to keep a flagman by day and a red lantern by night at a point where its track crosses a street, it was held that the general assembly, when the public exigency requires it, has power to regulate corporations in their franchises so as to provide for the public safety, and the exercise of such right in no manner interferes with or impairs the power conferred by their acts of incorporation, but that such regulations must be what they purport to be, police regulations, and must be reasonable.

The fact that electric lighting was undiscovered at the time a law was enacted authorizing municipal corporations to require railroads to light their tracks within their limits does not affect the right of the municipal corporation to require such lighting to be done by electricity. Bowling Green v. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. 10 Ohio C. C. 64.

And the court, in an action by a village against a railroad company for the recovery of amounts paid for lighting the railroad track within the limits of the corporation as required by an ordinance enacted under a statute authorizing municipal corporations to require railroad companies to light their tracks within their limits, will take judicial notice of the fact that the legislature intended that the village might require electric lighting, though at the time that the act was passed electric lighting was undiscovered. Bowling Green v. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. 10 Ohio C. C. 64.

All questions as to the expedience, necessity, or justice of the enactment of a police regulation subjecting railroad companies to the burden of lighting their roads within the limits of cities and villages through which they pass, must be determined by legislative, and not by judicial, discretion. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Sullivan, 22 Ohio St. 154.

But it is the duty of the courts to pass upon the reasonableness of the acts of a municipal corporation requiring railroads passing through it to be lighted. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. St. Bernard, 15 Ohio C. C. 538.

And the question whether an ordinance of a city requiring a railroad company to keep a flagman by day and a red lantern by night at the point where its track crosses a street is a reasonable regulation, which may be the subject of police powers, is a judicial one, though the law-making power is the sole judge, when the necessity exists for such regulation, and when, if at all, it will exercise the right to enact such laws. Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Jacksonville, 67 Ill. 37, 16 Am. Rep. 611.

A general power granted by the legislature to a municipality to require railroad companies operating within their limits to light their tracks at crossings, the manner of lighting being left to the discretion of the municipality, must be exercised by the municipality in a reasonable manner. Shelbyville v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 148 Ind. 66.

And the power of municipal corporations to require railroad companies to light their tracks, though including the right to prescribe the kind of light to be used, does not authorize the casting of an unreasonable burden upon a railroad company because of the character of the lights or their location. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. St. Bernard, 15 Ohio C. C. 538.

Nor does a power to require lights at railroad crossings for the security and safety of citizens imply that cities may require thereunder, arbitrarily and without control or restraint, lights either in volume or at times entirely unnecessary to that end. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Connersville, 147 Ind. 277, 37 L. R. A. 175.

And while a municipality has the right to fix the place and kind of lights to be erected by a railroad company under Ohio Rev. Stat. § 2494, authorizing it to require the company to light its tracks, in so doing it must exercise it with reference to the safety and protection of the public in crossing such railroad, and so as not to interfere with the just rights of the railroad company in managing its trains and locomotives in passing through such corporation. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. St. Bernard, 15 Ohio C. C. 538.

And while a measure of discretion is allowed in the common council of a municipality under an act authorizing it to require a railroad company to light crossings within its limits for the security and safety of citizens as to the streets requiring lights and the volume of light necessary, the exercise of that discretion does not admit of requirements which are far beyond any reasonable necessity.

"Sec. 2495. The ordinance shall specify the manner in which such bridge or railway shall be lighted, the number and style of lamp posts, lights, and fixtures, and the time such lights shall be kept burning in each twenty-four hours."

The railroad company contested the legality of the steps taken by the village upon a number of distinct grounds. One of these grounds was that it did not own the railway which it was required to light. In this connection it appeared that the railroad company, plaintiff in error, owned a line of railway extending from Cincinnati to Dayton, in this state, and had leased the Dayton & Michigan Railroad, with which it connected Dayton, and which extended northward from Dayton to Toledo, passing about 5 miles westward of the village of Bowling Green, and that a short line of railway had been built, which extended from a point on the latter railroad into the village of Bowling Green, defendant in error. The track which it was required to light was part of this short line of railroad. Of this short line it averred it was neither owner nor lessee, and for that reason denied the power of the village to charge it with the expense of maintaining the lights in question. This defense would be complete if the statute (§ 2494, supra), authorized municipalities to charge this burden upon such railroad company only as owned or had leased the railroad to be lighted. However, the authority conferred by the statute is not thus limited, but extends to any company that may be operating the railroad. According to the terms of the statute (§ 2494), the village had no concern respecting the title of anyone in or to the railroad in question. It had power to charge whatever company it found operating the railroad without inquiry as to the character of its title, and this is what it did in the present instance. The ordinance states, and the petition alleged, that the plaintiff in error was managing and operating the railroad in question, and this statement and allegation is nowhere disputed in the record. We hold,

And an ordinance enacted by a municipal council under a statute authorizing it to require railroad companies operating within its limits to light its track at crossings or highways, requiring that they should be lighted by electric lights of the arc pattern, the kind of light being limited only to such as should be maintained by the municipality, is invalid as confining the company to a particular kind of electric light, and as interfering with the company's freedom of contract in providing such electric lights as it might prefer. Shelbyville v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 146 Ind. 66.

So, a statute authorizing municipalities to require railroad companies to light their crossings throughout the corporate limits for the purpose of protecting citizens from passing trains, does not authorize an ordinance requiring every railroad to maintain light wherever a track of such railroad company crosses a street in the municipality, without reference to whether the security or safety of citizens requires it or not. Shelbyville v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 146 Ind. 66.

And an ordinance of a city requiring a railroad company to keep a flagman by day and a red lantern by night at a point where its track crosses a street is not a reasonable regulation which can be upheld under police power, where the crossing is an ordinary one, and there is but a single track on which only the usual trains pass at intervals some distance apart, and it does not appear that the crossing is unusually dangerous. Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Jacksonsville, 87 Ill. 37, 16 Am. Rep. 611.

And a city cannot, under the power granted by Ind. act 1896, p. 302, authorizing it to require lights at railroad crossings for the security and safety of citizens, require a railroad company whose only schedule train at night passes through the city at 8 o'clock, to light each street crossed by its road at the crossing from dark to dawn with an arc lamp of 2,000 candle power. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Connersville, 147 Ind. 277, 37 L. R. A. 175.

And a railroad company is not liable for the expense of lighting its tracks under a municipal requirement that the tracks be lighted with lights of a certain candle power, where such power is so great as to obscure the headlight upon locomotives and render it impossible for railroad employees to manage the trains so as to protect the lives of the passengers intrusted to their care, and to endanger persons crossing the railroad because they are unable to see the headlights of approaching trains.

Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. St. Bernard, 15 Ohio C. C. 588.

In Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. St. Bernard, 15 Ohio C. C. 588, the principal case was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the question as to the power of the light used did not seem to have been raised, and the case seems to turn upon the kind of light, whether electricity, gas, or otherwise, which might be used in the village.

So, an ordinance requiring railroad companies to light their tracks within the limits of a municipality on the same schedule plan adopted and used by the municipality, enacted under a statute authorizing cities to require railroad companies to keep and maintain lights on all nights that the common council may direct, is objectionable in not providing when lamps shall be lighted and how long they shall continue to burn. Shelbyville v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 146 Ind. 66.

In that case Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Sullivan, 32 Ohio St. 152, was distinguished upon the ground that in the latter case the ordinance was strictly followed, and in no way transcended the powers conferred by statute.

An ordinance passed by a municipal council under Ohio Rev. Stat. § 2494, requiring a railroad company to light its bridges or crossings within the municipal limits must specify the time within which such lighting must be done. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. St. Mary's, 14 Ohio C. C. 202.

And the omission in an ordinance passed by a municipal council under that statute to specify the time within which the same shall be done, cannot be supplied by a notice from the municipal clerk provided for by § 2496 thereof. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. St. Mary's, 14 Ohio C. C. 202.

The Ohio statute authorizing municipal corporations to require railroads passing through their limits to light their roads, however, does not require the municipality itself to furnish the light in case of failure to do so on the part of the company; it may employ others to do the lighting. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Bowling Green, 9 Ohio C. C. 524.

A municipal corporation has the legal right, under the Ohio statute, to require the lighting of a railroad track at a street crossed by the railroad company, and if the company neglects to perform the requirement, it may erect the necessary lamps and furnish the light at the expense of the railroad company, and collect it by suit if necessary. Bowling Green v. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. 10 Ohio C. C. 64.

therefore, that by the statute (§ 2494) the village, finding the plaintiff in error managing and operating a railroad within its limits, was authorized to charge it with the duty of maintaining these lights, though it neither owned nor had leased the railroad the track of which was to be lighted. This section of the statute (§ 2494) was before this court in the case of Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Sullivan, 32 Ohio St. 152, and was held to constitute a reasonable exercise of police power, and therefore constitutional. The ordinance in question specifies the points at which lights are to be maintained, and prescribes the kind of light, and the lamps and attachments to be employed. Electricity must be used, and the lamps and attachments must be in all respects similar to those used in lighting the streets of the village.

Plaintiff in error contends that these provisions are unreasonable, in that they deprive it of the power of determining the kind of light to be used and of contracting on its own behalf; that the system of lamps and attachments which the ordinance prescribes are the subject of patents, and that the exclusive right to use them within the village has been granted to the Bowling Green Electric Light & Power Company; and that, therefore, the plaintiff in error was put wholly within the power of such company by the ordinance, and will be compelled to pay whatever price the company chooses to establish or charge for the lights required.

As respects the objection to the ordinance on account of its specifying the kind of light to be used, the statute (Rev. Stat. § 2495), among other provisions, requires the ordinance to "specify the manner in which such . . . railway shall be lighted. . . . This language seems broad enough to authorize the municipality to prescribe the kind of light to be employed for that purpose,—whether electricity, gas, or any other material or means that may be reasonably adapted to the purpose. The power of selecting the kind of light to be used can be exercised, of course, only where more than one kind is available. This power must reside somewhere, either in the railroad company or the municipality. The power to require the lighting of a railroad track is a branch of the police power of the state. If the terms of this section (§ 2495) of the Revised Statutes, granting the power to municipal bodies, should not be broad enough to expressly authorize them to prescribe the kind of light to be employed, yet, as the power to compel a railroad company to light its track at all implies authority to require it to be efficiently done, it would seem to necessarily follow that, within reasonable limits, the power to prescribe the kind of lights rests with the municipal authorities. They, of course, in this respect, could not cast an unreasonable burden on the railroad company.

Doubtless, an ordinance would cast upon a railroad company an unreasonable burden, and for that reason would be void, if it prescribed an electric light, when the municipality contained no electric plant or other convenient means of generating electricity; otherwise each municipality, large or small, through which a railroad might pass, could compel those who operated the road to erect a plant to generate the light thus required. There was, however, in the village of Bowling Green, at the time the ordinance under consideration was passed, an electric light and power company, operating an electric plant, and therefore the means was at hand that would enable the railroad company to comply with the requirements of the ordinance in this respect, and therefore such requirement was not in itself unreasonable.

Did the ordinance unreasonably limit the right of the railroad company to contract on its own behalf, or unreasonably place it within the power and subject it to extortion at the hands of the electric light and power company, of which it must procure the lights? True, the railroad was required to adopt electricity as the means of illumination, and was confined to the kind of lamps and their attachments then in use in said village. If the exclusive right to use within the village these lamps and attachments had been granted by the patentees to the Bowling Green Electric Light & Power Company, and this company had an absolute power to fix the price that it could exact for the use of its light and lamps, then the contention of the railroad company would find strong support in reason and justice. It may be conceded, however, that the lamps and their attachments, as well as the system of lighting, in use in the village of Bowling Green, were all protected by patents,

And legislation authorizing villages or cities to require railroad companies to light their tracks within their corporate limits, and in case of failure or refusal by such railroads to do so, to themselves light such tracks within their limits at the expense of the owners of such railroads, and by ordinance to declare such expense to be a lien upon any and all of the real estate of the delinquent companies within their limits, is valid, and not in conflict with constitutional provisions. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Sullivan, 32 Ohio St. 154.

And a provision that the expense of lighting a railroad track by a municipality within its limits, which the railroad company had refused to light, shall be a personal liability which may be recovered by suit in the name of the corporation, and that the lien therefor upon real estate may be enforced in any court having general jurisdiction in the name of the corporation, provides for due process of law. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Sullivan, 32 Ohio St. 154.

A statutory liability of a railroad company arising from failure to comply with a police regulation that it light its tracks within the limits of a municipality, or in default thereof that the municipality shall light them at its expense, however, cannot be enforced as a tax upon the company under the taxing power. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Sullivan, 32 Ohio St. 154.

But a statutory provision that city councils may direct the manner in which the expense of lighting a railroad track which the railroad company had refused to light shall be assessed, and that when assessed the amount shall be a lien on the real estate of the railroad company, is intended to give a village council power to declare such expense a lien, etc., and the use of the word "asses" is not to be taken as an attempt to convert such expense into an actual tax or legal assessment or charge imposed in the exercise of the power of taxation. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Sullivan, 32 Ohio St. 154.

and that the Bowling Green Electric Light & Power Company had the exclusive right to their use within that village, and yet the power of extortion would not follow necessarily. The light and power company have acquired in the village rights that are in the nature of a monopoly. The use to which it has devoted its property is one in which the public have an interest, and it requires the use of the streets and alleys of the village to conduct and distribute electricity to its lamps for illuminating purposes; and, in addition to this, power to appropriate private property has been conferred on it. Rev. Stat. § 8471a. Both reason and authority deny to a corporation clothed with such rights and powers, and bearing such relation to the public, the power to arbitrarily fix the price at which it will furnish light to those who desire to use it. 2 Beach, Priv. Corp. § 884-836; Zanesville v. Zanesville Gas-light Co. 47 Ohio St. 1; Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77; Spring Valley Water Works v. Schottler, 110 U. S. 847, 28 L. ed. 173; Gibbs v. Consolidated Gas Co. 130 U. S. 408, 32 L. ed. 984; St. Louis v. Bell Teleph. Co. 96 Mo. 623, 3 L. R. A. 278; State, Webster, v. Nebraska Teleph. Co. 17 Neb. 126, 52 Am. Rep. 404; Central U. Teleph. Co. v. Bradbury, 106 Ind. 1.

The Bowling Green Electric Light & Power Company was bound to serve all of its patrons alike; it could impose on the plaintiff in error no greater charge than it exacted of others who had used its lights. The village had authority to fix the rates to be charged by the company for lights. Rev. Stat. § 2478. If the village authorities should fail to act in this respect, and the plaintiff in error and the light and power company could not agree upon a price, the latter, by an appeal to the courts of the state, could compel the former to furnish the lights at a reasonable price. Therefore the provision of the ordinance requiring the plaintiff in error to use the lamps and attachments then in use in the village was not unreasonable. Notwithstanding that the sole right to use the lamps and attachments prescribed may have been vested in the Bowling Green Electric Light & Power Company, yet, as that company was bound to furnish light to all its patrons on terms that must be both reasonable and impartial, the ordinance requiring the use of such lamps and attachments should in that respect be deemed reasonable. The right to make contracts on its own behalf is doubtless a valuable one to the plaintiff in error, and, if there had been two or more electric-light plants in the village, an attempt to dictate to plaintiff in error which of them it should choose might have presented an interesting question. There was but one, however, and the only choice open to plaintiff in error was between building a new plant or taking light of the company then established in the village. If that company had an exclusive right to use the lamps and attachments prescribed, then no choice was open to the plaintiff in error, and it would be compelled to procure the lights of that company. This, however, from a practical point of view, was of little or no concern, because, while the circumstances surrounding the plaintiff in error compelled it to take the lights of this particular company, yet the latter was also compelled to furnish them at a reasonable price. The state, under these circumstances, must yield its police power,—a power existing for the benefit of all its citizens,—or the right of a railroad company to an unlimited power of contracting must give way. This is not the only instance in which its powers in this respect are curtailed for the public good. This is notably the case in respect of its power to contract concerning the transportation of freight and passengers. The ordinance in question requires that the lights to be furnished by the plaintiff in error shall be kept lighted during the same hours that the street lamps of the village may be kept lighted. This, we think, is sufficiently definite to clearly inform the plaintiff in error of what was required of it in this respect. The ordinance, we think, imposes no unreasonable burdens on the plaintiff in error.

Judgment affirmed.

And while an averment in an action by a village against a railroad company to recover amounts claimed by the village on account of lighting the track of a railroad company at the crossing of certain streets that the company was required to light, and to erect certain electric lights by causing one electric light to be placed at each of certain crossings similar in all respects to those used by the village in lighting its streets, is open to the criticism that it is not a certain averment of any particular style of lamp, and would probably sustain a motion to make the complaint more definite and certain, it is sufficient on demurrer. Bowling Green v. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. 10 Ohio C. C. 64.

And a judgment in an action brought by a village against a railroad company for amounts assessed upon the company for lighting its tracks under an ordinance requiring the company to do so or in default thereof authorizing the municipality to light them at its expense, will be reversed, and the case remanded with an opportunity to amend where it is not averred in the petition, and there is no evidence in the record to show what, if any, was the expense to the municipality of placing and manufacturing the lights. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. St. Mary's, 14 Ohio C. C. 203.

An ordinance requiring all railroad companies to provide for the safety of citizens and others by maintaining electric lights at designated points imposing a penalty for every train run over such crossing where a light is not maintained, covers the whole subject, and effects the repeal of an ordinance previously existing requiring railroad companies to maintain an electric light of a specified power at each point where the road crosses a street, imposing a different fine for its violation. Terre Haute & L. R. Co. v. South Bend, 146 Ind. 230.

RHODE ISLAND SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Rhode Island, ex rel. Gardner T. SWARTS,

v.

Walter E. MYLOD.

(.....R. I.)

The practice of Christian Science, consisting of prayer for divine assistance, the encouragement and direction of the thoughts of the patient, without recommending or administering any drug or medicine, or giving him any course of physical treatment, is not a violation of Gen. Laws, chap. 165, prohibiting the practice of medicine or surgery in any of its branches without a certificate from the state board of health.

(July 18, 1898.)

CERTIFICATION by the District Court for the Sixth Judicial District for the opinion of the Appellate Division of a constitutional question raised in a prosecution of defendant for practising medicine contrary to the provisions of Gen. Laws, chap. 165. Judgment for defendant.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charles F. Stearns for the State,
Mr. George A. Littlefield, for the defendant:

A question involving the constitutionality of a statute should be determined only when it is impossible to dispose of a cause on its merits otherwise.

6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law 2d ed. p. 1084.

A legislative act should not be declared unconstitutional unless the point is presented in such form as to render its decision imperative.

Weimer v. Bunbury, 80 Mich. 218; Inkster v. Carver, 16 Mich. 488.

The statute does not apply to the defendant.

If the statute had been intended to apply to other people than ordinary physicians and surgeons the fact would have been indicated within it, as is the case in some other states.

Smith v. Lane, 24 Hun, 632.

If there is any doubt whether the statute includes the defendant, the benefit of it must be given to him.

Our present statute regulating the practice of medicine was passed only after many years of agitation. It was made to apply only to medicine and surgery. It would be most surprising now to have read into it between the lines every other remedial influence.

Bosworth, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was adjudged probably guilty in the district court of the sixth judicial district upon complaint of Gardner T. Swarts, secretary of the state board of health. Said complaint which was made under chapter 165, R. I. Gen. Laws, alleges that the defendant, at Providence, on the 26th day of November, 1897, "did then and there practise medicine and surgery for reward and compensation, without lawful license, certificate, and authority, and not being then and there duly registered according to law." The defendant upon arraignment, pleaded not guilty, and subsequently, and before judgment, raised a question of the constitutionality of said chapter 165, which question in accordance with the provisions of chapter 350, R. I. Gen. Laws, was certified and transmitted to the appellate division of the supreme court for decision.

R. I. Gen. Laws, chap. 165, provides for the registration of physicians, and its object is to regulate the practice of medicine and surgery. Under this chapter, authority to practise medicine and surgery is through a certificate issued by the state board of health, and said board, upon application, and without discrimination against any particular school or system of medicine, is required to issue such certificate to any reputable physician practising, or desiring to begin the practice of medicine or surgery in this state, who possesses certain specified qualifications. Section 2 of said chapter, in part, is as follows: "Sec. 2. It shall be unlawful for any person to practise medicine or surgery in any of its branches, within the limits of this state, who has not exhibited and registered in the city or town clerk's office of the city or town in which he or she resides, his or her authority for so practising medicine as herein prescribed, together with his or her age, address, place of birth, and the school or system of medicine to which he or she proposes to belong." Section 8 of said chapter is as follows: "Sec. 8. Any person living in this state or any person coming into this state, who shall practise medicine or surgery or attempt to practise medicine or surgery in any of its branches, or who shall perform or attempt to perform any surgical operation for or upon any person within the limits of this state for reward or compensation in violation of the provisions of this chapter, shall upon conviction thereof be fined $50, and upon each and every subsequent conviction shall be fined $100 and imprisoned thirty days, or either or both, in the discretion of the court; and in no case, where any provision of this chapter has been violated, shall the person so violating be entitled to receive compensation for services rendered. To open an office for such purpose, or to announce to the public in any other way a readiness to practise medicine or surgery in this state, shall be to engage in the practice of medicine within the meaning of this chapter." For the state, Everett Hall testified, substantially, that he called upon the defendant at his residence, and asked to be cured of malaria; that the defendant said that he was Dr. Mylod; that the defendant sat looking at the floor, with his eyes shaded, as if engaged in silent prayer, for about ten minutes, and then, looking up, said, "I guess you feel better;" that defendant gave him a book entitled "A Defense of Christian Science;" that he gave defendant $1; that defendant did not recommend nor administer any drug or medicine, nor take his pulse or temperature, nor do any of the things usually done by physicians. Clarence Vaughn, in behalf of the state, testified that he called upon the defendant at his residence on two occasions, and requested to be cured of the grippe; that he gave defendant

$1 each visit; that defendant said he was Dr. Mylod; that defendant gave him a card stating the defendant's office hours, and describing defendant as a Christian Scientist, but not in any way referring to defendant as a physician; that defendant did not take his pulse or temperature nor do any of the other things that physicians do in treating disease, but seemed to be sitting in silent prayer; that defendant gave him a book entitled "An Historical Sketch of Metaphysical Healing;" that defendant told him to look, not on the dark side of things, but on the bright side, and to think of God, and it would do him good, since thought governs all things. Dr. Gardnier T. Swarts, secretary of the state board of health, testified that the defendant is not a registered physician, that said defendant does not have authority to practise medicine in Rhode Island, and that physicians often cure disease without the use of drugs or medicine. For the defense, the charter of the Providence Church of Christ, Scientist, was introduced in evidence, and the defendant testified, substantially, that he is the president and first reader or pastor of said church; that said church has been organized and has held regular religious services for seven years; that said church belongs to the sect known as Christian Scientists, in whose belief God and Jesus Christ and the Bible hold a supreme place; that the principal distinguishing difference between Christian Scientists and other sects consists in the belief of the former regarding disease, which they believe can be reduced to a minimum through the power of prayer; that the public religious services of said church consist of silent prayer, music, reading of the Scriptures and of extracts from "Science and Health," by Mary G. Baker Eddy; that he, beyond a greater realization of truth which his longer study of Christian Science may have given him, professed to have no greater power over illness than that possessed by any member of his church; that he did not tell the witnesses Hall and Vaughn that he could cure them, nor did he call himself a doctor; that he did not attempt to cure them by means of any power of his own; that he assured them that it is God alone who heals, acting through the human mind; that all he did was to engage in silent prayer for them, and to endeavor to turn their thoughts to God and towards the attainment of physical perfection; that the efforts made for them were precisely the same in character as those which he makes for his congregation at public services of his church; that he does not practise medicine, nor attempt to cure disease; that he has no knowledge of medicine or surgery; that, as a Christian Scientist, he never recommended to anyone a course of physical treatment; that he has only the method of prayer and effort to encourage hopefulness, for all who come to him in public or private, and whatever disease they imagine they have; and that his ministrations often can be and are rendered as effectively in the absence as in the presence of the beneficiary. Other witnesses were called, but there was no material variance in the testimony except that the witnesses Hall and Vaughn testified that the defendant said he was Dr. Mylod, which testimony was contradicted by the defendant.

The constitutional question raised by the defendant is that under § 8, art. 1, R. I. Const., which secures to him religious freedom, he had a right to perform the acts shown by the testimony to have been performed, and that, therefore, said chapter 165, R. I. Gen. Laws, under which said complaint was made, is unconstitutional if, and in so far as, it provides a penalty for the performance of said acts. This question, properly, cannot be considered by the court unless said chapter 165 is sufficiently broad to include within its prohibitive provisions the acts of the defendant, for the defendant cannot question the constitutionality of said chapter unless his rights would be affected by its enforcement. State v. Snow, 8 R. I. 64. There is no testimony tending to show that the defendant practised or attempted to practise surgery, or that he made any diagnosis or examination to ascertain whether the witnesses Hall and Vaughn were suffering from disease, or that he administered or prescribed any drug, medicine, or remedy, or that he claimed any knowledge of disease, or the proper remedies therefor. Upon the testimony, the only claim that can be made by the state is that upon a card handed to one of the witnesses appeared the name and office hours of the defendant; that the defendant said he was Dr. Mylod; that he offered silent prayer for the witnesses Hall and Vaughn, who claimed to be suffering from disease; that he gave said witnesses each a book in which, presumably, the principles of Christian Science were taught, explained, and defended; that he told the witness Vaughn, substantially, to look on the bright side of things, and think of God, and it would do him good; and that he accepted compensation for his services. Did these acts of the defendant constitute the practice of medicine, in violation of chapter 165, R. I. Gen. Laws? It is the duty of the court to give effect to the intention of the lawmaking power as embodied in the statutes. The legislature is presumed to mean what it has plainly expressed, and, when it has so expressed its meaning, construction is excluded. It is only when the meaning of a statute is obscure, or the words employed are of doubtful meaning, that, in order to give effect to the legislative intention, the duty of construction arises. In the construction of penal statutes a well-established rule is that words and phrases must be taken in their ordinary acceptation and popular meaning, unless a contrary intent appears. While the words of such statutes are not to be restricted in meaning within the narrowest limits, neither are they to be extended beyond their common interpretation; and, if there is a reasonable doubt as to whether the acts done are within the meaning of the statute, the party accused of its violation is entitled to the benefit of that doubt. Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, §§ 329, 330. It follows, therefore, that the acts complained of are excluded from the operation of said chapter 165 unless the words "practice of medicine," taken in their ordinary or popular meaning, include them, or unless it appears from said chapter that the legislative intent was to give to said words a meaning broader and more inclusive than the popular one.

Medicine in the popular sense, is a remedial substance. The practice of medicine, as ordinarily or popularly understood, has relation to the art of preventing, curing, or alleviating disease or pain. It rests largely in the sciences of anatomy, physiology, and hygiene. It requires a knowledge of disease, its origin, its anatomical and physiological features, and its causative relations; and, further, it requires a knowledge of drugs, their preparation and action. Popularly, it consists in the discovery of the cause and nature of disease and the administration of remedies or the prescribing of treatment therefor. Prayer for those suffering from disease, or words of encouragement, or the teaching that disease will disappear and physical perfection be attained as a result of prayer, or that humanity will be brought into harmony with God by right thinking and a fixed determination to look on the bright side of life, does not constitute the practice of medicine in the popular sense. The state, however contends that said chapter 165, taken as a whole, indicates a legislative intention to give to the words "practice of medicine" a meaning broader than the popular one. In support of this contention it calls attention to the provision contained in § 8 of said chapter that "to open an office for such purpose [that is, for the practice of medicine or surgery], or to announce to the public in any other way a readiness to practise medicine or surgery in this state, shall be to engage in the practice of medicine within the meaning of this chapter." In view of this provision, the state contends that to practise medicine it is not necessary to use internal or other remedies, nor to make diagnoses, nor to have a patient, but that the opening of an office for the practice of medicine, or the announcement of a readiness to engage in such practice, constitutes a practice of medicine; and therefore, as the statute applies not only to those who actually practise, but also to those who announce in any way a readiness to practise, the state contends that the legislature intended to give a broader than the generally accepted meaning to the words "practice of medicine." We are unable to agree with this contention. Without passing upon the provision referred to, and whatever its significance, it certainly cannot be construed to broaden, in a general sense, the meaning of the words "practice of medicine." The most that can be claimed for it is that it operates to broaden the offense created by said chapter 165, so that the attempt or the announcement of a readiness to practise medicine becomes equivalent to the actual practice.

The state further calls attention, in support of its contention, to § 6 of said chapter, which provides that "nothing in this chapter shall be so construed as to discriminate against any particular school or system of medicine;" and it argues that, as the statutory prohibition relates to the practice of medicine "in any of its branches," and that as certain diseases—such as insanity and nervous prostration—are treated by the so-called "regular school" without the use of drugs, and that as all schools recognize the study of mental conditions as affecting bodily health as forming a distinct branch of medicine, the legislative intention to give to the words "practice of medicine" a construction sufficiently broad to include the practice of Christian Science is clearly manifest. The words of the provision against discrimination, like the words "practice of medicine," must be taken in their ordinary sense and meaning. It is a matter of common knowledge that among medical men there are defined differences regarding the treatment of disease. These differences have resulted in different schools or systems of medicine. A recognition of the existence of such differences, however, does not broaden the meaning of the words "practice of medicine" to include the practice of that which, in the popular sense, is not a practice of medicine. Neither does the statutory reference to the practice of medicine "in any of its branches" affect the meaning of the words in question. While it is true that the study and treatment of mental disease constitute one of the departments or branches of medicine in which the influence of the mind over the body is recognized, yet mere words of encouragement, prayer for divine assistance, or the teaching of Christian Science as testified, in the opinion of the court, does not constitute the practice of medicine in either of its branches, in the statutory or popular sense. To give to the words "practice of medicine" the construction claimed for them by the state, in the opinion of the court, would lead to unintended results. The testimony shows that Christian Scientists are a recognized sect or school. They hold common beliefs, accept the same teachings, recognize as true the same theories and principles. If the practice of Christian Science is the practice of medicine, Christian Science is a school or system of medicine, and is entitled to recognition by the state board of health to the same extent as other schools or systems of medicine. Under said chapter 165 it cannot be discriminated against, and its members are entitled to certificates to practice medicine provided they possess the statutory qualifications. The statute, in conferring upon the state board of health authority to pass upon the qualification of applicants for such certificates, does not confer upon said board arbitrary power. The board cannot determine which school or system of medicine, in its theories and practices, is right; it can only determine whether the applicant possesses the statutory qualification to practise in accordance with the recognized theories of a particular school or system. It would be absurd to hold that under said chapter 165, which provides against discrimination, the requirements necessary to entitle an applicant to a certificate were such that the members of a particular school or system could not comply with them, thus adopting a construction which would operate, not as a discrimination only, but as a prohibition. On the other hand, to hold that a person who does not know or pretend to know anything about disease, or about the method of ascertaining the presence or the nature of disease, or about the nature, preparation, or use of drugs, or remedies, and who never administers them, may obtain a certificate to practise medicine, is to hold that the operation of the statute is to defeat the beneficial purposes for which it was enacted.

The cases cited by the state do not sustain its contention. In Nelson v. Harrington, 72

Wis. 591, 1 L. R. A. 719, the plaintiff brought suit against the defendant, who was a clairvoyant physician, to recover damages for alleged unskilful treatment. In testimony it appeared that the defendant held himself out as a healer of disease, and accepted compensation; that he determined the nature of the disease for which he treated the plaintiff, and the character of the remedies he administered, while in a mesmeric state or trance condition. The court held that the defendant was bound to exercise reasonable skill, and that the knowledge of the plaintiff of his methods was no defense to the action. In Bibber v. Simpson, 59 Me. 181, which was an action brought to recover compensation for services, the opinion of the court is as follows: "The services rendered were medical in their character. True, the plaintiff does not call herself a physician, but she visits her sick patients, examines their condition, determines the nature of the disease, and prescribes the remedies deemed by her most appropriate. Whether the plaintiff calls herself a medical clairvoyant, or a clairvoyant physician, or a clear-seeing physician, matters little; assuredly, such services as the plaintiff claims to have rendered purport to be, and are to be deemed, medical, and are within the clear and obvious meaning of Rev. Stat. 1871, chap. 18, § 8, which provides that 'no person except a physician or surgeon, who commenced prior to February 16, 1881, or has received a medical degree at a public medical institution in the United States, or a license from the Maine Medical Association, shall recover any compensation for medical or surgical services, unless previous to such services he had obtained a certificate of good moral character from the municipal officers of the town where he then resided.' The plaintiff has not brought herself within the provisions of this section and cannot maintain this action." In Wheeler v. Sawyer (Me. 1888) 15 Atl. 67, the plaintiff, a Christian Scientist, brought suit to recover for services. Section 9, chap. 18, Rev. Stat. 1883, is the same as section 8, chap. 18, Rev. Stat. 1871, except that it does not relate to physicians and surgeons practising prior to February 16, 1831. The plaintiff had received the certificate of good moral character required by statute. The court said: "We are not required here to investigate 'Christian Science.' The defendant's intestate chose that treatment, and received it and promised to pay for it. There is nothing unlawful or immoral in such a contract. Its wisdom or folly is for the parties, not the court, to determine." In State v. Buswell, 40 Neb. 158, 24 L. R. A. 68, the defendant was indicted for the unlawful practice of medicine. In Nebraska (Laws 1891, chap. 35), the practice of medicine, surgery, and obstetrics is prohibited except by persons possessing certain qualifications. Section 17 of said chapter 35, in part, is as follows: "Sec. 17. Any person shall be regarded as practising medicine within the meaning of this act who shall operate on, profess to heal, or prescribe for or otherwise treat any physical or mental ailment of another." The defendant was a Christian Scientist, and the evidence against him upon which the state relied was similar in character to that in the case under consideration. The trial court instructed the jury that, in order to convict the defendant, they must find that the defendant had practised medicine, surgery, or obstetrics, as those terms are usually and generally understood, and the state excepted. The supreme court, in sustaining the exception, uses the following language: "Governed by this instruction, the jury could not do otherwise than acquit, for there was no proof to meet its requirement." Again: "The statute does not merely give a new definition to language having already a given and fixed meaning. It rather creates a new class of offenses in clear and unambiguous language, which should be interpreted and enforced according to its terms." Again: "Under the indictment the sole question presented upon the evidence was whether or not the defendant within the time charged had operated on or professed to heal, or prescribe for, or otherwise treat any physical or mental ailment of another." The decision of the Nebraska court, therefore, is that, while the practice of Christian Science is not a practice of medicine as those terms usually and generally are understood, yet that, under the section above quoted, the practice of Christian Science, being a treatment for physical or mental ailments, is a violation of the law. In Missouri the statute requires that before a person may lawfully practise medicine or surgery he must file a copy of his diploma with the clerk of the county court, and it further provides (Rev. Stat. § 6304) that any person, not qualified, who shall practise medicine or surgery, shall not be permitted to recover compensation for services rendered "as any such physician or surgeon." In Davidson v. Bohman, 87 Mo. App. 576, the plaintiff having brought suit to recover for services, the question raised was whether the services were performed by the plaintiff as a physician. The plaintiff had practised medicine lawfully for nearly thirty years, first as an allopathic physician and later as an electric physician. He had a diploma from an electric medical college, but had failed to file a copy of it as required by law. The services for which he claimed compensation consisted of electric treatment. The bill for services furnished the defendant described the plaintiff as "Dr. T. P. Davidson," and the plaintiff called a medical practitioner to testify to the value of the services in question. The court of appeals, upon the testimony, held that the services were performed by the plaintiff as a physician, and that, not being qualified to practise, he could not recover. The assumption of the title of "doctor," if defendant assumed such title, was not unlawful. Chapter 165 does not, in terms, prohibit the use of the word "doctor" by any person, whatever his business or profession may be. Its use is entirely immaterial in any case, unless under such conditions or circumstances, or in such connection, that it may serve as an announcement or indication of a readiness to engage in the practice of medicine or surgery. The object of the statute in question is to secure the safety and protect the health of the public. It is based upon the assumption that to allow incompetent persons to determine the nature of disease, and to prescribe remedies therefor, would result in injury and loss of life. To protect the public, not from theories, but from the acts of incompetent persons, the legislature has prescribed the qualifications of those who may be entitled to perform the important duties of medical practitioners. The statute is not for the purpose of compelling persons suffering from disease to resort to remedies, but is designed to secure to those desiring remedies competent physicians to prepare and administer them. See Smith v. Lane, 24 Hun, 682.

The opinion of the court is that the words

"practice of medicine," as used in R. I. Gen. Laws, chap. 165, must be construed to relate to the practice of medicine as ordinarily and popularly understood, and that the acts of the defendant do not constitute a violation of said chapter. The court therefore cannot properly pass upon the constitutional question raised, for the rights of the defendant would not be affected by any conclusion at which the court might arrive.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

Joseph SMITH, Plff. in Err.,

STATE of Tennessee.

(.....Tenn.....)

A state statute providing for separate but equal accommodations for the white and colored races on railroads is a valid police regulation, and applies both to intra and inter state travel.

(March 12, 1898.)

ERROR to the Criminal Court for Davidson County to review a judgment convicting defendant of violating the statute providing for the assignment of negroes to separate cars upon railroad trains. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Smith & Maddin, for plaintiff in error:

The states have no power to regulate interstate commerce.

Transportation of passengers is as much commerce as transportation of property, and the interstate transportation of persons is interstate commerce. The state may not regulate such commerce since it is national in its character, and requires uniformity of regulations.

A state may enact a law requiring railroad companies to provide separate equal accommodations for the two races and to assign passengers to their proper coach, if such law be confined in its application to domestic passengers, to wit, those who get aboard the train within the state, destined entirely within the state, to a point within the state.

The case of Ex parte Plessy (La.) 18 L. R. A. 639, was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, 41 L. ed. 256.

lawfully falling, neglecting, and refusing to assign certain negroes to the car and compartment of car used on the Louisville & Nashville Railroad for colored passengers, and for permitting them to ride in the car and compartment thereof assigned to white passengers. He appealed, and contests here the correctness of the judgment, upon the ground that the act referred to is invalid, as a regulation of interstate commerce, and in violation of the Constitution of the United States on that subject (art. 1, § 8), which vests in Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the states and with the Indian tribes. It is insisted, and the authorities cited to the effect, that the states have no power to regulate interstate commerce, and that the transportation of passengers from points without to points within the state or outside is such commerce, and beyond the power of state regulation. It is admitted that the act, so far as it operates to regulate commerce within the state, is valid, but it is urged that it is invalid as applied to the case of these passengers taken into the car without the state to be brought within or transported through it, as was the case in this instance; and it is urged that the question is so decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Hall v. De Cuir, 95 U. S. 485, 24 L. ed. 547. If the contention of plaintiff in error as to the effect of this decision was correct, we would hold that decision conclusive, and reverse the judgment, for we not only recognize the right of that court to determine that question, but we regard its adjudications as always correct within its province, until reversed or changed by itself, and accord to them that unhesitating respect which is due the Supreme Court of the United States as our own highest court for the settlement, and rightful settlement, of all questions which our Federal Constitution and laws submit to its judgment. If there be any courts of the states which question or attempt to avoid them, either as unauthorized or unjust, because not in harmony with any judicial or political theory of their own, this court is not one of them. We bow to its decisions, not only as right, but as just and proper expositions of the constitutional or legal questions it decides, treating it, not as a foreign tribunal, because national, in contradistinction to state, but as our own, and entitled to as much consideration as if it were organized to determine such questions alone for this state, and, more, because it is the supreme power which we have created for the ultimate settlement of all such controversies in all the states of our common government. But we are of the opinion that the question here involved was not decided in the case referred to, and, upon the aspect here presented, was not even considered. The question there was this: Under the Constitution of Louisiana, all persons were given equal rights and privileges upon any conveyance of a public character, and the legislature of that state provided substantially that all persons should be carried together in public conveyances. A carrier engaged in interstate commerce under a regulation adopted for that purpose by itself provided separate accommodations for white and colored passengers through that state and others adjacent. A colored passenger applied for transportation from New Orleans to Hermitage, both points within the state of Louisiana, and, being refused accommodations on account of her color in the cabin specially set apart for white persons, brought suit in the eighth district court for the parish of New Orleans under the Louisiana act to recover damages for her mental and physical sufferings. She obtained a judgment for $1,000. Defendant appealed to the supreme court of the state, and the judgment was affirmed. The case was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States under § 709 of the Revised Statutes. That court held that the law as construed by the state court (which construction was conclusive upon the Supreme Court of the United States) gave to all persons traveling in Louisiana upon public conveyances, though engaged in interstate commerce, equal rights and privileges in all parts of the conveyance, without distinction or discrimination on account of race or color, and dealt with it upon that aspect alone as an effort to regulate interstate commerce by the state, and not as a police measure, which it was not, and in which aspect, therefore, it was not considered. It was held to be a regulation of interstate commerce and to be void, because such power was vested alone in Congress to be exercised; and, whether it had done so or not, the state could not do it by such a law. The court said in that case: "There can be no doubt but that exclusive power has been conferred upon Congress in respect to the regulation of commerce among the several states. The difficulty has never been as to the existence of this power, but as to what is to be deemed an encroachment upon it; for, as has been often said, 'legislation may, in a great variety of ways, affect commerce and persons engaged in it, without constituting a regulation of it within the meaning of the Constitution.' Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S. 103, 23 L. ed. 820; State Tax on Railway Gross Receipts, 15 Wall. 284, 21 L. ed. 164. Thus, in Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77, it was decided that a state might regulate the charges of public warehouses, and in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Iowa, 94 U. S. 155, 24 L. ed. 94, of railroads situate entirely within the state, even though those engaged in commerce among the states might sometimes use the warehouses or the railroads in the prosecution of their business. So, too, it has been held that states may authorize the construction of dams and bridges across navigable streams situate entirely within their respective jurisdictions. Willson v. Blackbird Creek Marsh Co. 2 Pet. 245, 7 L. ed. 412; Pound v. Turk, 95 U. S. 459, 24 L. ed. 525; Gilman v. Philadelphia, 8 Wall. 713, 18 L. ed. 96. The same is true of turnpikes and ferries. By such statutes the states regulate, as a matter of domestic concern, the instruments of commerce situated wholly within their own jurisdictions, over which they have exclusive governmental control, except where employed in foreign or interstate commerce. As they can only be used in the state, their regulation for all purposes may properly be assumed by the state, until Congress acts in reference to their foreign or interstate relations. When Congress does act, the state laws are superseded only to the extent that they affect commerce outside the state as it comes within the state. It has also been held that health and inspection laws may be passed by the states (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 6 L. ed. 23), and that Congress may permit the states to regulate pilots and pilotage, until it shall itself legislate upon the subject. (Cooley v. Philadelphia Port Wardens, 12 How. 299, 13 L. ed. 996). The line which separates the power of the states from this exclusive power of Congress is not always distinctly marked, and oftentimes it is not easy to determine on which side a particular case belongs. Judges not unfrequently differ in their reasons for a decision in which they concur. Under such circumstances it would be a useless task to undertake to fix an arbitrary rule by which the line must in all cases be located. It is far better to leave a matter of such delicacy to be settled in each case upon a view of the particular rights involved." Nothing better illustrates the last suggestion of the learned judge than his own view as enforced by citations in the particular case. The proposition suggested was the power of the state to regulate internal commerce, and upon this he indiscriminately cited cases so holding along with those which did hold a wider power to exist in the state when it belonged to that class known as the police power, which he was not considering. The Louisiana Constitution and act were not dependent upon, or in the exercise of, such a power. A requirement that all persons who travel shall travel together is not in any sense a police regulation. It is easy to perceive how it might conduce to the comfort, health, or safety of persons traveling to be separated; but no reason of this kind can be found, nor any other of a police nature, for requiring that all should be crowded or mixed together; and, presumably, therefore, as it did not arise, no such question was made. It certainly was not considered or decided in that case. The reference to authorities (some of which do relate to it) was only on a proposition as to the state's right to legislate upon domestic matters, but the reference included several which showed that such a right, if exercised under a valid law in respect to matters included in the police powers of the states, might be lawfully exercised, if so directed, although it seriously affected interstate commerce. No such distinction was there made, though later it was done, and with great force, by the same court. As already said, it was not presented as a police regulation. It was not such, but was a regulation, pure and simple, of interstate commerce. It was not an act passed in the exercise of a police power. It was based upon no such power, nor did it purport to be. The decision that it was, hence, not a valid law, was a matter of course.

But in the same opinion, Judge Waite, to enforce the idea of the impropriety of such a state regulation, read an argument supposed to be applicable to any regulation or any law affecting the transportation of passengers, showing the great hardship and inconvenience to which interstate carriers would be subjected upon a different construction. He said: "If each state was at liberty to regulate the conduct of carriers while within its jurisdiction, the confusion likely to follow could not but be productive of great inconvenience and unnecessary hardship. Each state could provide for its own passengers, and regulate the transportation of its own freight, regardless of the interests of others. Nay, more, it could prescribe rules by which the carrier must be governed within the state in respect to passengers and property brought from without. On one side of the river or its tributaries he might be required to observe one set of rules, and on the other another. Commerce cannot flourish in the midst of such embarrassments." This was a very persuasive view on the mere question of confining a state's regulation of commerce to its own borders, when no necessity of health, comfort, or safety, and no proper police regulation, was involved. It is urged here, and has been so urged in all such cases since, but the argument has been distinctly rejected by the Supreme Court of the United States in several cases where the law considered was one enacted under the police power, and was, of course, a reasonable exercise of that power. The question was practically a new one when the opinion of Judge Waite was delivered, and the application of the rule as to the power of the states to affect interstate commerce by legislation was in the formative state, and in much confusion, as he himself shows. Since that time it has been much considered and debated, and many opinions have been delivered, which mark far more distinctly and far more accurately "the line which separates the powers of the states from this exclusive power of Congress," which at that time the learned judge observed to be so uncertainly and indistinctly marked. The cases subsequent to this in connection with it and those preceding have established three distinct propositions: First, that any legislation by a state, whether it be or not in the exercise of the police power, though it incidentally and remotely affect interstate commerce without constituting a regulation of it, may be valid; second, that in the reasonable exercise of the police power a state may impose burdens upon interstate commerce which occasion both inconvenience and hardship to the carrier, provided Congress has not directly acted upon the same subject; third, that laws passed under the police power of the state for the reasonable regulation of travel and transportation are not regulations of interstate commerce in the objectionable sense, under the Constitution. Specifically, they have also settled, fourth, that laws providing for the separation of the white and colored races in public conveyances, giving each equal privileges of travel and accommodation are reasonable and are valid exercises of state authority under the police powers, although they affect and impose burdens upon interstate commerce. Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, 41 L. ed. 256; Hennington v. Georgia, 163 U. S. 299, 41 L. ed. 166; New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. New York, 165 U. S. 628, 41 L. ed. 858; Gladson v. Minnesota, 166 U. S. 427, 41 L. ed. 1067; Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. v. Mississippi, 183 U. S. 587, 38 L. ed. 784, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 801. In the first of these cases, such a statute, not applying to interstate commerce, was upheld as a police regulation which was reasonable, and as not obnoxious to the 18th or 14th Amendments to the Constitution of the United States. Judge Harlan dissented with the ability and vigor for which that distinguished judge is noted, and with the vehemence and want of strict accuracy, pardonable because general, if not universal, in unanswered dissent, in which he supposed instances of unreasonable exercise of that power in opposition to the argument that its reasonable exercise was justified, and was not obnoxious to the Federal Constitution, which proposition alone the majority opinion maintained. But the decision in the second case commented upon here—Hennington v. Georgia—was delivered by Judge Harlan, and in this, with great clearness and accuracy, the distinction was asserted between general legislation to regulate commerce and special reasonable legislation under the police power to provide for the health, safety, well-being, comfort, and morals of the public, and that the right of the state to exercise this power existed, and that, if such legislation did not go beyond the necessities of the case, it was valid, at least until Congress interferes. He enforces this view with much strength of reasoning and citation of authority, and indeed, reiterates a view which may go beyond this, for in the conclusion of his opinion he says: "Local laws of the character mentioned have their source in the powers which the states reserved, and never surrendered to Congress, of providing for the public health, the public morals, and the public safety, and are not within the meaning of the Constitution, and considered in their own nature, regulations of interstate commerce simply because, for a limited time or to a limited extent, they cover the field occupied by those engaged in such commerce." It is worthy of note here that the judge is not limiting the field of state legislation to questions of health, morals, and safety. These happen merely to be those subjects of police legislation which he enumerated in the particular statement quoted, but elsewhere he had spoken of those relating to the order, the comfort, and the well-being of the public; but neither does this addition make the list complete. What was intended, and all that was intended, to be expressed was that those subjects included in the police power of the state were not surrendered to Congress by the grant of any other powers not expressly including any one or more of them. The body of the opinion is devoted, though, to maintaining the proposition suggested that the power remains in the state until Congress has acted. In reference to this he says: "The distinction here suggested is not new in our jurisprudence. It has been often recognized and enforced by this court. In Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 203, 210, 6 L. ed. 23, 71, 73, this court recognized the possession by each state of a general power of legislation that embraces everything within the territory of a state, not surrendered to the general government, 'all which can be most advantageously exercised by the states themselves.' Inspection laws, although having, as the court said in that case, 'a remote and considerable influence on commerce,' are yet within the authority of the states to enact, because no direct, general power over the objects of such laws was granted to Congress. So, also, quarantine laws of every description, if they have real relation to the objects named in them, are to be referred to the power which the states have to make provision for the health and safety of their people." It is immaterial upon which theory it be treated as vested, whether upon that that the power never was vested in Congress to so regulate interstate commerce as to destroy the power of state police regulation, or whether upon the proposition that such power vested could not destroy it until exercised, the result is the same, for it is not pretended in the case under consideration that Congress, if it has the power, has yet undertaken to legislate on the particular subject, or to forbid the exercise by the state of the police power to control this question.

It was not a new suggestion that the power granted to regulate commerce was not unlimited, or was not intended to give Congress such power where the regulation attempted was contrary to the proper and reasonable police regulations of the different states. As pointed out by Judge Clifford in his concurring opinion in the case of Ha't v. De Cuir, referring to Chancellor Kent's analysis of the view of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Gibbons v. Ogden, there were three limitations or restrictions on the power conferred upon Congress to regulate interstate commerce. They were: "(1) That the power does not extend to that commerce which is completely internal, and is carried on between different parts of the same state, not extending to or affecting other states; (2) that the power is restricted to that commerce which concerns more states than one, the completely internal commerce of a state being reserved for the state itself; (3) that the power conferred does not prohibit the states from passing inspection laws or quarantine or health laws and laws for regulating highways and ferries, nor does it include the power to regulate the purely internal commerce of the state, or to act directly on its system of police,"—citing 1 Kent, Com. 12th ed. p. 437. Later, in commenting on the opinion, and contrasting it with another delivered by the same judge (Chief Justice Marshall), Judge Clifford says: "Evidently he had no occasion to refer to it or to any of its doctrines, as he properly described the creek over which the dam was erected as a low, sluggish water, of little or no importance, and treated the erection of the dam as one adapted to reclaim the adjacent marshes, and as essential to the preservation of the public health, and sustained the constitutionality of the law authorizing the erection, upon the ground that it was within the reserved police powers of the state." But we need not pursue this subject further, for, as already stated, whether these powers remain always in the state as not granted, or whether they remain until congressional action, is immaterial. In either event, the law we are considering is valid so far as this constitutional objection goes. It remains only to consider whether it is a proper and reasonable exercise of the police power of the state, for, as was said in Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 587, 41 L. ed. 256, "every exercise of the police power must be reasonable, and extend only to such laws as are enacted in good faith for the promotion of the public good, and not for the annoyance or oppression of a particular class."

The caption and body of the act (Acts 1891, chap. 52) are as follows:

An Act to Promote the Comfort of Passengers on Railroad Trains by Requiring Separate Accommodations for the White and Colored Races.

Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the state of Tennessee that all railroads carrying passengers in the state (other than street railroads) shall provide equal but separate accommodations for the white and colored races, by providing two or more passenger cars for each passenger train or by dividing the passenger cars by a partition so as to secure separate accommodations, provided that any person may be permitted to take a nurse in the car or compartment set aside for such persons: provided that this act shall not apply to mixed and freight trains which only carry one passenger or combination passenger and baggage car, provided always that in such cases the one passenger car so carried shall be partitioned into apartments, one apartment for the whites and one for the colored.

Sec. 2. Be it further enacted that the conductors of such passenger trains shall have power and are hereby required to assign to the car or compartments of the car (when it is divided by a partition) used for the race to which such passengers belong, and should any passenger refuse to occupy the car to which he or she is assigned by such conductor, said conductor shall have power to refuse to carry such passenger on his train, and for such refusal neither he nor the railroad company shall be liable for any damages in any court of this state.

Sec. 3. Be it further enacted, that all railroad companies that shall fail, refuse, or neglect to comply with the requirements of section one of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction in a court of competent jurisdiction, be fined not less than $100 nor more than $500, and any conductor that shall fail, neglect, or refuse to carry out the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction, be fined not less than $25 nor more than $50 for each offense.

Sec. 4. Be it further enacted that this act take effect ninety days from its passage the public welfare requiring it.

It will be seen that the act provides for separate accommodations, but for equal accommodations. It imposes no burden on either race, and gives to each the same privileges. Even in the matter of carrying nurses of another race, it gives to the colored passenger the same right to take a white nurse into the car for colored people that it does to the white passenger to take a colored nurse into that provided for white people. It is entitled, if that were material, "An Act to Promote the Comfort of Passengers." It may operate for this purpose, or to promote the safety of one or both, or to further the ends of good order. If it be true, as is sometimes said, that race prejudices exist here that make it uncomfortable or unsafe, or promotive of disorder, to mix the races in public conveyances, then both safety and good order are promoted, as well as comfort in their separation. The state is to judge of the necessity for such a regulation. Whether either or both should be uncomfortable, unsafe, or liable to the injury or annoyance of disorder by such intermixture in travel is not the question. The question is whether it, in fact, is so, or whether the state legislature reasonably deemed it so, and provided against the consequences. It is in these respects, therefore, entirely reasonable. No good reason can be perceived why such legislation is objectionable or why it might not even be extended. If California or any of the states of the West should take a like view as to intermixture of their Chinese population with that of native or white people in public conveyances, it seems clear that for the same reasons they might enact the same laws, and, indeed, yet others, for the separation of other races who might be hostile or prejudiced towards each other.

The argument that it imposes unnecessary burdens on the carrier, to which so much weight was given in the De Quir Case, is not relevant, if it be a police regulation of a reasonable and proper character. The same argument was made, and on this ground repudiated, in the cases of New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. New York, 165 U. S. 628, 41 L. ed. 858, and Hennington v. Georgia, 163 U. S. 299, 41 L. ed. 166.

We conclude, therefore, that the law is a reasonable police regulation, and applies both to intra and inter state travel; that it is not invalid for any reason, or obnoxious to the Federal Constitution; that the question is an open one under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States; and that there is no reversible error in the judgment of the court below. It is therefore affirmed.

VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

SOUTHERN EXPRESS COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
COMMONWEALTH of Virginia, ex rel.
James A. WALKER.

(92 Va. 59.)

1. Pecuniary forfeiture under Code,

NOTE.—For fine as a cruel or unusual punishment, see note to State, Garvey, v. Whitaker (La.) 35 L. R. A. on page 567.

section 1220, for the charge by an express company of greater rates than it is authorized to charge, is not within Const. art. 8, § 7, setting apart for a literary fund "all fines collected for offenses committed against the state."

2. A statute directing half of a forfeiture or fine to be paid to the informer does not violate Const. art. 8, § 7, setting apart as a permanent literary fund "all fines collected."

3. Code, section 1220, fixing at $100 the minimum fine for the charge by an express company of rates greater than it is authorized to charge, and failing to prescribe a maximum limit, does not violate Const. art. 1, § 11, prohibiting the imposing of "excessive fines."

4. The 8th Amendment to the Federal Constitution does not apply to the states.

(August 1, 1895.)*

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wythe County to review a judgment in favor of relator in a proceeding to collect a forfeiture provided by statute for an alleged overcharge by defendant in freight rates. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Blair & Blair for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Walker & Caldwell, for defendant in error:

Article 14, § 1, of the Amendments to the United States Constitution at no time has been construed to interfere with the police regulations of a state.

The law applies to express companies doing a carrier business within the state, transporting goods from one point to another within that state. It applies to them as a class, and is general in its operation, and is enforceable in the usual modes established in the administration of government with respect to kindred matters.

The United States Constitution has no control of fines imposed by a state merely because they are excessive.

Spies v. Illinois, 123 U. S. 131, 31 L. ed. 80.

The legislature is in no position to prejudge how large a forfeiture would be necessary to deter express companies from making excessive charges, so they contented themselves by fixing a minimum forfeiture and delegated the power to the juries of the state to decide what forfeiture would be necessary to keep these charges within the law.

The verdicts of juries are always under the control and supervision of the courts presiding, who see to it that the jury are not governed by passion or prejudice in arriving at their conclusions.

State v. Craig, 80 Me. 85; Code, §§ 8903, 3904.

That part of the forfeiture, and that alone, that is designated by the Code for the state shall go to the literary fund.

A fine is a punishment imposed by law upon one convicted of crime or misdemeanor.

The word may include a forfeiture or penalty recoverable in a civil action.

1 Bouvier, Law Dict. p. 662.

Forfeiture means a penalty recoverable in a civil action.

By the language of the Constitution, the word "fine" clearly means fines imposed in criminal prosecutions.

State v. Indiana & I. S. R. Co. 133 Ind. 69, 18 L. R. A. 502; State v. Pennsylvania Co. 133 Ind. 700.

Actions to recover damages by way of a penalty are not criminal prosecutions, but strictly civil in their nature.

Spicer v. Rees, 5 Rawle, 119, 28 Am. Dec. 648; Ott v. Jordan, 116 Pa. 218.

Riely, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There is but a single question involved in this case, and that relates to the constitutionality of § 1220 of the Code of Virginia. Its validity is assailed by the plaintiff in error on several grounds.

The first and main objection is based on § 7 of article 8 of the Constitution of the state, which sets apart, as a permanent and perpetual literary fund, among other resources, "all fines collected for offenses committed against the state." It is contended that the forfeiture provided for in § 1220 is embraced by the term "fines" so set apart by the Constitution, and that the gift of one half thereof for the use of the informer is a misappropriation or diversion, to that extent, of a fund which has been dedicated to the literary fund, and that the statute is therefore in conflict with the fundamental law, and invalid. This compels an inquiry into the meaning of the words quoted from the Constitution. What "fines" are here intended or comprehended? The answer is found in the language of the Constitution itself. They are "fines collected for offenses against the state;" that is, fines imposed by law as a punishment for crime. Fines constitute, in whole or in part, the punishment for many of the smaller offenses at common law, and also for many offenses created by statute, and these are the "fines" which the constitutional provision was designed to cover. It comprehends only those fines which are affixed as penalties for crime, and are recoverable upon the conviction of the offender, and does not embrace those pecuniary penalties or forfeitures provided by statute, that a popular or qui tam action (which is a civil action) may be brought to recover. Such is the forfeiture prescribed by § 1220, and which was sued for and recovered in this case.

Section 1215 prescribes the rates which an express company may charge, and § 1220 provides a pecuniary forfeiture for their violation. The gravamen of this suit is that the express company, in exacting payment of the defendant in error for a package carried by it, exceeded the rate allowed by law. For the express company to charge for carrying packages of goods and moneys is a perfectly legitimate act. It is in no sense criminal. The act complained of here is entirely innocent, in itself, and is only contrary to law because the charge exacted was greater than the statute allows. It is not characterized by the statute as a crime, or prosecuted and punished as such. This view is enforced by the provisions of § 1220, in that they do not dedicate the entire forfeiture for the use of the state, but direct that one half thereof shall be for the use of the informer, who is enabled to recover it by a civil suit in the name of the state, without a criminal prosecution and conviction. It is clear that the forfeiture in question is not a penalty for a crime,—“an offense committed against the state,”—but simply a forfeiture for an act which the lawmaking power of the state, in its wisdom, deemed necessary to prevent imposition upon its citizens; and, being so, it is not affected by the Constitution, and the legislature had the right to prescribe the forfeit, and then dispose of it at its pleasure, either wholly to the state or partly to the state and partly to the informer and others. The term “fines,” used in the Constitution, literally construed, does not comprehend forfeitures. “A fine is a pecuniary punishment imposed by a lawful tribunal upon a person convicted of crime or misdemeanor.” 1 Bouvier Law Dict. 662. In chapter 31 of the Code the word “fine” includes a pecuniary forfeiture, penalty, and amercement; but that is by virtue of the special enactment (§ 745), and it could not affect the proper construction of the term “fines” as used in the Constitution.

The Constitution of Indiana contains a provision very similar to that under discussion in the Constitution of our own state. It provides that the common-school fund of the state shall consist of, and be derived from, “the fines assessed for breaches of the penal law of the state; and from all forfeitures which may accrue.” Article 8, § 2. A statute was enacted imposing a certain duty upon every corporation or person operating a railroad in that state, and affixing a penalty for its violation, to be recovered in a civil action in the name of the state, one half of which should go to the prosecuting attorney, and the remainder to be paid to the county in which the proceeding was had, and constitute a part of the common-school fund. It was contended in the case of State v. Indiana & I. S. R. Co. 138 Ind. 69, 18 L. R. A. 503, that the statute diverted or misappropriated the penalty contrary to the provision of the Constitution above referred to; but the court held that the “fines” specified in the Constitution had reference to fines assessed in criminal prosecutions, and that the penalty affixed to the statute for its violation was not a fine in that sense. It therefore sustained the constitutionality of the statute. This decision strongly corroborates the construction it has seemed to us should be given to the similar provision contained in § 7, art. 8, of our own Constitution. See also State v. Pennsylvania Co. 133 Ind. 700; and Ott v. Jordan, 116 Pa. 218.

But if the constitutional provision so relied on to invalidate § 1220 were susceptible of the construction contended for by the counsel for the plaintiff in error, it would not invalidate it. Such conclusion could only be reached by a very literal and narrow construction. The Constitution does not impose fines nor provide for their enforcement. To the legislature belongs the duty of providing for their enforcement and collection, and also of imposing them, except where they are imposed by the common law. It could not have been intended or expected by the framers of the Constitution that the laws imposing fines for offenses could be enforced or collected without cost or expense. They must have contemplated that fines, in being enforced and collected, should bear the burden of such means as the legislature might deem best adapted to compel their enforcement and collection, and only intended to appropriate to the literary fund the amount coming to the state after deducting such part as the legislature may have set apart to secure their enforcement and collection. If the legislature possesses the right, as it does, to impose a fine or forfeiture, it has the power, as appurtenant to such right, to prescribe the proceeding or adopt the means deemed by it most likely to result in the enforcement of the fine or forfeiture. If it thought that its policy, as evidenced by the forfeiture provided for in § 1220, was more likely to be enforced by giving one half of the forfeiture for the use of the informer, it had the right to do so, and only such part as it reserved for the use of the state would be covered by the constitutional provision. This is not an appropriation or diversion of the fine to an object other than that to which the Constitution dedicates it. On the contrary, all of the fine, beyond what the legislature has deemed proper to set apart to stimulate the prosecution and secure the enforcement of the fine, goes to the literary fund, as required by the Constitution. Moreover, it has been the practice of the legislature, for a hundred years or more, in declaring forfeitures and fixing fines in certain cases, to provide, with the view of stimulating prosecutions in such cases, that an informer should be entitled to a part of the forfeiture or fine. Many such statutes were in the Code of Laws of the state, and in force, at the formation of the present Constitution, when § 7, art. 8, was introduced for the first time into the organic law. It is to be presumed that its framers were familiar with these statutes. And, being familiar with them, it could hardly be that they intended to invalidate them, or, by such indirection, to prohibit a long established policy of the legislature, but that they simply intended to dedicate to the literary fund that part of such forfeitures and fines which was reserved to the state. So, then, in neither view, is § 1220 repugnant to the Constitution.

It is next contended that the minimum fine of $100 is excessive, and in violation of § 11, art. 1, of the Constitution, which provides that “excessive fines” ought not to be imposed. The imposition and regulation of fines belong to the legislature, and to its discretion and judgment the widest latitude must be conceded. Fines are to be fixed with reference to the object they are designed to accomplish. The degree of criminality of the offense, or the illegality or impolicy of the act, they are intended to punish or prevent, are elements that must enter into their consideration. The peace of society and the welfare of the people occasionally require that the legislature shall create new offenses, and affix penalties for their violation, or alter the penalties for others already existing. What is to be the legislative guide, in the performance of this duty, but its sound judgment and the wisdom of experience? And how can the courts with reason or propriety question the action of the legislature, or control or restrain its discretion, except where the minimum penalty is so plainly disproportioned to the offense or act for the violation of which it is affixed as to shock the sense of mankind?

Bearing in mind these considerations, which must affect the regulation of fines, and the discretionary power of the legislature, how can the court say that the minimum fine prescribed in § 1220 is excessive? By what standard is it to determine this question? A fine that would prove efficacious in the case of an individual, and beyond which it would appear to be excessive to go, would be likely to prove ineffectual in the case of a corporation, with its aggregated wealth and power, and its disposition to act, oftentimes, in an arbitrary manner, because of the inability of private persons to contend against its illegal and wilful acts. The minimum fine prescribed by § 1220 cannot be declared to be excessive by any standard which the courts can apply, and this objection need not be further considered.

It is further contended that the statute is unconstitutional in that it fails to prescribe a maximum limit to the forfeiture, and thus places it within the power of a jury, through caprice or prejudice, to mulct a corporation with a fine of so large an amount as practically to destroy it. If a supposition so extreme, and so unlikely ever to be confirmed, were to be verified, in consequence of the failure to fix a maximum limit to the forfeiture, still we are unable to see how that would render the statute obnoxious to the bill of rights, or § 11, art. 1, of the Constitution. How could the bare possibility that an excessive fine might be imposed by a jury invalidate the statute? If so, a statute otherwise valid might be annulled by a possibility that might never happen. If a jury were to render a verdict so excessive as to contravene the inhibition of the Constitution, the wrong or vice would lie in the verdict, and not in the statute. And the objection overlooks the fact that, if a jury were to impose such a fine, it is the province of the court, and would be its duty, to set aside the verdict. The question as to an excessive fine is a judicial one, and does not affect the validity of the statute. When, if ever, any such fine is imposed by a jury, the corrective hand of the court will annul it, in accordance with the letter and spirit of the bill of rights.

The only remaining objection to the statute is that it is repugnant to article 8 of the Amendments to the Constitution of the United States. It is a sufficient answer to this objection to say that the Supreme Court of the United States has held, time and again, that the 8th article of the said Amendments has reference solely to powers exercised by the government of the United States, and does not apply to the states. O'Neil v. Vermont, 144 U. S. 323, 38 L. ed. 450; Eilenbecker v. Plymouth County Dist. Ct., 184 U. S. 81, 38 L. ed. 801; Perryer v. Massachusetts, 5 Wall. 475, 18 L. ed. 608, and Livingston v. Moore, 7 Pet. 469, 8 L. ed. 751.

There is no error in the judgment of the Circuit Court, and it is therefore affirmed.

v.

(55 Neb. 462.)

- *1. Where commercial paper is indorsed in blank, the terms of the contract may be shown by parol evidence to be different from that which the law implies in such cases.
2. A restrictive indorsement in unambiguous language cannot be contradicted or explained by evidence resting in parol.
3. A certificate of deposit indorsed by the payee, "Pay to the order of R. C. O. Cash, for account" of the indorser is a restrictive indorsement, vests no general property to the paper in the indorsee, but merely constitutes him an agent for the purpose of collecting; and parol evidence is not admissible to establish that the transfer of the title was absolute.

defendants in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a certificate of deposit which was alleged to have become the property of the plaintiff. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. J. C. Cowin and W. D. McHugh for plaintiff in error.

Mr. O. H. Scott, for defendants in error:

Usage cannot make a contract where there is none, nor prevent the effect of the settled rules of law.

National Bank v. Burkhardt, 100 U. S. 692, 25 L. ed. 769; Barnard v. Kellogg, 10 Wall. 890, 391, 19 L. ed. 990.

The restrictive words of indorsement on the certificate of deposit gave notice of the trust ingrafted upon it, and if the Capitol National Bank passed it off for its own debt or in any other manner violative of the trust, the transferee would take it subject to the trust.

It was an indorsement that destroyed the negotiability of the drafts except for purposes of collection, and gave notice to all parties through whose hands they passed that they were the property of the transmitting bank.

If the paper is indorsed "For collection for account of the depositor," and then deposited and credit given, the mere fact that paper thus indorsed is credited by a bank to the depositor as cash, and the privilege is accorded to him of drawing against the credit, may not, as it seems, be sufficient to vest the bank with the title to such paper.

Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Continental Bank, 148 Mass. 553, 2 L. R. A. 699; Levi v. National Bank, 5 Dill. 107; Balbach v. Frelinghuysen, 15 Fed. Rep. 683; Morse, Banks, & Banking, §§ 584, 586.

In its letter acknowledging the receipt of the Shelby draft the Fidelity Bank stated that it had credited the same "subject to payment." This must be understood as meaning that the credit was merely provisional, that is, conditional on payment, and that it did not intend to assume the risk of payment, or give an absolute credit, or put itself in any other relation of the paper than that of an agent for collection.

Branch v. United States Nat. Bank, 50 Neb. 470.

The mere crediting of the amount of the draft upon the account of the transmitting bank will not give the collecting bank any claim thereon prior to its collection.

Where a banker has received from his correspondent a draft indorsed for collection, which is indorsed in like manner to his correspondent, he cannot appropriate the proceeds collected thereon to the latter's debt to itself and refuse to pay the owner.

The Capitol National Bank could not in any event acquire title or ownership in the paper in controversy, being at the time of the receipt thereof irretrievably insolvent.

Messrs. J. W. Deweese and F. E. Bishop, also for defendants in error on motion for rehearing:

An indorsement for the "account of" or "for collection," does not pass the title, but is notice to everybody handling the paper that the title rests in the original party so indorsing.

If there is a conflict in the testimony, the finding of the jury or the trial court will not be interfered with on the questions of fact.

Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Steear (Neb.) 73 N. W. 466.

The question whether or not in sending the certificate in question to the Capitol bank the Hebron bank parted with the title is settled by the indorsement and the letter of transmittal.

This is a question of fact.

Metropolitan Nat. Bank v. Loyd, 25 Hun. 101, 90 N. Y. 580; Titus v. Mechanics' Nat. Bank, 35 N. J. L. 589; Re State Bank, 56 Minn. 119; Fifth Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 40 Fed. Rep. 46; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Johnston, 133 U. S. 566, 33 L. ed. 683.

This question of fact is to be determined, however, by the indorsement itself, if it is a restricted indorsement.

If the authorities generally are so unsettled on the question at issue concerning this indorsement that the courts would feel justified in disregarding them and looking to the Nebraska decisions alone, then we refer to Branch v. United States Nat. Bank, 50 Neb. 470. In this case it is said: Such a form of indorsement is not intended to give currency to commercial paper, but, on the contrary, operates to prevent further circulation, and passes to the indorsee such a title only as will enable him to demand payment and enforce collection of paper thus transferred, and the owner may in such case control the collection of his paper, and may intercept the proceeds thereof in the hands of an intermediate agent.

The Capitol bank could not change itself from agent to debtor.

Commercial Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 39 Fed. Rep. 691, 148 U. S. 51, 37 L. ed. 364; Re State Bank, 56 Minn. 119; First Nat. Bank v. Bank of Monroe, 33 Fed. Rep. 411; Beal v. Somerville, 5 U. S. App. 14, 50 Fed. Rep. 650, 17 L. R. A. 291, 1 C. C. A. 598.

The indorsement was one merely for collection, and did not pass title.

First Nat. Bank v. Reno County Bank, 3 Fed. Rep. 257; Balbach v. Frelinghuysen, 15 Fed. Rep. 675; Re Armstrong, 33 Fed. Rep. 406; Armour Packing Co. v. Davis, 118 N. C. 548; Boykin v. Bank of Fayetteville, 118 N. C. 566.

The title of the certificate in question did not pass to the Capitol bank by the indorsement and letter of transmittal; the crediting of the amount to the Hebron bank on the books of the Capitol bank without collection, and the right to charge back to the Hebron bank on failure to collect, did not change the effect of the indorsement; and parol proof could not be received as competent to change the effect of the written indorsement and letter of transmittal.

Wilson*, 51 Iowa, 15; Third Nat. Bank v. Clark, 23 Minn. 263.

After the first hearing in the case, Irvine, C., on December 9, 1897, filed the following opinion:

This was an action by the United States National Bank of Omaha to recover the amount of a certificate of deposit for $5,500 issued by the defendants Geer and Mease (partners in the banking business, at Nelson, under the name of the Commercial Bank) to the order of the defendant Craven, by him indorsed, and transferred to the defendant the First National Bank of Hebron. It is claimed by the plaintiff that the certificate was by the Hebron bank sold and transferred to the Capitol National Bank of Lincoln, and by the Lincoln bank to the plaintiff. The Hebron bank, by its answer, asserts ownership in itself; claiming that the Lincoln bank received the certificate merely as the agent of the Hebron bank for the purpose of collection, and that, the indorsement being restrictive, the Lincoln bank could not and did not pass title to the Omaha bank. The right to the certificate, as between these two parties, is the only matter in contest; there being no issues affecting the other defendants, except such as may be incidental to the controversy indicated. The district court found in favor of the Hebron bank, and entered judgment accordingly.

Similar questions have been presented to the courts with such frequency, and such variety of detail, that there now appear in the books an array of opinions which would be hopelessly confusing, were they to be considered as tending to establish general rules of law for determining such questions. They range all the way from those holding that, as between the parties even, title passes by the legal import of words used by way of indorsement, regardless of intent, to those practically resting the matter on the presumed motive of the indorser, disregarding entirely the form of the transaction and the contractual intent. While intermediate to these extremes are found many cases presenting marked resemblances to that before us, and solved in different ways by different courts, we are saved the necessity of an analysis of such cases for the purpose of deducing therefrom a general rule of law, by attention to a very simple proposition recognized, in effect, by counsel on both sides. A moment's reflection will show that the question is not what legal relations result from a deposit for collection alone, or from a sale or discount, but it is whether this was such a deposit or a sale; that is, whether title passed. The solution of this question rests in determining the common intent of the parties,—a question of fact, and not of law. Among the cases expressly, or by clear implication, treating the question as one of fact, are Metropolitan Nat. Bank v. Loyd, 25 Hun, 101, 90 N. Y. 580; Titus v. Mechanics' Nat. Bank, 85 N. J. L. 589; Re State Bank, 56 Minn. 119; Fifth Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 40 Fed. Rep. 46; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Johnston, 183 U. S. 566, 88 L. ed. 688.

There is no conflict in the evidence. Such doubts as exist arise as to inferences from facts proved, and not as to the existence of those facts. For ten years preceding the events in controversy, the Hebron bank and the Lincoln bank had a continuous course of dealings with one another; the Hebron bank keeping an account with the Lincoln bank, and remitting to it, from time to time, drafts, checks, and other instruments, which were, either at once or upon collection, placed to the credit of the Hebron bank. It is said that the banks were not "correspondents," but, so far as the evidence discloses, the only difference between their relations and those of banks confessedly occupying the relation in contemplation by witnesses who use that somewhat ambiguous term, was that, while the Hebron bank drew drafts for general banking purposes upon its correspondents at Omaha and eastern cities, it drew against its credit at the Lincoln bank only for the purpose of transferring funds to its so called correspondents, and not in favor of its customers generally. So far as the treatment of paper sent by the Hebron bank was concerned, there was no difference between its relations with the Lincoln bank and with its Omaha correspondent. We mention this fact merely because, in argument, some stress seems to be laid on the supposed difference in relations. There is no room for doubt that the motive which influenced the Hebron bank to maintain the account at Lincoln was to secure an economical method of collecting its "foreign paper," or, more accurately, to secure an economical and speedy method of realizing cash, or a credit equivalent thereto, upon such paper. The motive of the Lincoln bank appears only by inference. It collected paper at par, except where it was itself subjected to expense in favor of third parties, and then charged against the paper only the expense so incurred. It paid the Hebron bank interest on daily balances. It seems quite clear that its motive, therefore, was to obtain the temporary use of the property of the Hebron bank so intrusted to it, for banking purposes. Paper remitted was divided into two classes, styled by most of the witnesses, "cash items" and "collections;" by officers of the Hebron bank as "sight items" and "time items." It is certain, however, that the latter nomenclature was inaccurate, as the distinction was only partly based on the time of payment. In the cash items were included all the instruments presently payable, on solvent banks, and between individuals of known solvency, other paper belonging to the collection class. The classification was determined by the character of the paper, and not by the form of indorsement, or the terms of the transmitting letter. Thus, the form of indorsement on both classes seems to have been, "Pay to the order of R. C. Outcault, Cash., for account of First National Bank of Hebron, Nebr." In remitting printed forms were used, bearing after the address the words, "Inclosed please find for collection and ———." The blank was usually filled with the abbreviation "Cr." All witnesses agree that the language so employed was not regarded as of any significance in determining the disposition of the paper. If the paper fell within the collection class, it was noted on the Hebron bank's collection register as having been sent, and its number on that register was noted on the blank with which it was transmitted. On receipt by the Lincoln bank, it was entered on the latter's collection register, and the Hebron bank was by mail notified that it had been received, and would obtain "prompt attention." When collected, it would be credited to the Hebron bank, and the latter notified of the fact. The Hebron bank would then charge its amount to the Lincoln bank. If the paper was a "cash item," the Hebron bank would charge it to the Lincoln bank at once, on remitting it; and the Lincoln bank would credit it to the Hebron bank immediately on its receipt, and notify the Hebron bank that it had been so credited. No further notice would be sent the Hebron bank, unless the paper should be dishonored, in which event its amount would be charged to the Hebron bank, and the latter so notified, the paper being returned. Interest was paid on the general balance, including, as it did, these cash items, which had been credited upon their receipt, but not yet collected. It would seem that, by the custom of banks in such cases, when a credited item is dishonored interest thereon is charged to the remitting bank from the time credit was given, and that the Lincoln bank was authorized by such custom to so treat the Hebron bank, but it would also seem that such right was never in fact exercised. During the period referred to, certain notes of the Hebron bank were rediscounted by the Lincoln bank; and, some of these not being paid at maturity, the Lincoln bank exercised, and the Hebron bank acknowledged, the right to immediately charge them back to the Hebron bank in the same manner as dishonored cash items. The balance at any time to the credit of the Hebron bank was subject to be drawn upon, including that amount representing credited, but uncollected, cash items. The officers of the Hebron bank testify that they habitually refrain from so drawing until a reasonable time should elapse for the collection of such items, and that they regarded the privilege of sooner drawing, as an act of courtesy, and not a legal right; but there can be little doubt that both banks regarded the apparent balance as an available fund, and that abstention from drawing by the Hebron bank, prior to the collection of items, was an act of convenience or prudence on its part, rather than the recognition by it that the apparent credit was premature.

On the 20th day of January, 1898, the Hebron bank, being then the owner of the certificate of deposit in controversy, remitted it, with other items, to the Lincoln bank. It was indorsed in the usual manner, "for account of" the Hebron bank and was transmitted, as usual, "for collection and credit." It was treated by both banks as a cash item, in the manner above described. On sending it, the Hebron bank charged it to the Lincoln bank; and, on receiving it, the Lincoln bank credited it to the Hebron bank, and notified the latter of that fact. It was received by the Lincoln bank on the 21st, and the same day transmitted to the plaintiff, the Omaha bank, under substantially similar circumstances, and in pursuance of similar usages and a similar course of dealing. The Lincoln bank charged it to the Omaha bank, and the latter credited it to the Lincoln bank. On the morning of the 21st the account of the Lincoln bank was overdrawn with the Omaha bank some $1,900. Including the amount of the certificate, credits were that day given the Lincoln bank amounting to over $3,000. The Omaha bank that day paid out on checks and drafts of the Lincoln bank, nearly $17,000. It thus appears that the whole of the credit obtained by the certificate was the same day exhausted by payments actually made in favor of the Lincoln bank. The Lincoln bank was hopelessly insolvent, to the knowledge of its officers, and was closed on the afternoon of the 21st, never to reopen. On the 23d, the certificate was presented to the Nelson bank, and payment refused, because of the claim interposed by the Hebron bank. Perhaps certain other facts of which the court takes notice are of some import. Nelson, where the certificate was payable, is in the county adjoining that in which Hebron is located, to the west, and the two towns are connected by a line of railroad. Lincoln is a considerable distance to the northeastward of both towns, and Omaha is still further northeast. It is not claimed that the diversion of paper from its natural geographical course is in itself any proof that it is being transmitted for other purposes than collection, but the fact that the Hebron bank found it profitable to send the paper through such a course indicates that the purpose of the Lincoln bank was to use the paper otherwise than as a direct collecting agent, and throws some light on the understanding of both parties as to what such use might be.

Certain aspects of the foregoing facts tend, it is argued, to stamp the transaction as one between a principal (the Hebron bank) and its agent for collection. One of these features is that the Lincoln bank was not what is known as a "correspondent" of the Hebron bank. As already indicated, we cannot conceive that any importance attached to this distinction, whatever it may be, because there can be no doubt that their arrangements contemplated the establishment of the relationship of debtor and creditor, at one time or another, with reference to this particular instrument or its proceeds. Next, it is argued that the arrangement between the banks was for a collection agency, and that, therefore, the transaction should be treated as in the nature of a collection. The motive of the Hebron bank in entering into its relations with the Lincoln bank was, as stated, undoubtedly to obtain the speedy conversion of foreign paper into cash, or its equivalent; but that this object was not intended to be effected by the specific collection and remission of each instrument forwarded is attested by every transaction between the two banks for a period of many years. It was probably immaterial to the Hebron bank whether it collected the paper through an agent for its own benefit or, in effect, sold it, and at once obtained credit therefor; and in any event the motive of the Hebron bank is not the controlling circumstance. It is perfectly clear that the real understanding between the banks was that the paper should become that of the Lincoln bank, to handle in its own way and for its own benefit, else we must suppose that it was acting in responsible business matters wholly gratuitously. Nor can we see that the practice and conceded right of the Lincoln bank to charge back dishonored items can be of any great weight in determining the nature of the contract. The Hebron bank was responsible as indorser on all such paper, and it seems to have been the practice of the Lincoln bank to take the necessary steps to charge the Hebron bank as such. That liability alone justified the Lincoln bank in charging back dishonored paper against any credit then existing. It is argued that the credit given on receipt of cash items was, because of such practice, provisional only, and insufficient to bind either party; but it was so far absolute as to permit the Hebron bank to draw against such credit (in other words, to enforce payment by the Lincoln bank), and seems only to have been conditional in the sense that any purchase of negotiable paper is conditional when based on a responsible indorsement, and with the understanding that in case of dishonor the holder will look immediately to the indorser. Nor was the form of indorsement, under all the facts of the case, indicative of a transfer for collection merely. It is probably true—and we consider the case on the theory—that it was so restrictive as to charge the Omaha bank with notice of a reserve title in the indorser, if the title were reserved. But whatever may be the law elsewhere, it is the law of this state that as between the immediate parties the true relationship may be shown, notwithstanding the form or terms of the indorsement itself. Roberts v. Snow, 27 Neb. 425; Dusenbury v. Albright, 31 Neb. 845; Salisbury v. First Nat. Bank, 37 Neb. 872; Holmes v. First Nat. Bank, 38 Neb. 326; Corbett v. Feizer, 47 Neb. 269. This being so, when we consider the uniform course of business between these parties it seems that the real significance of the language of this indorsement was to pass the certificate, not for collection merely, but as the property of the Lincoln bank, for the purpose of its amount going forth with to the credit of the Hebron bank on the account kept therewith. The form of the transmitting letter certainly tends towards a remittance for collection, but in view of the admitted fact that all classes of paper were remitted under this same form, and that they were differently treated under this same instruction, we cannot permit this fact to control the more emphatic language conveyed by the acts of the parties. Stress is also laid on a note appearing on the printed form whereon acknowledgments were made by the Lincoln bank of the receipt and credit of such items. This was as follows: "This bank, in receiving collections elsewhere than in Lincoln, acts as your agent, and assumes no responsibility beyond that of due diligence on its part." But this somewhat vague notice applies by its terms to "collections" only, and the blank bore upon it a separate column for collection, on which this certificate did not appear; this like all cash items, appearing in a column headed "Credited." Thus the notice referred to made even more distinct the practical difference between the two classes of items, and showed, if it showed anything, that the cash items were not received for collection.

On the other hand, there are certain facts which to our mind unmistakably stamp the transaction as a sale, and none is inconsistent with that theory. That there were two classes of items, the classification being based manifestly on the practicability of immediately converting the paper into cash, or using it as such, without subjecting it to a process of collection, and that this instrument was treated by both parties as belonging to the cash class; that credit was immediately given, before the Lincoln bank had disposed of the paper or collected its proceeds; that interest was paid upon this credit; and that it was subject to draft,—all these facts point towards a sale. Mere bookkeeping, it is true, does not control the question. Charges and credits may be made merely for convenience in bookkeeping. But when the evidence shows that they were not so made, that they were not made at all with items confessedly held for collection, and that when made as to other items, such entries were accompanied by such results as the payment of interest and the honoring of drafts, the matter is no longer one of bookkeeping, but is essential to the transaction itself. It is inconceivable that the Lincoln bank would collect gratuitously, and pay interest on, paper which it did not own, and before it was collected, for the privilege of performing this gratuitous service. It is absolutely certain that the Lincoln bank undertook such service, so advanced credit, and paid interest, for the privilege of using the paper for its own purposes and its own profit, as it did in this case, by selling it to the Omaha bank, and that the Hebron bank perfectly understood that this was the object, and that such paper was so treated. In the light of the usage of the banks the contract was, in effect, this: The remittance by the Hebron bank was a proposal to sell the certificate for its face; the Lincoln bank to immediately place so much at the disposal of the Hebron bank, and to pay interest thereon until the Hebron bank should demand the money or its equivalent; the Hebron bank assuming the ordinary liability of an indorser, with the express understanding added thereto that such liability should be subject to immediate enforcement in case of dishonor, by charging the amount against the credit maintained in the Lincoln bank. The mailed acknowledgment was an acceptance of that proposal. No clearer case of a transfer of title could well be contrived. For reasons stated at the outset, we do not consider cases adjudicated elsewhere as of any force in determining the facts of this case; but it is believed that all the cases holding, under somewhat similar circumstances, that title did not pass, present such differences in the facts as to render them readily distinguishable. For instance, in what is perhaps the strongest case cited (Beal v. Somerville, 5 U. S. App. 14, 50 Fed. Rep. 647, 1 C. C. A. 598, 17 L. R. A. 291, there was no agreement, express or implied, that the checks deposited should be treated as cash, or that the credit given might be drawn against. Interest was not paid. Other cases treat an indorsement "for collection" as controlling, and incapable of being extended by extrinsic evidence. Others neglect the fundamental rule that a deposit generally creates simply the relation of debtor and creditor, and is not a bailment.

It is suggested that as the Lincoln bank was at the time insolvent, to the knowledge of its officers, it was incapable of taking, and consequently of transmitting, title. This is stating the rule too strongly. The rule invoked is only the application of the general law of fraud in sales induced by false representations; keeping the bank open, and holding it out as ready to transact business, being an implied representation of solvency. A sale made to such a bank would not be void. It would be, at the most, voidable, at the option of the vendor or depositor, and could not be avoided after the rights of innocent third parties had attached. As already intimated, the indorsement may have been so restricted that the Omaha bank could not claim as an innocent purchaser if title had not in fact passed to its vendor; but title did pass, and the Lincoln bank owned the certificate, unless and until the Hebron bank rescinded the sale. Before this happened, it could and did pass title to a stranger who parted with value therefor, and it was then too late for the Hebron bank to assert its right to rescind.

Reversed and remanded.

Norval and Sullivan, JJ., formulated the opinion of the court:

At the last term of this court a decision was entered in this case reversing the judgment of the trial court. Upon a proper application, a rehearing was granted, and the cause has been a second time submitted for our consideration. The issues involved, and the essential facts of the case, are stated with sufficient accuracy in the former decision, reported in 58 Neb. 67. In reversing the judgment below, we proceeded upon the theory that the form of the indorsement of the certificate of deposit was ambiguous and not conclusive, as to the intentions of the parties; that it was permissible to show by parol evidence the exact nature of the contract; and that the only inference to be drawn from the proofs established a sale of the draft, and not a bailment for collection. A careful re-examination of the record and questions thereby presented, assisted by the able argument of counsel, has convinced us that the former decision was erroneous. In the opinion it was said: "Whatever may be the law elsewhere it is the law of this state that, as between the immediate parties, the true relationship may be shown, notwithstanding the form or terms of the indorsement itself,"—citing Roberts v. Snow, 27 Neb. 425; Dusenbury v. Albright, 31 Neb. 345; Salisbury v. First Nat. Bank, 37 Neb. 872; Holmes v. First Nat. Bank, 38 Neb. 326; Corbett v. Fetzner, 47 Neb. 269.

The adjudications of this court do not warrant the statement of the rule as broadly as above indicated, nor do the decisions elsewhere support such a doctrine. The general rule is, and it has been frequently asserted by this court, that the terms of a written contract cannot be contradicted, varied, or explained by parol evidence of a prior or contemporaneous oral agreement between the parties. Hamilton v. Thrall, 7 Neb. 210; Dodge v. Kiene, 28 Neb. 216; Watson v. Roode, 30 Neb. 264; Kaserman v. Fries, 33 Neb. 427; Mattison v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 42 Neb. 545; Clarke v. Kelsey, 41 Neb. 766; Maxwell v. Burr, 44 Neb. 81; Commercial State Bank v. Antelope County, 48 Neb. 496; Waddle v. Owen, 43 Neb. 489; Nebraska Exposition Assn. v. Tounley, 46 Neb. 893. It is true this court has more than once decided that, when the rights of bona fide purchasers of negotiable paper for value before maturity are not involved, it is competent to show by parol evidence in cases of indorsement in blank of such paper that the terms of the agreement between the parties was other and different from that which arises by presumption of law. Holmes v. First Nat. Bank, 38 Neb. 326; Corbett v. Fetzner, 47 Neb. 269. The principle underlying these cases does not contravene the general rule recognized and applied by this and other courts that parol contemporaneous evidence cannot be received to contradict or vary the terms of a written instrument for the obvious reason that the contract of a blank indorsement is not expressed in writing, but rests in legal implications, and this prima facie presumption of law may be overthrown, as between the original parties to such an indorsement, by the admission of competent parol evidence establishing the real terms of the agreement. If the law conclusively presumed the liability created by an indorsement in blank of commercial paper, then, of course, the actual terms of the contract would not be a proper subject of inquiry, and neither party would be permitted to show by parol the true agreement. But the presumption of liability arising from such an indorsement is prima facie merely, and not conclusive; hence, as against all except bona fide holders for value, the true terms of the contract may be shown by evidence resting in parol. The indorsement of the Hebron bank on the certificate of deposit involved herein was an express written contract, not open to contradiction or explanation by proof of extrinsic facts, and conclusively proves an agency merely, and that the title and ownership of the paper never passed to the Capitol National Bank. This doctrine is sustained by an unbroken line of authorities. In First Nat. Bank v. Reno County Bank, 3 Fed. Rep. 257, it was distinctly decided that an indorsement of a bill of exchange directing the drawee to pay to another "on account of" the indorser, or "for collection," is a restrictive indorsement, carrying with it notice that the indorser did not thereby part with title to the paper, or to its proceeds when collected. To the same effect are Beal v. Somerville, 5 U. S. App. 14, 50 Fed. Rep. 647, 1 C. C. A. 598, 17 L. R. A. 291; Hoffman v. First Nat. Bank, 46 N. J. L. 605; Cecil Bank v. Farmers' Bank, 22 Md. 143; Morse, Banks & Banking, § 217; Blaine v. Bourne, 11 R. I. 119, 23 Am. Rep. 429; Soreny v. Easter, 1 Wall. 166, 17 L. ed. 681; Balbach v. Frelinghuysen, 15 Fed. Rep. 675; First Nat. Bank v. First Nat. Bank, 76 Ind. 561, 40 Am. Rep. 261; White v. National Bank, 103 U. S. 658, 26 L. ed. 250. Leary v. Blanchard, 43 Me. 269, was an action upon a promissory note, indorsed by the payee, "Pay to Arthur Leary, or order, for account of the Atlas Mutual Insurance Co." It was ruled that the indorsement was restrictive, and parol evidence was inadmissible to show that the transfer was absolute. A draft bore the following indorsement: "Pay Penn Bank, or order, for account of People's Bank, McKeesport, Pa., C. R. Stuckslager, Cashier. D. Gardner, As. Cash." This indorsement was before the court for consideration in Freeman's Nat. Bank v. National Tube Works Co. 151 Mass. 418, 3 L. R. A. 42, and it was held to be restrictive for collection, merely giving notice that the title and ownership of the paper had not passed from the indorser. Third Nat. Bank v. Clark, 23 Minn. 263, was an action on a promissory note made payable to the order of the Williams Mower & Reaper Company, and indorsed by the payee to the Third National Bank of Syracuse, or order, for collection. It was adjudicated in that case that the indorsement was restrictive, and that parol evidence was not admissible to prove it absolute. Rock County Nat. Bank v. Hollister, 21 Minn. 885. In Armour Bros. Bkg. Co. v. Riley County Bank, 30 Kan. 163, there was involved the scope and effect of the following indorsement on a draft: "Pay W. H. Wyants, Esq., cashier, or order, for account of the Riley county bank of Manhattan, Kansas. J. K. Winship, Cashier." Parol evidence was offered to contradict the indorsement which, upon objection, was excluded by the trial court. Brewer, J., in delivering the opinion of the court on review, used this language: "The ruling of the district court was founded upon the idea that this indorsement is a restrictive indorsement, defining the rights and title of the indorsee, and not open to contradiction or explanation by parol testimony. In other words, this indorsement is a written contract, conclusive as against any parol testimony, and which shows absolutely that the plaintiff was not the owner, the real party in interest, but only held the draft as agent, and for purposes of collection. That this is a restrictive indorsement, and that it operated to transfer the draft to the plaintiff only as agent for purposes of collection, cannot be doubted. (Byles, Bills, p. 152; 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 698; Blaine v. Bourne, 11 R. I. 119, 23 Am. Rep. 429, and cases cited in the opinion). In this latter case, speaking of an indorsement almost identical with the one at bar, the court says: 'The indorsee is rather an agent of the indorser with power of substitution, and the bill is still in the possession of the indorser by his agent.' And again: 'The words are notice that the restricted indorsee has no property in the bill.' It will be perceived that this is not a mere blank indorsement, but one in which the contract is written out in full, and therefore, like any other written contract, not to be contradicted or varied by parol evidence (Greenl. Ev. §§ 277-281, and 282; 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 717), so that upon the face of the paper it appears affirmatively that the plaintiff is not the owner, but only an agent for collection." No case has come within the range of our vision which is in conflict with the adjudication already mentioned, nor is it believed that any decision can be found which lends support to the doctrine that it is competent to prove, in case of a restrictive indorsement like the one before us, that the actual contract was different from the one expressed in writing on the back of the certificate of deposit.

It is argued by counsel for plaintiff in error that the contractual rights of the parties are not expressed in the indorsement in question; that the law infers a contract therefrom. We quote from the brief: "When one writes upon the back of a negotiable instrument, 'Pay to the order of A. B. for account of,' and signs it, his contract is not set forth in the writing. His obligations under this indorsement, and the rights and duties of the indorsee under this indorsement, are not in any wise set forth in the indorsement. It is not a written contract stating the mutual rights and obligations of the parties. The law merchant, in the case of this indorsement as in the case of one in blank, infers from the indorsement a certain contract, and it is this inferred contract which the law enforces when it holds the signer to the usual obligations. From a restrictive indorsement the law infers a certain contract; from an unrestricted indorsement the law infers a certain other contract. In both cases it must be clear the contract is inferred, and in no sense written." In this contention counsel are in error. This indorsement in unequivocal language shows that the title to the paper, except for the purposes of collection, was to remain in the Hebron Bank, and that the indorsee, the Capitol National Bank, was agent merely for collection. The rights of the parties under this indorsement do not rest upon any implication of law, but are determined by the contract of the parties as expressed in the indorsement. And to permit oral evidence to be received to show the agreement was different from that indicated by the language used would be in violation of the principle that a written contract may not be varied by parol. The same result would be reached whether the indorsement be regarded the entire contract, or said indorsement and letter transmitting the certificate of deposit be construed together. The letter of transmittal states that the certificate was "for collection and credit." These words clearly indicate that the transmission was for the purpose of collection, and, when collected, the proceeds were to be credited to the transmitting bank. Until the collection was made, the relation of debtor and creditor was not to exist. To hold otherwise would disregard the meaning of the word "collection." In Branch v. United States Nat. Bank, 50 Neb. 470, it was decided that the legal title of commercial paper indorsed "for collection" rests in the indorsee only to the extent of authorizing him to demand and enforce payment, and that the true owner of the paper so indorsed may control the same until paid in full, and may intercept the proceeds thereof in the hands of an intermediate agent.

The written contract is unambiguous, and it is unnecessary to resort to parol evidence to ascertain the true intention of the parties. An explicit written agreement cannot be contradicted or qualified by proof of any usage, custom, or course of dealing, while proof of them is permissible in cases of doubt where the contract is expressed in vague and ambiguous language. The indorsement in question, and the letter of transmittal, neither singly nor when considered together, show that the Hebron bank was divested of its title to the certificate of deposit in question. This is conceded by counsel for plaintiff in error, but they rely upon the prior course of dealing and the acts and conduct of the parties to overthrow the plain and unambiguous written contract of the parties, and to establish a transfer of title to the paper. As we have seen, evidence of such matters is not admissible. The fact that the Hebron bank repeatedly sent remittances to the Capitol National Bank, the paper containing restrictive indorsements the same as this, and from time to time drew against its remittances, and was allowed interest from the Capitol National Bank on its average balances, is insufficient to establish that the transfer of this paper was absolute. Scott v. Ocean Bank, 28 N. Y. 289; Fifth Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 40 Fed. Rep. 46.

Upon principle and authority we are fully persuaded that the court did not err in finding that the Hebron bank never parted with its title to this certificate of deposit.

The judgment of reversal entered herein is vacated, and the judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

Irvine, C., dissenting:

I adhere to the former opinion. It seems to me that the opinion now held by the majority of the court logically overrules a number of earlier cases. If not, it certainly creates a distinction which is confusing, and which has no reason for its existence. It has been held that, as between the original parties, parol evidence is receivable to vary or to contradict the terms of a general indorsement, and also that such evidence may be received to show that the liability of those signing the note on its face is other than would be implied from the place and character of the signatures. The indorsement in this case is no more the expression of a complete contract than is a general indorsement. On its face it is simply an authority to the maker of the certificate to pay the same to R. C. Outcalt for the benefit in some way of the indorser. It is only by implication of law that these words acquire any of the distinctive features of a contract. To show that the reasons for allowing extrinsic evidence as between the parties apply as well to restrictive as to general indorsements, the following language from Dye v. Scott, 35 Ohio St. 194, 35 Am. Rep. 604, which has been quoted with approval by this court in Holmes v. First Nat. Bank, 38 Neb. 326, is pertinent: "If there was a contemporaneous contract between the parties upon which the indorsement was made, both reason and justice require that, as between themselves, the actual, and not the presumed, contract should be enforced; and, as between them, oral testimony should be admissible to prove the contemporaneous contract. This will not necessarily, or even probably, impair the currency or credit of the instrument as commercial paper. Prior parties to it will not be affected, nor will the rights of subsequent indorsees without notice be impaired or limited in any degree." The above is a statement of a rule generally prevalent with regard to negotiable instruments. Often they are drawn contrary to the real relations of the parties for the very purpose of giving rights to transferees which could not be acquired were the true relations disclosed. A familiar instance is that of an accommodation note or an accommodation indorsement. In the case of the note the contract to pay a certain sum at a certain time is distinctly and fully expressed, and, where rights are claimed under the law merchant, the liability attaches. But if the payee himself should sue, he would be defeated by extrinsic evidence to show that, as between the parties, the note did not express the contract. In this case no rights are claimed under the law merchant. It is not sought to charge anyone upon or through the indorsement. The question is simply whether the Hebron bank sold the certificate to the Lincoln bank. To transfer negotiable paper no compliance with the law merchant is necessary. It may be transferred so as to pass the holder's rights by assignment like any other chose in action. If it had not been indorsed at all, recovery could be had by proof of a sale. If it had admittedly been first transmitted as a bailment for collection, and the Lincoln bank had afterwards bought it without further indorsement, that fact might be shown. The chief fallacy in the majority opinion lies in treating the case as if rights were claimed under the law merchant, whereas the law merchant is not necessarily involved in the case. The form of indorsement is merely evidence of what the contract was, but it was only a single step in the transaction, and is explained by the other evidence and the acts of the parties in such a way as not even to show a bailment. Other matters are somewhat fully discussed in the former opinion, and I do not care to again refer to them; nor shall I enter into a discussion of the authorities, except to the extent of repeating that an inspection of the numerous cases cited in the briefs will show that in nearly all of them extrinsic evidence was considered to ascertain the contract, and that the issue has been treated as one of fact in the light of such extrinsic evidence.

1. A tax on the succession to property of a deceased person is not a tax upon the property itself, but on the right of succession thereto.
2. A statute creating classes of the property of deceased persons for the purpose of a succession tax, although it exempts some classes from taxation and provides different rates for other classes, but which is uniform as to all property in the same class, does not violate Const. 1870, art. 9, requiring property to be taxed according to value, since no person can take property by inheritance or devise except by statute, and the power of the state to regulate the question includes the power to create classes of such property.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Frank L. Shepard and Robert S. Iles, for appellant:

After a person is dead and no longer capable of directing or controlling his wealth, the state, in accordance with one of the fundamental principles of social organization, steps in, continues the ownership, and vests in those to whom the deceased has designated his property. Or, if he should die without a will, the state performs the same office practically, through its statutes of descent and distribution.

This right to take by will or from the intestate is a mere privilege conferred by statutory law, and is not a natural right. And this privilege can be enlarged, restricted, or taken away altogether.

The inheritance tax, being a duty on a right or privilege of succession, is not a tax on property under the provision of state and Federal Constitutions, and being a mere exercise of the power which every state possesses of regulating the manner and terms upon which property may be transmitted, and imposing a duty thereon, is not in conflict with article 14 of the Constitution of the United States.

And the state has the power to tax a privilege, such as the devolution of property, and this right of the state to impose this tax is based upon the broad constitutional power of the state to modify, amend, or annul altogether the laws providing for the transmission of property from decedent to those who take under him.

Our Constitution only requires that a tax on privileges shall be "uniform as to the class upon which it operates."

Messrs. Prussing & McCulloch for appellees.

Phillips, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On November 12, 1895, John B. Drake, a resident of Cook county, Illinois, died, leaving a last will and testament, in and by which Josephine C. Drake, Timothy B. Blackstone, and the Illinois Trust & Savings Bank were appointed his executors and trustees. Under the provisions of the will, property in excess of $20,000 passed to Josephine C. Drake, widow of John B. Drake; $5,000 each passed to Fanny D. English, Mrs. Sallie Sausser, and Ella Drake, nieces of the said John B. Drake; $1,000 each passed to Samuel W. Parker and Henry Morgan, and $500 each passed to John Gabriel and Bridget Huges, strangers to the blood, and in no wise related to the said John B. Drake; property in excess of $2,000,000 passed to the said executors, to be held in trust for the use and benefit of the wife and children of the said John B. Drake. A petition was filed by the county treasurer of Cook county in the county court of Cook county, asking for the appointment of an appraiser to appraise said estate, under "An Act to Tax Gifts, Legacies, and Inheritances in Certain Cases, and to Provide for the Collection of the Same," approved June 15, 1895, in force July 1, 1895. To the petition in this case a demurrer was interposed on the part of the executors and trustees, which was sustained by the court, and the petition dismissed, and a judgment entered for costs. The judgment of the court was that the act was unconstitutional.

The question presented by this appeal involves the constitutionality of the act entitled "An Act to Tax Gifts, Legacies, and Inheritances in Certain Cases, and to Provide for the Collection of the Same," approved June 15, 1895.

The existence of the common law within the state of Illinois results from the provisions of chapter 28, Rev. Stat., which declares that the common law of England, and all statutes of a general nature made prior to the fourth year of James I., shall be the rule of decision, and shall be considered as of full force, until repealed by legislative authority. By that authority, chapter 89, Rev. Stat., entitled "An Act in Regard to the Descent of Property," and chapter 148, entitled "An Act in Regard to Wills," were enacted, which in effect repeal the common law in reference to inheritances, and also repeal the statute enacted prior to the fourth year of James I. in reference to devises. There is not in force in this state, under chapter 28, any law providing for the descent or devise of property. The law of descent, and the right to devise and take under a will within the state of Illinois, owe their existence to the statute law of the state. The right to inherit and the right to devise being dependent on the legislative acts, there is nothing in the Constitution of this state which prohibits a change of those subjects at the discretion of the lawmaking power. The law of descent and devise being the creation of the statute law, the power which creates may regulate and may impose conditions or burdens on a right of succession to the ownership of property to which there has ceased to be an owner because of death, and the ownership of which the state then provides for by the law of descent or devise. The imposition of such a condition or burden is not a tax upon the property itself, but on the right of succession thereto. To deny the right of the state to impose such a burden or condition is to deny the right of the state to regulate the administration of a decedent's estate. When by the act of June 15, 1895, for the taxation of gifts, legacies, and inheritances in certain cases, the legislature prescribed that a certain part of the estate of the deceased person should be paid to the treasurer of the proper county for the use of the state, it was, in effect, an assertion of sovereignty in the estate of deceased persons. Whether to be levied and determined as a tax or penalty, the principle is that, where one owning an estate dies, that estate is to be assessed in accordance with the provisions of the act, and the tax to be paid for the right of inheritance. The amount reserved to the state from the estate of a deceased owner is not a tax on the estate, but on the right of succession. By the Constitution of 1870 it is provided (art. 9):

"Sec. 1. The general assembly shall provide such revenue as may be needful by levying a tax, by valuation, so that every person and corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his, her, or its property,—such value to be ascertained by some person or persons, to be elected or apportioned in such manner as the general assembly shall direct, and not otherwise; but the general assembly shall have power to tax peddlers, auctioneers, brokers, hawkers, merchants, . . . showmen, jugglers, inn-keepers, grocery keepers, liquor dealers, toll bridges, ferries, insurance, telegraph and express interests or business, vendors of patents and persons or corporations owning or using franchises and privileges, in such manner as it shall from time to time direct by general law, uniform as to the class upon which it operates.

"Sec. 2. The specification of the objects and subjects of taxation shall not deprive the general assembly of the power to require other subjects or objects to be taxed in such manner as may be consistent with the principles of taxation fixed in this Constitution."

Under these provisions of the Constitution, it is insisted that the levy of the succession tax which is required to be made by valuation, so that every person and corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his, her, or its property, and that such law shall be uniform as to the class upon which it operates, is defeated by the provisions of the statute above quoted. That statute provides that certain classes of property which were a part of an estate shall be exempt from taxation under these provisions, and when the legislature provides other classes of property, some of which shall pay $1 per $100, others $2, and others $3, and others $4, and still others $5, and again others $6 per $100, six different classes are created, under and by which a tax is levied by valuation on the right of succession to a separate class of property. The class on which a tax is thus levied is general and uniform, and pertains to all species of property included within that class. A tax which affects the property within a specific class is uniform as to that class, and there is no provision of the Constitution which precludes legislative action from assessing a tax on that particular class. By this act of the legislature six classes of property are created heretofore absolutely unknown. It is those classes of property, depending upon the estate owned by one dying possessed thereof which the state may regulate as to its descent and the right to devise. The tax assessed on classes thus created is absolutely uniform on the classes upon which it operates, and, under the provisions of the statute, is to be determined by valuation, so that every person and corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his, her, or its property inherited; and it is not inconsistent with the principle of taxation fixed by the Constitution, and is clearly within the sections of the Constitution quoted. No want of uniformity with one living who owns property can be urged as a reason why the statute makes an inconsistent rule. No person inherits property or can take by devise, except by the statute; and the state having power to regulate this question, may create classes and provide for uniformity with reference to classes which were before unknown. Laws of this character have been sustained in Pennsylvania, New York, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, and other states. They have been held invalid in New Hampshire and Ohio, and some other states. We are not disposed to enter into an analysis of these cases, and a consideration of the principles on which they have been decided. The broad principle presented is that the legislature may create new classes of property with reference to estates under which they may regulate the right to inherit or devise or take under devise, and, such right existing, such classes may be created, and, as created, may be uniform, and the assessment by valuation, when declared to operate equally on the right of succession to such classes is not a violation of the provisions of the sections of article 9 of the Constitution of the state of Illinois. We hold the act entitled "An Act to Tax Gifts, Legacies and Inheritances in Certain Cases, and to Provide for the Collection of the Same," approved June 15, 1895, to be consistent with the Constitution of the state of Illinois.

The county court erred in sustaining a demurrer to the petition, and its judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to appoint an appraiser to appraise the estate and assess a tax under that statute.

Martin v. Insurance Co. of N. A. 57 N. J. L. 628; Bennett v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. 53 N. J. L. 377.

The "claimant's statement," which formed a part of the proofs of death, put in evidence by the plaintiff, was competent evidence against her and in favor of the insurer, as declarations by her against interest, although not admissible in her favor.

An entry by a deceased parent or other relative, made in a Bible, family missal, or any of pedigree when properly authenticated, upon the same lines as entries in Family Bibles have been held to be evidence in matters of pedigree.

I. General rule.

The general rule is that entries in a Family Bible are only admissible as evidence in matters of pedigree in order to prove relationship and the date and fact of birth, marriage, or death of a party. Such entries must be proved by the best evidence that the nature of the case will admit of, and therefore during the existence of the declarant or party making such entries, the testimony of third persons cannot be received, unless it be shown that such party is not within the reach of process of the court. They are generally regarded as secondary evidence.

Such entries are not allowed to be given in evidence as proof of pedigree, however, when the question of pedigree is merely incidental to the main question involved in the case, and whenever they are admitted as evidence of pedigree they are always held to be subject to the general rule governing hearsay and documentary evidence. They form one of the exceptions to the general rule of law which excludes hearsay evidence.

The general rule would seem to be that hearsay evidence is always admissible to prove pedi-other book, or in any document or paper, stating the fact and date of the birth, marriage, or death of a child, or other relative, is regarded as a declaration of such parent or relative, in a matter of pedigree.

1 Greenl. Ev. 5th ed. pp. 153, 154.

Mr. J. Franklin Fort, for defendant in error:

The burden of proof of fraud rested on the defendant.

Blackford v. Plainfield Gaslight Co. 43 N. J. L. 438; Tyng v. Grinnell, 92 U. S. 467, 23 L. ed. 733.

The burden included proof that such misstatement was made with the intention to deceive.

Cowley v. Smyth, 46 N. J. L. 380; McVey v. Grand Lodge, A. O. of U. W. 53 N. J. L. 17.

The answers of Daniel F. Conklin to the question in the application for membership are not to be taken as warranties, the contract sued on not referring to them.

McVey v. Grand Lodge A. O. of U. W. 53 N. J. L. 17.

Nixon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in error is a corporation organized pursuant to the act of the legislature of New Jersey entitled "An Act to Incorporate Benevolent and Charitable Associations," approved March 9, 1853 (1 Gen. Stat. p. 149). One of the objects of this fraternity, as declared in its constitution, is to establish a beneficiary fund, from which, on satisfactory evidence of the death of a member in good standing, a sum not exceeding $2,000 shall be paid as directed in the benefit certificate issued. Daniel F. Conklin, the husband of the defendant in error, became a beneficiary member of this association, having previously complied with all the constitutional rules and requirements, and received from it a benefit certificate for the sum of $1,000, dated March 11, 1884, and payable, in case of his decease, to Margaret Conklin, his wife. He died on the 9th day of October, 1895, and proof of his death was furnished to the supreme council of the fraternity. Payment of the said sum stipulated in the certificate having been refused, the beneficiary, Margaret Conklin, brought suit, and recovered judgment for that amount, with interest and costs. This writ brings here for review the record, proceedings, and judgment in that trial, which took place before the circuit judge without a jury. The record shows that only two exceptions were taken at the trial, and sealed by the trial judge. The first is to the refusal of the court to nonsuit the plaintiff, and the second to the general finding of the judge against the defendant, which is in the following words: "I find, under the evidence in this case, that the plaintiff has established a right of recovery against the defendant for the amount of this certificate $1,000, and I direct judgment to be entered accordingly." Other errors are specified in the assignment, but, as no exceptions other than the two above mentioned were taken at the trial, they cannot be considered by this court. If, agree, and this term embraces, not only questions of descent and relationship, but also the particular facts of birth, marriage, and death, and the times when these events may have happened, and any book, document, or paper containing entries made by a parent or relation as to such facts may be received as the written declarations of the deceased persons who respectively made them,—and such evidence is held admissible, not only from the extreme difficulty of providing any better, but is resorted to on the ground of the interest of the declarants in such matters of family relationship and connection. Cherry v. State, 68 Ala. 29, 80.

It has been said that in ancient transactions, where no living witnesses can be had, the declarations, memoranda, or entries, made in writing, with regard to any facts, by persons in a situation to know the truth, and under no bias to misrepresent, will be admitted as evidence of such fact, as it is the best evidence the nature of the case will admit of, and is therefore admissible from necessity. Chapman v. Chapman, 2 Conn. 347, 348, 7 Am. Dec. 277.

So, hearsay, or as it is generally termed reputation, is admissible in all questions of pedigree, and the word "pedigree" embraces, not only descent and relationship, but also the facts of birth, marriage, and death, and the times when these events happened; and the entry of a deceased parent or other relative made in a Bible, family missal, or any other book or document or paper, stating the fact and date of the birth, marriage, or death of a child or relative, is regarded as the declaration of such parent or relative in the matter of pedigree. Kelly v. McGuire, 15 Ark. 555, 604.

Entries in a Family Bible are hearsay evidence, and subject to the same general rule by which that class of evidence is governed,—that it is admissible only when the fact sought to be established cannot be otherwise shown. People v. Mayne, 118 Cal. 516.

Again, entries of the birth and death of an individual, being matters of pedigree, may be proved by hearsay evidence and general repute in the family, and an entry thereof made by a deceased parent in the Family Bible is admissible in evidence as a declaration of such parent; but, in order that such entries may be receivable in evidence, it must be proved that they were made by a deceased parent or relative. Greenleaf v. Dubuque & S. C. R. Co. 30 Iowa, 301, 308.

So, on questions of marriage, births, deaths, etc., such entries are admissible, even without proof that they have been made by a relative, provided the book is produced from the proper authority. Jones v. Jones, 45 Md. 144, 160, 36 Md. 447.

In Jackson, Ross v. Cooley, 8 Johns. 123, 131, it is said that an entry in a Family Bible is good evidence to prove pedigree. People v. Sheppard, 44 Hun, 565.

It has been stated that such entries are unquestionable evidences for some purposes, particularly in cases of pedigree, and where the acts transpired at such a remote period that no live witness can be supposed to have any knowledge of them. Leggett v. Boyd, 3 Wend. 376, 379.

So, the case of Russell v. Jackson, Schuyler, 22 Wend. 277, 280, supports the rule that entries in Family Bibles and other religious books, in the handwriting of persons whose writing is unknown, is sometimes resorted to for the purpose of establishing pedigree.

The rule laid down in the Berkeley Peerage Case, 4 Campb. 418, in/r/a, III. c, under which such entries were held admissible, was commented upon by the court in People v. Fulton F. Ins. Co. 25 Wend. 215, although the exact point did not arise in that case, which was one as to the admissibility of declarations made by deceased members of the family.

And in questions of pedigree the verbal declarations of the members of the family are competent evidence, but entries in the Family Bible are much more reliable. Hunt v. Johnson, 19 N. Y. 273, 286.

however, there is sufficient evidence to support the finding of the judge, the other errors alleged are in no way material to the disposition of the case.

At the trial below, the plaintiff in error relied entirely on the defense set up in its special plea, that Daniel F. Conklin, in his application for membership in the fraternity, made a false statement as to his age, no one being entitled to beneficiary membership whose age exceeds fifty five years at the time of his application. In the application his age was given at fifty-four years, and the date of his birth, December 13, 1829, which would make him fifty-four years and about two months old; thus bringing him within the eligible period. If this statement was in fact false, and the defendant corporation was thereby led to enter into a contract it otherwise would not have made, it would undoubtedly be a sufficient bar to any recovery upon a certificate such as Conklin held at the time of his death. The proof of false representation, however, rests upon the party alleging it, when the object is to overthrow a contract mutually made and accepted. The suit in this case was based upon the certificate issued to Conklin by the defendant order. The validity of the contract therein expressed will be presumed until overcome by proof, and therefore the issuance of the certificate by the plaintiff in error, duly authenticated, and the good standing of the member at the time of his death, and due notice to the supreme council of the fraternity of the death of the member, if established by the plaintiff, are sufficient to throw the burden of proving misrepresentation upon the defendant. The above facts were either proved or admitted in the evidence for the plaintiff. But in the proofs of death submitted by the defendant in error the date of Daniel F. Conklin's birth was stated to be December 13, 1823, whereas, in the application for membership it was given by him as December 13, 1829. The former date, if correct, would have made him ineligible to beneficiary membership at the date of his application on February 12, 1884. In the case of Holland v. Supreme Council, O. of C. F. 54 N. J. L. 490, it was held that "the contract of the association with its beneficiary members is made up of the application for such membership, the certificate issued, which is an acceptance of the application [for such membership], and the charter, constitution, and by-laws of the society." In his application, as appears by the record before us, Conklin said, among other things: "I agree that any untrue statements, evasion, or fraudulent allegation, or concealment of facts by me, shall forfeit my right to membership in the fraternity, and all the benefits arising therefrom." The applicant, therefore, consented beforehand, as he had a right to do, that any untrue statements made by him should invalidate any claim to benefits. The controlling question is whether the statement made by Conklin as to his age was true or false; and it is not necessary, in this case, to go into a discussion as to whether it was a representation or a guaranty. The evidence relied upon by the plaintiff in error to

So, in the Slane Peerage Case, 5 Clark & F. 24, 10 Bligh, 1, it is said that entries in the family misal were admissible as evidence of births, deaths, and marriages of members of the family, just like similar entries in a Family Bible.

And in Goodright, Stevens, v. Moss, 3 Cowp. 591, 595, it is said an entry in a father's Family Bible, and inscriptions on a tombstone, and pedigree hung up in the family mansion, are all good evidence of pedigree.

Again, in Taylor v. Cole, Westm. sitting after Hil. term, 1799, cited in note to Doe, Bowerman, v. Sybourn, 7 T. R. 84, the court recognized the rule allowing evidence of entries in a Family Bible as matters of pedigree.

Yet a qualification as to evidence of tradition, even upon pedigree, shows that it must be from persons having such a connection with the parties that it is natural and likely that, from domestic habits, they are speaking the truth and could not be mistaken, and it is upon this principle that descriptions in wills, monuments, or Bibles are admitted as evidence of pedigree. Whitelocke v. Baker, 13 Ves. Jr. 511, 514; Vowles v. Young, 13 Ves. Jr. 140.

So, it must be shown that the declarant is dead, and that he was related to the person whose pedigree is sought to be proved by blood or marriage, before the evidence of a third person can be received. Dupoyster v. Gagan, 84 Ky. 408, 409.

Yet a register kept in a Family Bible is not in all cases conclusive of the facts stated, but its weight as evidence is subject to be weakened or strengthened by all the proofs in reference to it, and the party by whom the entries were made, when they were made, whether the book has been so kept as to be accessible at all times to all members of the family, are all matters to be considered in determining the probative force of such evidence. Weaver v. Leitman, 53 Md. 708, 719.

So, a mutilated Bible without the entries would be of little value in proving pedigree, and could be no better evidence than that of a member of a family testifying to family reputation, and declarations made by a deceased member,—especially where such entries appeared to have been made by a party whose authority to make such entries is not proved, and where the evidence does not show whether he was a stranger or relative. Watson v. Brewster, 1 Pa. St. 381.

And where the question of pedigree is merely incidental, and the judgment will merely establish a debt or a person's liability on a contract, or his proper settlement as a pauper, and things of that nature, the case is not one of pedigree, although questions of marriage, legitimacy, death, or birth are incidentally inquired into. People v. Mayne, 118 Cal. 516.

The California Code does not authorize the admission of a written declaration simply because it is made in the Family Bible, unless it is otherwise admissible as a written declaration, and such entry when admissible is only to be received "as evidence of pedigree;" and a case is not necessarily one of pedigree because it may involve questions of birth, parentage, age, or relationship. People v. Mayne, 118 Cal. 516.

II. Grounds upon which admitted.

One of the grounds upon which such entries have been admitted is that a Family Bible, containing entries of the births, marriages, and deaths of a family, is in the nature of a record. Hubbard v. Lees, L. R. 1 Exch. 255, 4 Hurlst. & C. 418, 35 L. J. Exch. N. S. 109, 12 Jur. N. S. 435, 14 Week. Rep. 694.

So, it has been admitted as evidence for the reason that such an entry in a Family Bible is entitled to greater weight, by reason of its formality, than would be a similar verbal declaration, although the principles upon which it is received in evidence are the same as govern verbal declarations of the same fact. People v. Mayne, 118 Cal. 516.

prove the falsity of Conklin's declaration as to his age was, first, the said notice of his death given to the supreme council of the fraternity. The printed form of notice was furnished by the supreme secretary to a son-in-law of the beneficiary. The blanks were filled by the son of the decedent, and signed by the defendant in error with her mark, she being unable to write her name; and it does not clearly appear that the certificate, when signed, was read to her, or that she knew anything about its contents, except that it was notice of her husband's death about to be sent to the fraternity. Section 4 of article 7 of the Constitution of the order provides that "on the death of a member the secretary of the council shall immediately forward to the supreme secretary an official notice of such death, in accordance with a form furnished by the supreme council." Nothing is said as to what it shall contain further than the notice of death, and no reference is made in the original application for membership, or in the beneficiary certificate, to any special form of notice. The contents

And upon the ground that, as they are made by persons having a connection with the parties, they must be taken to be the statements of those who, from their domestic habits, are speaking the truth, and cannot be mistaken. Vowles v. Young, 13 Ves. Jr. 140.

Such evidence is not only admitted owing to the extreme difficulty of producing any better, but on the ground of the interest of the declarant in a matter of family relationship. Cherry v. State, 68 Ala. 29, 30.

So, they are admitted for the reason that, as they are there inserted, they must be taken as assented to by those in whose custody the book has been. People v. Ratz, 115 Cal. 132, 134.

Again, declarations in the family, descriptions in wills, descriptions upon monuments, descriptions in Bibles and registry books, all are admitted upon the principle that they are the natural effusion of a party who must know the truth and who speaks upon an occasion when his mind stands in an even position, without any temptation to exceed or fall short of the truth. Pearson v. Pearson, 46 Cal. 609, 629.

Yet an entry in a Family Bible is a written declaration of a fact made out of court not under the sanction of an oath, or with any opportunity to test its correctness by means of cross-examination, and is but a declaration by the person who made the entry, and is of the same character as any other declaration, whether written or oral. People v. Mayne, 118 Cal. 516.

So, an entry by a deceased parent or other relative, made in a Bible, family misal, or other book, or in any document or paper stating the fact and date of the birth, marriage, or death of a child or other relative, is regarded as a declaration of such parent or relative in the matter of pedigree. Pearce v. Kyzer, 16 Lea, 521, 57 Am. Rep. 240.

In general such entries are admitted as the declaration of the person by whom they are made. Campbell v. Wilson, 23 Tex. 252, 253, 76 Am. Dec. 67; Sussex Peerage Case, 11 Clark & F. 85, 98, 8 Jur. 793.

And such an entry, being nothing more than the written declaration of the person who made the entry, is admissible in cases of pedigree as an exception to the general rule upon the subject. Dobson v. Cothran, 34 S. C. 518, 529.

A pedigree, whether in the shape of a genealogy tree or map, or contained in a book or mural or monumental inscription, if recognized by a deceased member of the same family, is admissible however early the period from which it purports to have been deduced, because the same act of recognition of the document, and consequent acknowledgment of the relationship, stated in it by a member of the family, is some evidence of that relationship from whatever source his information may have been derived, and because he was likely from his situation both to inquire into the truth of such matters, and from his means of knowledge to ascertain it. Davies v. Lowndes, 6 Mann. & G. 525, 7 Scott, N. R. 213.

So, a Family Bible is relied upon in matters of pedigree in respect to its publicity because such publicity supplies a defect there existing, and also 41 L. R. A.

upon the ground that the Family Bible is open to the family. Monkton v. Atty. Gen. 2 Russ. & M. 147, 162.

Such entries stand on the ground of family acknowledgments, and are admissible on account of their publicity without proof that the entries were made by a member of the family, but, when better evidence is shown to be accessible, they are excluded by the rule that excludes the secondary when primary evidence can be obtained. Campbell v. Wilson, 23 Tex. 252, 253, 76 Am. Dec. 67.

III. Cases in which admitted.

a. In general.

Entries made in the Family Bible of the death of members of the family were allowed to be given in evidence in an action for the recovery of land in Kentucky, brought in the courts of Pennsylvania, to prove the time of the decease of the persons named therein, in Lewis v. Marshall, 5 Pet. 470, 476, 8 L. ed. 195, 197.

So, a leaf cut out of a Family Bible, on which were written the names of the children of an ancestor under whom the plaintiff's lessor claimed, with the times of their respective births, which leaf was annexed to a notarial certificate from another state, setting forth that the same was cut out of the Bible in his, the notary's presence, and that the same was sworn before him to be the property and Family Bible of such ancestor, was allowed to be given in evidence in Douglass v. Sanderson, 3 Dall. 116, 1 L. ed. 312.

And in a case where it was sought to establish the age of the testator, the Family Bible of the father of the testator's mother was held incompetent, for the reason that so much of the entries attempted to fix the dates of the births of certain children of the decedent's father was not a part of the family record of the grandfather or that of testator's immediate family. Turner v. King, 98 Ky. 253, 260. In this case it was sought to prove the age of the testator.

Again, the reading of an entry of the minor's birth, made by the deceased father in the Family Bible as a part of the family record within three months after the child's birth, which record was ever afterward kept in the family, was admitted as evidence on questions of pedigree, and the birth of the children, as the proof was clear and positive. Beckman v. Nacke, 56 Mo. 546, 548, 549.

In a case involving the question of the legitimacy of a child for the purposes of descent and distribution, evidence that the father always treated the child as his own, and the Family Bible contained an entry by him of its name and birth, was held admissible to prove that the child was legitimate. Scott v. Hillenberg, 56 Va. 245.

So, in a claim of peerage, where the question was whether the deceased peer, the father of the claimant, had been married or not, a prayer book found after the death of the claimant's mother among her papers was received, and an entry made in her handwriting declaring the fact of the marriage read from it, not as conclusively proving that fact, but as a declaration of it made by one of the of the notice in this case were not in any way an element of the original contract between the fraternity and Conklin. It is only a matter of detail, provided by the constitution to be observed after the death of the beneficiary member. The statement as to age in the notice was written by a stranger to the contract, and the beneficiary only signed it with her mark when presented to her for that purpose. Of itself, therefore, it could have but little probative effect upon the question of Conklin's age, and only serve to stimulate investigation on that subject. George W. Conklin, the son, being asked where he got the date and place of birth which he put in the notice, said: "I got that information from an old Bible that was in the house. I have got it here now." He further said he did not know in whose handwriting the entry was made, and that he had never seen it before it was brought to him by his sister, when the notice was made out. The Bible was offered in evidence, and the plaintiff rested, and the motion to nonsuit was then made. There was no error in the refusal

b. On the testimony of the party making them.

As documentary evidence the testimony of the party making the entry in the Family Bible that he made the entry and that it is in his handwriting is the best evidence of the entry that can be obtained, and for this reason the testimony of the party making the entry is admissible to prove the fact.

A Family Bible is properly admitted in evidence, in a prosecution instituted by a father for the taking of a child under the age of eighteen without the consent of the father for the purposes of prostitution, in order to prove the age of the child, although positive evidence by the father and mother as to the child's age is also given by them. People v. Slater, 119 Cal. 620.

So, the entry in a Family Bible, made by a parent of the birth of his son, and proved by the oath of the plaintiff, is good evidence in an action before a justice of the peace by a parent, under the Pennsylvania statute, for the recovery of a penalty for marrying a son under age. Carakadden v. Poorman, 10 Watts, 82, 38 Am. Dec. 145.

Yet the positive testimony of a father and mother as to the age of a child in a prosecution for the taking of such child for purposes of prostitution are quite sufficient without the family record contained in the Bible. People v. Slater, 119 Cal. 620.

In Whitcher v. McLaughlin, 115 Mass. 167, a book entitled "The Life of the Virgin Mary," containing a record of births and deaths in the family of the defendant's father, who testified that he kept a record of the births of his children on the fly leaf of his wife's manual until a certain year, when the above volume was presented to him, and in which he then copied the said original record, and after that time continued to enter the births and deaths therein, was admitted as evidence of such family record, and of the age of the defendant, without the production of the original record, and as secondary evidence thereof.

Where a mother testified that she made the entries of a daughter's birth in the Bible sometime after she was born, but during the same year, and there were appearances on the face of the entry that the date had been changed as by being written over after its original entry, but it did not appear that any other date was originally in the entry, and the mother testified that it had not been changed, it was held that the question whether there had been a material change in the entry was to be determined by the court when it was offered, before it could be presented to the jury, and that, if admitted in the absence of any showing to the contrary, it must be assumed that the court was satisfied that the change was immaterial, and that its ruling in this respect was not open to review unless it was made to appear that the discretion was abused. People v. Mayne, 118 Cal. 518.

c. On the testimony of the party to the action.

party as to his own age, who stated that he knew his age from the fact that his mother told him, and that it was written in a book which his father carried in his pocket in the court-house, was held admissible. It is not specially shown in this case whether or not the book was a Family Bible.

So, under an indictment for selling liquor to a minor without the consent of his parents, as the person to whom the liquor is sold is a competent witness to prove his own age, there is no objection to his stating that he derived his knowledge of the day on which he became of age from an entry of his birth in the Family Bible, or from any other source of information, but his evidence as to that fact is as a matter of course but hearsay. Edgar v. State, 37 Ark. 219, 223.

The above case was followed in Pounders v. State, 37 Ark. 360, which was also a prosecution for a similar offense.

Although the above cases show that a person may testify as to his own age, and are therefore, strictly speaking, authorities upon that question, yet they are here cited as showing that he may state that he acquired such knowledge from entries made in the Family Bible.

And a defendant in an action upon a promissory note was allowed to introduce as evidence a paper which he said was the family record containing the dates of the births of his brothers and sisters and himself, and was part of the Family Bible, the residue of which had been destroyed during the civil war, but had been in the family as long as he could recollect, and which he had always understood to be the family record, as it was always treated as such in the family, and was preserved by his mother, and handed to him on the morning of the trial by her as the family record. Pearce v. Kyzer, 16 Lea, 521, 57 Am. Rep. 240.

In this case it was said that the defendant was a competent witness to prove his own age whether he derived his knowledge from his mother, from the recognized family record, the Bible, or from public repute in or out of the family, and his evidence was not hearsay in the legal sense, but original, and no part of it could be excluded upon the ground that better evidence might be produced, as such evidence would be open to the other side if it existed. Pearce v. Kyzer, 16 Lea, 521, 57 Am. Rep. 240.

Again, in Whalen v. Nisbet, 95 Ky. 464, 466, the devise of land was allowed to prove his pedigree and relationship to the testator by producing a Family Bible containing records of the births, deaths, and marriages, which Bible his father had declared was kept and received from another ancestor. The evidence was for the purpose of proving the title of his testator to the premises.

In Hood v. Beauchamp, 8 Sim. 28, in order to prove that the person under whom the plaintiff claimed was descended from a certain person, the plaintiff produced an old religious book containing the entry "E. J., her book, 15 June, 1680, the gift of H. J. her father," but it did not appear by whom the entry was made, but the book contained in other parts of it entries of the births of other members of the family which were proved to be of the trial judge to grant the motion. There had been no evidence presented to show that the Bible in question was a Family Bible, or that Daniel F. Conklin had ever seen it, nor when or by whom the family record it purported to contain was written. The evidence of the defense throws but little light upon this subject. Margaret Conklin, being recalled by the defendant, and asked about this Bible, said in the handwriting of the father, and the book had been preserved by the family. The court admitted the first-mentioned entry as evidence tending to prove the descent of the plaintiff from the said "H. J."

And in an action of ejectment wherein the plaintiff sought to prove that he was a legitimate son of his father who was then dead, after proving by other evidence that the decedent was his reputed father, plaintiff was allowed to give in evidence an entry in a Bible made by his father in his own handwriting and signed by the father himself, that the plaintiff was his eldest son born in lawful wedlock on a given date, and also evidence that his father had declared that he made such entry for the express purpose of establishing the legitimacy and the time of the birth of such son in case the same should be called in question in any case, or in any cause whatsoever by any person after the death of such father, in order to prove the plaintiff's legitimacy, and as evidence of the declaration of his father in the matter of pedigree, although there were strong circumstances of suspicion on account of its particularity. Berkeley Peerage Case, 4 Campb. 401.

d. On the testimony of a third party.

The better opinion would seem to be that the declarations of third persons cannot be admitted to prove pedigree by means of entries in Family Bibles, unless it be shown that the persons making the entries are deceased. Cherry v. State, 68 Ala. 29, 30.

In Collins v. Grantham, 12 Ind. 440, the entries made in a hymn book by the father, and after the father's death by a witness at the request of the mother, were held good evidence to prove the age of a child after the death of its parents, as it furnished a sufficient declaration of the father as to the ages of his children, and was not obnoxious to the objections that they were made post litem motam.

So, a mother may testify as to the age of a child, and produce the Family Bible, and her evidence that such book is hers, and that it contains the record of her family, and the name and the date of birth of the child, and that such record is correct, will be received, although she may not be able to read or write the language in which the entry is made. People v. Ratz, 115 Cal. 132, 134.

Again, in Hunt v. Johnson, 19 N. Y. 279, 286, a Family Bible of a brother of the decedent was produced by one of his descendants, who had known it from his earliest recollections, to prove that the decedent died before the date of a certain conveyance, but so short a time before the execution of the deed in question as probably to account for his name being inserted in the deed.

IV. Time of entry material.

It is generally conceded that the entries must be made at the time the event happens or within some period of time thereafter, so far remote from the purposes of the suit in which they are to be given in evidence as to prove that they are not made for the purposes thereof, or with the particular litigation in view at the time when made.

If a person takes up a Family Bible with the idea that it is subsequently to be produced in evidence, 41 L. R. A.

the stepmother of her husband, who was soon to remove to Connecticut, brought it to her house about ten years ago, and asked if she did not want it as a keepsake, and she took it, and tied it up, and laid it in the bedroom upstairs; and that she did not think her husband ever looked into it; if he did it was done privately. A family group of pictures was offered in evidence, and the date of Daniel F. Conklin's and then writes down, at once, the births, and deaths of his children, such Bible is not admissible in evidence, as it must appear that such declarations are made under such circumstances that the relation may be supposed to be without an interest and without a bias. Chapman v. Chapman, 3 Conn. 347, 349, 7 Am. Dec. 277.

So, where the entries made in a Bible are years after the events recorded, and the Bible comes from the possession of an aunt without evidence to show when or by whom, or under what circumstances the entries are made, they are entitled to little or no weight as evidence on the question of age. Amey v. Cookey, 73 Md. 297, 302.

And where a Family Bible produced, instead of being kept as a record of events at the time of their occurrence, appears to contain several entries made with the same pen and ink, and apparently at the same time, and a blank is left for the date of the birth of a party to the original proceedings who was then a minor, and the witnesses testify of general recollections after a lapse of fifty-one years, and not one of them refers to any distinct, positive fact occurring at the time by which the date of his birth can be satisfactorily fixed, such evidence is inadmissible in an action to set aside the judgment instituted by his heirs, especially when such proceedings are acquiesced in for thirty years by the minor. Greenwood v. New Orleans, 12 La. Ann. 426, 440.

V. Necessity of production of book.

The family record itself must be offered in evidence, and where a witness gives in his deposition a copy thereof, or rather recites in his deposition the contents of the record, his evidence is not admissible for the reason that the Family Bible is not such a record that it may be proved by an examined copy, but it must be proved by its production in the same manner as all private writings. If, however, its absence be properly accounted for, secondary evidence, as a copy or proof of its contents, is admissible. Greenleaf v. Dubuque & S. C. R. Co. 30 Iowa, 301, 303.

So, a witness, seeking to prove that the defendant in an action was an infant at a given date, who produces a paper which she says contained a copy of an entry of birth made in the Family Bible must produce the Bible itself, otherwise her evidence is inadmissible, even though the copy produced is sworn to by her as having been made by her daughter in her presence, and compared and found correct by herself with the entries made in the Bible. Ryerson v. Grover, 1 N. J. L. 458.

And the introduction of a witness, to prove the infancy of a defendant, who stated that he had acquired his knowledge from a family register or memorandum in the Family Bible, is not of itself sufficient evidence to prove the age, for the reason that the private memorandum of an individual is of itself no evidence, and when produced must be supported by an oath. Taylor v. Hawkins, 1 McCord, L. 164.

Again, in Kreits v. Behrensmeyer, 125 Ill. 141, 185, a contest election case, a voter was not allowed to be examined as to the showing of the family record or Bible with respect to his age, without producing the same.

birth written thereon, as December 13, 1838. This was prepared about fifteen years before, by a daughter since deceased, and it does not appear that Conklin ever authorized his birth to be so written, or that his attention was ever called to it in any way. A letter to the supreme secretary from the defendant in error, in reply to one from him, stating that the date of birth in the notice of the death of her husband had been obtained from the Family Bible, was also offered. The evidence for the defense also brought out the additional fact that at the time of the marriage of Margaret Conklin, the beneficiary, with Daniel F. Conklin, in June, 1848, she was not eighteen years old, and her husband was not nineteen, to the best of her knowledge. If she is correct in her knowledge of the age of her husband at the

But the evidence of a father and mother in an action to recover damages for the abduction of their daughter is competent to prove her age, and there is no error in the court's refusing to require the production of the entry in the Family Bible. Dobson v. Cothran, 34 S. C. 518, 529.

So, in an action upon two promissory notes, the evidence of a husband as the administrator of his wife's estate, that he knew his wife's age from the entry in the Family Bible in the possession of another member of the family in another country, and also that his wife had told him the date of her birth, and that he had also seen the entry in the Family Bible, is admissible as a matter of pedigree without the production of such Bible. Swink v. French, 11 Lea, 73, 80, 47 Am. Rep. 277.

And in Berry v. Warring, 2 Harr. & G. 103, the court admitted the evidence of an uncle, a witness, who stated his recollections of the time of the plaintiff's birth, although he testified that he had once seen an entry in the Family Bible of the plaintiff's father in his, the father's, handwriting, of the birth of the plaintiff, and that the father was dead, and he had never seen the Bible since the death of the plaintiff's mother, in whose possession it was when he last saw it, and that he did not know in whose possession it passed when she died, and that he did not know whether the Bible was then in existence or not, and that he had made no inquiry about it or any search for it.

And the declaration of a witness was admitted as evidence in Clements v. Hunt, 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 400, although he stated that there was a family register of births in existence, the court looking upon his evidence as equal in degree with that of the entry in the Bible.

Vl. Necessity of proof of handwriting.

Entries of pedigree in a Family Bible or Testament produced from the proper custody are admissible as evidence of pedigree without proof of their handwriting or authorship. Hubbard v. Lees, L. R. 1 Exch. 255, 4 Hurlst. & C. 418, 35 L. J. Exch. N. S. 100, 12 Jur. N. S. 435, 14 Week. Rep. 604.

Such entries are admissible to prove marriage, birth, or death without proof that a relation made them, if the book is itself produced from the proper authority. Jones v. Jones, 45 Md. 144, 160, 36 Md. 447.

To require evidence of the handwriting or authorship of the entries in a Family Bible is to mistake the distinctive character of the evidence, for it derives its weight, not from the fact that the entries are made by any particular person, but that being in that place as a family register they are to be taken as assented to by those in whose custody the book has been kept. People v. Ratz, 115 Cal. 132, 134; Jones v. Jones, 45 Md. 144, 160, 36 Md. 447.

And the admissibility of the Bible as evidence of age does not depend upon proof of handwriting or authorship of the entries, but upon proof of the fact that it is the Family Bible. People v. Ratz, 115 Cal. 132, 134.

And such is especially the case when the book is shown to have been the Family Bible or Testament. Jones v. Jones, 45 Md. 144, 160, 36 Md. 447.

In Southern L. Ins. Co. v. Wilkinson, 53 Ga. 535, 547, the court allowed a Bible to be produced in evidence although the witness subpoenaed to produce it swore that there was no Family Bible of his father, but that there was a Bible purporting to be such a record, which was in his mother's possession up to her death, and then went to a sister from whom he, the witness, got it, but that they did not recognize it as containing a correct record of the births of the family, and the record was neither in the handwriting of his father nor of his mother, but he believed in the handwriting of a deceased half-sister.

The ground upon which the book was allowed as evidence in the above case was that it was not requisite to prove that the genealogy inscriptions, family trees, or similar evidence should be actually written by the father or the mother, and that if the register was recognized by either as such, and was kept by them and after their decease went into the possession of a child, and was in the handwriting of another who was deceased, and was still preserved in the family, it fell within the terms "similar evidence" as contained in § 3772 of the Georgia Code, and was equivalent to declarations of a deceased person related by blood or marriage.

Yet, in order that entries in a Family Bible may be admissible as evidence as a parent's declaration, it must be proved that they were made by a deceased parent or relative. Greenleaf v. Dubuque & S. C. R. Co., 30 Iowa, 301, 303.

VII. When declarant is alive, etc.

The declarations of a father, made to a third party or contained in a family register of births and deaths, are not admissible to prove the birth of a child where such father is alive and can be produced as a witness, as such entries stand on no higher footing than other declarations, and are entitled to no higher consideration, except that if made at the time the fact occurred they are more reliable. Robinson v. Blakely, 4 Rich. L. 538, 539, 55 Am. Dec. 703.

Entries in a Family Bible are generally admitted as the declarations of the person by whom they were made, and cannot be received when the father or mother, or other declarant, is present in court or within reach of process. Smith v. Geer, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 252; Campbell v. Wilson, 23 Tex. 252, 253, 76 Am. Dec. 67.

Where the mother of a child is present in court, and has testified as to the date of the child's birth, it is not competent for the prosecution, on a charge of rape, to introduce the entries in a Family Bible made by her several years previously. People v. Mayne, 118 Cal. 516.

Where the entries in a Family Bible are comparatively recent, and the person by whom they are made is in court but is excluded by reason of his being special bail in the case, the evidence of a brother of the defendant as to the entries in the Family Bible, made by his mother, the wife of such special bail, will be refused. Leggett v. Boyd, 3 Wend. 376, 379.

So, in a prosecution for the felonious taking of a female under sixteen years of age for immoral purposes, an entry in the Family Bible as to the time of the birth of such female is not admissible in evidence where the father is alive, and the record does not disclose any effort on the part of any person connected with the prosecution to discover time of their marriage,—and it is only reasonable to suppose that a wife would be informed on that point,—then Conklin's age was correctly stated by him in his application. This evidence was elicited by the defense. No further proofs were offered on either side.

It will be perceived that the only evidence to impeach the correctness of the statement as to age made by Conklin in his application had its origin from the record made in the Bible. This book, judging by the proofs alone, does not possess the necessary characteristics to warrant its acceptance as an authentic family record. It falls far short of what is required to give it such a character. But the learned trial judge in the court below had the opportunity to personally inspect the book itself when offered, and, in the reasoning which led up to the ultimate finding to which the second exception under consideration applies, he uses the following language: "The Bible bears the appearance of age. Perhaps that is hardly correct. It is mutilated and shows evidence of use for a long time; but the binding is not the locus in quo of the father. People v. Sheppard, 44 Hun, 565.

And under the California Code of Civil Procedure monuments and inscriptions in public places are receivable as evidence of common reputation, and entries in Family Bibles or other family books or charts, engravings on rings, family portraits, and the like are receivable as evidence of pedigree, as the declaration of a deceased person in respect to the relationship, birth, marriage, or death of any person related by blood or marriage to such deceased person, and therefore they cannot be received in evidence where the person is living without his testimony, and so the declaration of another living person is not to be received. People v. Mayne, 118 Cal. 516.

The evidence of a father and mother, cognizant of their child's birth, is prima facie evidence of its date or the age of the child, although there is a written record thereof in the Family Bible. State v. Woods, 49 Kan. 287.

VIII. When excluded.

Entries made in a Family Bible cannot be received in evidence over the declaration of the father or mother as to the birth of the child. Smith v. Geer, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 252.

And they are excluded when better evidence is shown to be accessible, by the rule, that excludes secondary evidence when primary evidence can be obtained. Smith v. Geer, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 252; Campbell v. Wilson, 23 Tex. 252, 253, 76 Am. Dec. 67.

This is so for the reason that an entry in a Family Bible is not the best evidence of the age of a person, the date of whose birth is there entered, but is only secondary evidence, and is only permissible when better evidence cannot be obtained. Dobson v. Cothran, 34 S. C. 518, 529.

In Curtis v. Patton, 8 Serg. & R. 135, the entry of the age of a child in a Family Bible, made by a brother of such child, and sworn to by him as made, by the direction of his deceased father along with other entries respecting the ages of the family, from another book in which the original entry was made by his father, is not evidence where the nonproduction of such original book is not accounted for. See Whitober v. McLaughlin, 115 Mass. 167, supra, III. b.

So, in a case where a claim to a peerage depended upon the genuineness of entries made in an old prayer book, dated 1728, 1729, the evidence of several witnesses, whose occupation for a long time had made them so conversant with manuscripts of different ages that they could take upon themselves to name the period in which any manuscript previous to the year 1700 was written, that the entries were written in the early part and before the middle of the last century, and at or about the period of these dates, was said to be but small testimony, and hardly entitled to any weight,—especially as the book containing the entries was not satisfactorily identified. Tracy Peerage Case, 10 Clark & F. 154.

declarations of the father and also an entry in the family record contained in the Bible formerly belonging to and kept by the father showing that the pauper was born in the defendant town, were rejected upon the ground that it was not a question of pedigree, as there was no doubt as to the parentage, and was a mere question of locality, and that such record could not therefore be received in evidence to prove the locality of the birth, as the rule of law is that the place of a person's birth cannot be proved by mere hearsay.

Again, in a case where there was an inaccuracy in the entries of the Family Bible, and the fact was demonstrated by the baptismal certificate, and the entry in the church register by the clergyman, and the memory of the mother was defective as to the entries made in the Family Bible, the court rejected such entries and relied upon the proof afforded by the baptismal and marriage certificates in connection with the testimony of the mother as to facts about which she could not well have been mistaken. Weaver v. Leiman, 52 Md. 708, 719.

The case of Buason v. Forsyth, 32 N. J. Eq. 277, involved the question as to the right of the plaintiff to a distributive share of the estate of her grandfather. The fact that her mother was always treated by the decedent as his lawful child, and that by an entry of her mother's birth in his Family Bible he declared her to be such, was held to be of no value as an admission or declaration, in view of proof that she was illegitimate. In this case the court commented upon the fact that the Bible contained no entry of the marriage of the grandfather and grandmother as further tending to prove the fact.

And in an action upon a promissory note the defendant's infancy cannot be established by the production of the family record of births and deaths of the members of his father's family contained in a Bible, which is identified by his brother as that which had been recognized as such, and as containing the family record since his first recollection, and by his further testifying that his father is dead, and that he did not know by whom the entries were made, but that the mother was alive and in another county, as there is better evidence accessible, namely, that of the mother, within reach of the process of the court. Campbell v. Wilson, 23 Tex. 252, 253, 76 Am. Dec. 67.

IX. Right of jury to take book on retirement.

It is not permissible to allow the jury to take with them, on their retirement, a leaf from a Family Bible which has been detached from the depositions of a witness, and which contains a record of the births and deaths of the family, and also memoranda opposite the names of some of the family showing that they died in infancy,—especially where there is evidence showing and identifying a party to the action as one of the family, as the possession of such record leaf from the Bible, unaccompanied by the deposition, would be injurious to the party in the cause. Chamberlain v. Pybas, 51 Tex. 511, 516.

of a character one would expect to find in a very ancient volume. The title page being lost, it is impossible to ascertain the date of printing. The entries are certainly not contemporaneous with the facts stated. The names are written in one handwriting, and apparently at one time; the same pen and ink, apparently, having been used. It is also apparent that the dates of the birth of the children were written at the same time, but in a different handwriting from the names, and with a different pen and ink. From the appearance of the ink and the writing, I think that the dates were appended long after the names were written. A correction has been made in one of the dates. . . . The question is, Can this book, under the evidence, be regarded as a family record? I do not think there is proof in the case warranting me to so regard it. There is no evidence showing when the dates were placed in the book, or by whose authority, or what information the person making the entries had. That they were not made contemporaneous with the births of the children named is apparent."

We find no error in the record, and the judgment should be affirmed.

GLOUCESTER & SALEM TURNPIKE COMPANY

v.

John H. LEPPEE.

(.....N. J.....)

A turnpike company, by its charter, was empowered to collect toll for every carriage drawn by one or more beasts which traveled over its road, and to stop any person driving any carriage of burden or pleasure who attempts to pass its gates without having paid the specified toll. Held, that this charter provision did not authorize the exaction of toll from a bicycle rider traveling along the company's turnpike upon his wheel.

(June 23, 1896.)

ON DEMURRER to the complaint in an action brought to recover the penalty for forcibly passing a toll gate without paying toll. Demurrer sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Herbert W. Knight, for defendant, in support of demurrer:

The statute being penal must, by the established rule of construction, be strictly construed, and not be extended beyond its words,—especially when they have a well-settled meaning.

Allen v. Stevens, 29 N. J. L. 509; Lair v. Killmer, 25 N. J. L. 522.

Where there is no ambiguity in the words there is no room for construction. The case must be a strong one, indeed, which would justify a court in departing from the plain meaning of words, especially in a penal act, in search of an intention which the words themselves did not suggest.

United States v. Smith, 5 Wheat. 176, 5 L. ed. 61.

Mr. David O. Watkins, for plaintiff, contra:

The bicycle is to be regarded as a carriage or vehicle. Particularly in relation to its use on the highways, the bicycle is entitled to the same privileges and subject to the same burdens as other vehicles and carriages.

And in our own state the bicycle is declared to be a carriage within the meaning of that term, as used in § 91 of the act entitled, "An Act Concerning Roads."

The word "carriage" is large enough to include a machine such as a bicycle which carries the person who gets upon it. He guides as well as propels it, and may be said to drive it as an engine driver is said to drive an engine.

4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 16; Mercer v. Corbin, 117 Ind. 451, 8 L. R. A. 221; Myers v. Hinds, 110 Mich. 800, 38 L. R. A. 356; Geiger v. Perkiomen & R. Turnp. Road, 167 Pa. 582, 28 L. R. The method of computing by horses, etc., is not the power to collect toll,—merely a limitation upon the power,—and it is a matter of no moment, nor a material point, as to whether the bicycle in this case was used for pleasure or burden, for, if either, the plaintiff was authorized to collect toll.

The act of the legislature incorporating the plaintiff is not to be restricted by a literal interpretation within narrower limits than is required by the obvious intent and reason of the act.

The gate was passed by defendant after he had been refused permission to pass without payment of toll, without the consent and against the will of the keeper. It is not necessary, to bring the case within the provision of the statute, that plaintiff should have been resisted by force, or that violence should have been offered.

Nichols v. Bertram, 8 Pick. 843; Proprietors of Second Road v. Taylor, 6 N. H. 499; Camden, E. & M. Turnp. Co. v. Fowler, 24 N. L. L. 205.

Gummere, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought to recover a penalty alleged to have been incurred by the defendant in refusing to pay a toll of five mills per mile for riding a bicycle along the turnpike road of the plaintiff company in Gloucester county. The statute under which the action is brought is "An Act to Incorporate the Gloucester & Salem Turnpike Company" (Pamph. Laws 1851, p. 177.) The 8th section of this statute empowers the company to erect gates across its turnpike, "and to demand and receive toll for traveling each mile of the said road not exceeding the following rates, to wit: For every carriage, sleigh, or sled drawn by one beast, one cent, for every additional beast one cent. For every horse and rider or led horse or mule, five mills. For every dozen of calves, sheep, or hogs, five mills. For every dozen of horses, mules, or cattle, two cents." It further enacted that "it shall and may be lawful for the toll-gatherers to stop persons riding, leading, or driving any horses, cattle, mules, calves, sheep, or hogs or carriages of burden or pleasure from passing through the said gates or turnpike until they shall have paid the toll as above specified." The 10th section of the act provides that, "if any person shall . . . forcibly pass such gates without having paid the legal toll at such gates or turnpikes, such person shall forfeit and pay the sum of $20, besides being subject to an action of damages for the same to be recovered by said company, by action of debt, or other proper action, in any court of competent jurisdiction, with costs of suit." The sole question presented by this demurrer is whether the plaintiff was entitled, under the charter provision above set out, to collect toll from the defendant for riding his bicycle upon its turnpike. The plaintiff insists that a bicycle is a carriage by legislative enactment (3 Gen. Stat. p. 2940, § 570), that it is "a carriage of pleasure," and that, as the latter clause of the 8th section of plaintiff's charter authorized its toll gatherers "to stop persons drawing carriages of burden or pleasure until they have paid the toll," etc., the defendant incurred the penalty prescribed by the 10th section of the charter, by forcibly passing through the toll gate on his bicycle without having paid toll. It is true that in this state bicycles are carriages, and that persons riding or propelling them upon turnpikes or public roads are to observe the law of the road when passing or being passed by another vehicle; but this does not necessarily make it tollable. The plaintiff company is not entitled to collect toll from every person traveling upon its turnpike. Its right to do so is dependent wholly upon the authority conferred by its charter, and its toll gatherers are empowered to stop persons passing through its gates only in those cases in which the company has a right to exact a toll by the specific provisions of that instrument. A glance at the schedule contained therein discloses that carriages per se are not subject to toll, and that they only become so when "drawn by one or more beasts." A bicycle ridden by a human being no more comes within this description than a wheelbarrow drawn by a man, or a perambulator pushed by a nurse maid.

Bearing in mind the fundamental rule that grants by the state to corporations of franchises of this character are to be strictly construed, and that nothing passes thereby except what is plainly granted, it is manifest that the plaintiff's charter did not authorize it to collect the toll demanded from the defendant, and that there must be judgment on the demurrer. The defendant is entitled to costs.

but providing that they shall not attach unless a statement is furnished for filing within a time specified.

2. The waiver of a lien by a contractor will not affect subcontractors' liens under the Kentucky act of 1888, which gives liens to "all persons who perform labor or furnish labor or materials . . . by contract . . . or by subcontract thereunder," independent of that of the main contractor.

3. The time when the last labor was performed by the claimant, and not by other lienors, is that from which to compute the time for filing his claim under Kentucky lien act 1888, § 4, requiring a statement "within sixty days after the last day of the last month in which any labor was performed."

4. A provision for payment to a con tractor in instalments is not binding on subcontractors so as to affect their rights to a lien under a statute giving them liens independent of that of the main contractor.

5. Payments made according to stipulation of 90 per cent of the estimates, which are subject to correction, of the amount due under a contract to a subcontractor, do not absolutely discharge 90 per cent of the liability for work done up to that time so as to prevent a subcontractor's lien therefor, but are to be applied merely as partial payments on what is due the subcontractor.
6. Partial payments to a subcontractor by the principal contractor should be applied on that portion of the claim which may not be covered by the subcontractor's lien, for the purpose of fixing the amount of the lien.
7. Claims having a common security take pro rata on their full amount without deduction for payments made by the debtor on account of his personal liability.

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kentucky settling the priority of liens upon a partially constructed railroad to foreclose a mortgage on which the suit was brought. Affirmed.

Before Taft and Lurton, Circuit Judges, and Severens, District Judge.

Statement by Lurton, Circuit Judge:

The questions for determination arise between creditors of the defendant railroad company claiming mechanics' liens for the construction of its road, and the holders of its first mortgage bonds, issued shortly after its construction was begun. The Richmond, Nicholasville, Irvine, & Beattyville Railroad Company, hereafter designated and described as the "Railroad Company," was chartered by special act of the Kentucky legislature, and authorized to construct and operate a railroad from Versailles, in Woodford county, to Beattyville, in Lea county, Kentucky. The charter provided that the company might pay for the construction of its railroad with its own capital stock and bonds. On the 1st day of July, 1889, the railroad company executed its first mortgage to the Central Trust Company of New York, as trustee, which mortgage recited that it had executed, and made ready for delivery, 2,375 bonds, of the denomination of $1,000 each, bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, payable semi-annually, evidenced by coupons attached, the principal being payable thirty years after date. It was also provided that upon default in the payment of interest for more than six months the principal sum mentioned in each of the said bonds should, at the option of the holders of a majority of the bonds, become due and payable. There was a default in the payment of interest for more than six months, whereupon, at the request of a majority of the holders of the bonds, the trust company declared the maturity of the principal thereof; and this bill was thereupon filed December 2, 1891, in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Kentucky, for the purpose of obtaining a foreclosure thereof. Various persons and corporations, claiming to be creditors of the said railroad company, and claiming to be entitled to priority over the mortgage aforesaid, were made defendants thereto, and some of them have filed cross bills setting up their several claims. From the final decree of foreclosure, settling the priorities as between the various creditors, appeals have been prosecuted by the Central Trust Company, and by a large number of other creditors, claiming mechanics' liens.

On the 11th day of October, 1888, and prior to the execution of the mortgage aforesaid, the railroad company entered into a contract for the construction of its entire line of railway with the Ohio Valley Improvement & Contract Company. That company was a Kentucky corporation, authorized by its charter to construct railroads, and to receive in payment the stocks and bonds of such railroads. By the contract mentioned, the Ohio Valley Improvement & Contract Company, hereafter designated the "Contract Company," agreed to procure all necessary rights of way, to make all surveys, to furnish all the materials, and to build the entire line of said railroad, from Versailles to a point within $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile of Beattyville. It also undertook to pay to the railroad company, until the road was completed, such sums as might be necessary to pay the salaries of the railroad company's officers, not exceeding \$10,000 per annum. It also agreed to assume and pay the debts of the railroad company not exceeding \$25,000, and to assume and pay the interest coupons on the mortgage bonds of the railroad company during the construction of the road, and two semi-annual instalments of interest thereafter maturing. In payment for all this the railroad company agreed to assign to the contract company bonds of five counties amounting to \$550,000, to be delivered to the contract company whenever the railroad company was entitled to receive the same from the counties for construction of the road in accordance with their several subscriptions. The counties had subscribed, in all, for \$550,000 of stock of the railroad company, payable in bonds of the respective counties, in instalments, depending upon the completion of the road to designated points. The railroad company further agreed to assign and deliver to the contract company, for each lineal mile of road, \$25,000 of its own negotiable 6 per cent coupon bonds, secured by a mortgage constituting a first lien upon the entire line of road and its equipments; also to assign to the contract company the subscriptions made by individuals to the capital stock of the railroad company; also to issue to the contract company, for each lineal mile of road, \$25,000 of the paid-up capital stock of the company, after deducting the stock subscribed for by individuals and counties. It was provided in the contract that the aforesaid bonds and shares of stock should be issued in advance, and placed in the custody of the Louisville Safety Vault & Trust Company, to be paid over to the contract company as the work progressed. The entire line of road thus contracted for was 97 miles in length. Of this, 63 miles were completed. Considerable proportion of the remainder was graded, but before completion the contract company became insolvent and abandoned the work, whereupon this litigation began. Of the \$550,000 in county bonds mentioned in the contract, only \$200,000 were earned. The remainder were lost on account of the failure of the contract company to finish the road to designated points by the times stipulated in the various contracts with the counties. During the time of construction the railroad company delivered to the contract company the \$200,000 of county bonds earned as aforesaid, and its first mortgage bonds to the amount of \$2,875,000. It also delivered a corresponding amount of its railroad shares to said contract company. The contract company is one of the defendants to this litigation, but it has not appealed from the decree of the circuit court.

All these payments were made to the contract company on monthly estimates by the chief engineer of the railroad company, which estimates included the work done and materials furnished by the contract company directly or through its various subcontractors; the contract providing for payment by instalments, on estimates thus made, as the work progressed. A large part of the work done and materials furnished was done or furnished directly by the contract company, but a still larger proportion was done or furnished through the medium of subcontractors employed by the principal contractor. These subcontractors were to be paid directly by the contract company in money, on monthly estimates furnished by the railroad company's chief engineer, who was to give vouchers for 90 per cent of such estimates, to be paid in cash by the contract company. The railroad company seems to have fully complied with the terms of its agreement, and to have made all payments, as the work progressed, which it was obligated to do. The capital of the contract company was insufficient to carry on and complete its undertaking. It was therefore driven to make ruinous sales of the securities it from time to time received under its contract, at prices affected by the fact that they were the securities of an unfinished railroad,—subordinate, by the express terms of the Kentucky statute giving a lien to contractors and subcontractors constructing a railroad, to the claims of all engaged in the work of construction. The railroad company took no steps to protect itself against the liens of subcontractors, and made no payments directly to them. It seems to have willingly met its obligations to the contract company, and to have trusted to its ability to relieve its road from any liens which might exist in favor of subcontractors. The contract company had an independent capital of about $500,000. It added to this the proceeds arising from the sale of the railroad company's securities, and applied all in the payment of its obligations. Its resources proved insufficient. It was compelled to abandon its contract before completion, leaving several hundred thousand dollars of debts to subcontractors unpaid. The unpaid subcontractors were either made defendants to the foreclosure bill, or they have become parties by intervention, and have asserted liens, under the Kentucky lien law, as against the property of the railroad company. These claims, if successfully asserted, constitute liens prior to that of the bondholders. The property of the railroad company is confessedly inadequate to meet both classes of liens. This state of facts has given rise to a much complicated and hotly-contested series of litigations, culminating in twelve distinct appeals from the decree of the circuit court. Many of the appeals present questions common to all the cases. These appeals were argued together. So many of the questions as are common to all the appeals, and as are presented on the appeal of the Central Trust Company, will be disposed of in this opinion, leaving such questions as arise upon cross-appeals of mechanics' lien creditors to be disposed of in another opinion. The existence and priority of the several liens claimed in opposition to the bondholders depend upon a construction of the Kentucky lien act passed in 1888, entitled "An Act to Create a Lien on Canals, Railroads, and Other Public Improvements, in Favor of Persons Furnishing Labor or Materials for the Construction or Improvement Thereon." 1 Ky. Gen. Laws 1887-88, p. 99, chap. 1291, being §§. 2492-2495, Ky. Stat. 1894, revised by Barbour and Carroll. These sections are as follows:

"Sec. 1. That all persons who perform labor or who furnish labor, materials, or teams for the construction or improvement of any canal, railroad, turnpike, or other public improvement in this commonwealth, by contract express or implied, with the owner or owners thereof, or by subcontract thereunder, shall have a lien thereon and upon all the property and franchises of the owner or owners thereof for the full contract price of such labor, material, and teams so furnished or performed, which said lien shall be prior and superior to all other liens theretofore or thereafter created thereon.

"Sec. 2. The liens provided for in the foregoing section shall in no case be for a greater amount in the aggregate than the contract price of the original contractor, and should the aggregate amount of liens exceed the price agreed upon between the original contractor and the owner or owners of the canal, railroad, turnpike, or other improvement, then there shall be a pro rata distribution of the original contract price among said lienholders.

"Sec. 3. No lien provided for in this act shall attach unless the person who performs the labor or furnishes the labor, material, or teams, shall within sixty days after the last day of the last month in which any labor was performed, or materials or teams were furnished, file in the county clerk's office of each county in which the labor was performed or materials or teams were furnished, a statement in writing, verified by affidavit, setting forth the amount due therefor, and for which the lien is claimed, and the name of the canal, railroad, turnpike, or other public improvement upon which it is claimed. Said claim shall be filed and indorsed by the clerk of the court, giving the date of its filing. The clerk shall also make an abstract and entry thereof, as now provided by law in case of mechanics' liens, and in the same book used for that purpose, and shall make proper index thereof. For his services the clerk shall be paid $1 by the party filing the claim, which may be recovered by the latter from the owner or owners of the canal, railroad, or other improvements as costs.

"Sec. 4. Liens acquired under this act shall be enforced by proper proceedings in equity, to which other lienholders shall be made parties; but such proceedings must be begun within one year from the filing of the claim in the county clerk's office, as required by the 8d section of this act."

Lurton, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The first question presented upon the appeal of the Central Trust Company involves the existence of a mechanic's lien in favor of any of the subcontractors. The contention of the trust company is that the contract company agreed to accept for its work bonds constituting a first lien upon the same property, and maturing thirty years from their date, and thereby waived any mechanic's lien in its favor, and that subcontractors are bound by the waiver, and cannot assert any lien in consequence. It may be admitted that lien laws do not, in general, create a lien in favor of one who accepts in full a different security at the time the contract or agreement is made, or who has entered into any other agreement which manifestly indicates a clear purpose and intention to waive the benefit of the statutory lien. A contract for a security which is inconsistent with the intention that a mechanic's lien should exist will be held, generally, as a waiver of the statutory lien; but it is clearly well settled that though the owner obligate himself to give a security inconsistent with the intention that a mechanic's lien should exist, or where the contract is to pay in land, or other specific article of property, yet if the owner fail to fulfil the agreement for such mode of payment, or for different security, it will not be taken as an agreement to waive the mechanic's lien in case payment is not made in the manner provided for, or the security is not given according to the obligation of the owner. Grant v. Strong, 18 Wall. 923, 21 L. ed. 859; Railey v. Ward, 4 G. Greene, 22; McMurray v. Brown, 91 U. S. 257, 23 L. ed. 321. "If the labor has been performed, or the materials furnished, no matter in what the owner agreed to pay, if he has not paid in any way, the laborer or mechanic has a right to resort to the security provided by law, unless the rights of third persons intervene before he gives the required notice. . . . Liens of the kind, except where the statute otherwise provides, arise by operation of law, independent of the express terms of the contract, in case the stipulated labor is performed, or the promised materials are furnished; the principle being, that the parties are supposed to contract on the basis that if the stipulated labor is performed, or the promised materials are furnished, the laborer or materialman is entitled to the lien which the law affords, provided he gives the required notice within the specified time." McMurray v. Brown, 91 U. S. 266, 23 L. ed. 324; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Union R.R. Mill Co. 109 U. S. 702, 721, 722; 27 L. ed. 1081, 1088; Van Stone v. Stillwell & B. Mfg. Co. 142 U. S. 136, 35 L. ed. 964. It may be admitted that the agreement of the contract company to accept, in payment for work and materials, the bonds of the company, secured by a first mortgage, and payable in thirty years, and the shares of the capital stock of the company, was an agreement to take a security, which, when actually accepted, would be inconsistent with the retention of a mechanic's lien. And it may be conceded that, to the extent that payment was made and accepted in bonds and shares, the debt for work and materials was satisfied, and the mechanic's lien waived. It is very clear, however, that under the Kentucky statute a lien is originated with the beginning of the work, or the delivery of the materials. The provision in the 8d section of the act that no lien "shall attach unless the person who performs the labor or furnishes the labor, material, or teams, shall within sixty days after the last day of the last month in which any labor was performed, or materials or teams were furnished," furnish a statement in writing, etc., and file the same with the clerk of the county court,—is not in conflict with this view. This filing of the claim is necessary to the continuance and perfection of the lien. If this is not the meaning, and the lien has its inception when the work has been completed and the claim filed, then the contractor would have no protection against a bona fide purchaser who bought or fixed a lien before the statutory registration. The lien, under such statutes, has been uniformly held to begin with the delivery of materials, or the beginning of the work. It is not a lien originating in a contract for a lien, but arises out of the statute, independent of any agreement for a lien, and is based upon the equity of paying for work done or materials delivered. It is an incipient or inchoate lien until it is completed or perfected by compliance with the statute, and is lost utterly if those acts required for its completion be not done within the time and in the manner required by the statute. Thus, although the contract company had a contract for payment in such securities, which, when accepted, would be inconsistent with the retention of a statutory lien, yet it had an inchoate lien from the time it began work or the delivery of material, which inchoate lien was only waived when the railroad company complied with its agreement, and gave the security or made the payment contracted for. But, independently of the existence of an incipient or perfected lien in favor of the contract company, we are quite agreed that a subcontractor in the first degree is given a direct lien under this statute. It is difficult as observed by counsel, to add anything by way of argument which will make this contention any more obvious than is apparent from the plain language of the statute. The 1st section of the act gives the lien to "all persons who perform or who furnish labor, materials, or teams, . . . by contract, express or implied, with the owner . . . or by subcontract thereunder." The clear purpose of the Kentucky statute was to make the liens of the contractor and subcontractor independent direct liens, the latter limited only by the amount of the original contract price. The lien of the subcontractor does not spring out of the lien of the contractor; is not derived therefrom, or subordinate thereto. The aggregate of all the liens is not to exceed the contract price agreed to be paid by the owner, but this limitation concerns, not the fact of a lien, but the extent thereof. Being a direct lien, its existence does not depend upon the existence or nonexistence of a contractor's lien, and the waiver of a lien by a contractor will not affect the subcontractor's lien.

Opinions of other courts, construing other statutes, are of little importance, without a careful comparison of the statute in question with that construed. But upon this question, as to whether a subcontractor has a direct lien, the case of Green v. Williams, reported in 92 Tenn. 220, 19 L. R. A. 478, is in point, for the reason that the Tennessee statute gives a lien to the contractor, and every person "employed" by the contractor, to work on the building or to "furnish . . . materials." Laws 1845-6, p. 185, chap. 118, § 2, the Tennessee supreme court, in the case cited, said that "the lien of a furnisher of materials is distinct, and independent of that of the original contractor. The statute gives the lien to several classes of persons, and the lien of each depends upon the statute, and is not derived from the right, or dependent upon the existence or nonexistence of the lien, of any other. The contractor may, by contract or conduct, waive or estop himself. But his subcontractor may nevertheless bring himself within the protection of the statute, and independently assert a lien for his work or materials."

The language of the Kentucky act is that "all persons who perform labor or who furnish . . . materials, . . . by contract express or implied with the owner or owners thereof, or by subcontract thereunder, shall have a lien thereon." As to what is meant by "subcontract thereunder," the learned district judge very aptly observed: "The words 'by subcontract thereunder' could not be intended to make the lien of subcontractor a subrogated one, taking simply the place of the contractor, since, if such was the intention and meaning, the limitation of the liens to the original contract price would be without meaning, as, without this limitation, neither the original contractor, nor those subrogated to his lien, could claim a lien for labor and material furnished under a contract, beyond the contract price of that contract. I have heretofore construed those words as limiting the person who could obtain a subcontractor's lien."

2. The contention that the lien claims registered in the county clerk's office before the final completion or abandonment of the work by the contractor or subcontractor last engaged upon the work were prematurely filed, and that, therefore, no lien has been perfected, is not based upon a reasonable construction of the statute. The act requires that a lienor "shall within sixty days after the last day of the last month in which any labor was performed, or materials or teams were furnished, file a statement in writing, verified by affidavit, setting forth the amount due therefor, and for which the lien is claimed: . . . Said claim shall be filed and indorsed by the clerk of the court, giving the date of its filing." By § 4 it is required that the lien thus asserted shall be enforced by a suit in equity, to which other lienors are parties, by proceedings begun within one year from the filing of the claim in the county clerk's office. In view of the limitation upon the aggregate amount of liens enforceable against an owner who has a contract for the whole work, and of the provision that if the liens exceed the contract price the original contract price shall be distributed pro rata among such lienors, it is evident that all lienors should be parties to any suit of the kind, where, by reason of the excess of liens over the contract price, a pro rata distribution must be made. Indeed, the statute expressly requires only what a court of equity, under such circumstances, would order. But this does not, in itself, conflict with the other provision, which seems to contemplate that the person doing or furnishing the labor, materials, or teams is required to file his claim within sixty days after he has completed his work or furnished his materials. The language, "due therefor, and for which the lien is claimed," refers to the statement of the labor that was performed or materials or teams that were furnished, which was the subject-matter of the statement to be filed in the county clerk's office of each county in which the labor was so performed or the materials so furnished. The word "therefor" cannot refer to the last labor that was performed, or the last materials that were furnished, by some other person. The construction placed upon the statute by the district judge, by which each claimant is required to file his claim within sixty days after the last day of the last month in which he performed any labor, or furnished any materials, meets with our approval. The inconvenience of having the final decree postponed until all lienors can be brought before the court who had subcontracts under the original contractor, is not so great as to leave purchasers and creditors indefinitely unduly advised as to the existence of liens for work done and materials furnished until the last work had been done or the last materials furnished under a contract for the construction of an entire railroad. The object of filing the claim is to give notice, not only to the owner, but to others interested; and it seems very unreasonable to construe the statute so as to authorize the filing of such notice only after completion of the entire work, or a final abandonment of the contractor's obligation.

3. As we have before stated, the contract between the contract company and the railroad company obligated the latter to pay the former, as the work progressed, on monthly estimates embracing all work done or materials furnished under the contract. The railroad company did make payments accordingly, on estimates which embraced all work done and materials furnished, whether by the contract company directly, or through its subcontractors. The insistence of the appellant is that the subcontractors must be taken to have entered upon their several subcontracts with reference to the obligation of the railroad company to pay on monthly estimates, as the work progressed, and therefore to be bound by all payments thus made under the contract. This might be so, if the subcontractors' lien was a derivative one, and subordinate to the lien of the principal contractor. When the railroad company made the contract for the construction of its entire road, it did so in the face of the fact that the contractor might sublet the work, and that, if it did so, each subcontractor would be entitled, under the law, to a lien which could only be discharged by the payment to such subcontractors of an equitable proportion of the original contract price. This statute was as much a part of the original contract as if it had been written therein. Under the plain and explicit provision of the statute, there was no way for the railroad company to protect itself against the liens of subcontractors but by so distributing the contract price between all who should contribute to the work of construction as that each incipient lienor should receive from it his pro rata of the contract price. An agreement to pay to the contractor this contract price in instalments, as the work progressed, was an agreement inconsistent with self-protection. If an owner, in the face of such a statute, obligates himself to make payments in advance, or in instalments, as the work progresses, he cannot complain if the effect of his own agreement is to leave him unprotected against the possible defaults of the contractor in paying subcontractors. We do not think that the effect of the statute is to suspend the owner's contract, as to the time and mode of paying the original contractor.

If he has made a foolish contract, it is nevertheless a valid one; and if he cannot get relief through an equitable injunction, in case subcontracts are made, but is forced to carry out his agreement, he has no one to blame for his folly in making a contract prejudicial to his own interests, in case subcontracts are left unpaid. From this it must follow that the fact that payments had been made to the contract company, in excess of its pro rata proportion, for work and labor done or materials furnished by it, is no answer to the independent liens of subcontractors whose obligations have not been discharged by the contract company. 2 Jones, Liens, 2d ed. §§ 1304, 1305. What the effect would be if the principal contractor had made payments to his subcontractors through orders made on the owner, it is unnecessary for us to say, for no such question arises in this case. Payments made by the owner direct to a subcontractor in discharge of the subcontractor's claim and lien would, of course, operate as intended by the parties, and reduce to that extent the liability of the property for mechanics' liens, provided such payments were not in excess of the pro rata part of the contract price due to such subcontractor. So, also, it may be conceded that if the subcontractor expressly or impliedly agreed that the contract price might be paid to the principal contractor, and undertook, expressly or impliedly, to look to the principal contractor alone, such conduct would operate as an estoppel, and prevent the enforcement of any lien by the subcontractor. This case is, however, free from all circumstances indicating any agreement, express or implied, that the contract price might be paid to the principal contractor, and that such payment should operate as a discharge, pro tanto, of the subcontractor's lien. There is nothing to indicate that in any way the principal contractor received any part of the contract price as the agent of the subcontractors. The subcontractors were in the situation of a creditor having two securities. The principal contractor was primarily liable for the whole amount of their claims. And, in addition, they had a lien upon the owner's property for a proportionate part of each claim against the contractor. Payments made by the principal contractor to a subcontractor would primarily be payments in discharge of the personal obligation of the principal contractor, and therefore applicable to that part of the subcontractor's claim in excess of his lien against the owner. This was the rule of distribution and application of payment adopted by the district judge who heard this case in the circuit court. We have given additional consideration to the argument presented here by the Central Trust Company, that partial payments made from time to time by the principal contractor upon monthly estimates of work or materials done or furnished by the subcontractors should operate as an absolute discharge of so much of the claims of the subcontractors as was embraced within the estimate paid, in full or in part. This question arises upon evidence that monthly estimates were made by the railroad company's chief engineer of work done or materials furnished by subcontractors, and that the contractor, in very many instances, paid on such estimates 90 per cent of the amount thus estimated. Upon these facts, counsel contend that the payments thus made by the contractor operated to absolutely discharge 90 per cent of the entire work done and materials furnished during the given month. This overlooks the fact that the subcontractor's contracts were entire contracts. They were contracts to do so much work and furnish so much material for a given sum of money, and that these monthly payments as the work progressed were upon estimates subject to correction. The learned district judge was right in holding that payments made upon such estimates were, in the last analysis, but partial payments upon sums due or to become due upon the subcontractor's entire contracts, and that as a partial payment made by the contractor, who was personally obligated to pay the whole of the sum, it should be properly treated as a payment upon that proportion of the subcontractors' claims in excess of that secured by the lien. The same result will be brought about upon another theory, which is that, where the aggregate of the liens is for a sum in excess of the original contract price, each lienor is entitled, under the statute, to only a proportionate part of the contract price, and to a pro rata interest in the common security, and that he would be entitled, when he came to assert his claim against the common security, to obtain that pro rata upon the basis of his entire claim, and not upon the basis of the balance due after crediting his claim with payments made by the principal contractor on account of his personal liability. Chemical Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 16 U. S. App. 465, 59 Fed. Rep. 379, 8 C. C. A. 155, 28 L. R. A. 281. Thus construed, it must follow that the distribution of the original contract price should be made upon the basis of the entire lienable claim of each subcontractor to the work of construction. If the railroad company pays out the contract price before the work is completed or finally abandoned, then its liability to contractors or subcontractors left with unpaid claims will be ascertained by an appraisal of the entire original contract price among the several persons who did work or furnished materials on the basis of the cost of the work. To limit this distribution to those claims which were perfected by the statutory notice would be unjust to the owner, who had a right to distribute the contract price during the progress of the work. If, by premature distribution, one incipient lienor is paid more than his proportion, the owner will suffer the loss, and be remitted to his remedy against the original contractor. To require the contract price to be distributed alone among those who finally perfected their claims, and upon the basis of the amount of the claims shown by the completed liens, would do great injustice, and deprive the owner of the right to distribute the contract price among contributors to the work as it progressed. The fact that some of the subcontractors have been paid a larger per cent of their claims by the principal contractor than others is an advantage of which they should not be deprived. If any part of their claims remains unpaid, they will be entitled to share in the common security ratably. That some of the subcontractors received some of the bonds paid by the railroad company to the principal contractor, and that others received the proceeds derived from sales of such bonds by the contractor, cannot affect the rule of distribution. The bonds were paid to the contract company as an absolute payment, and became the property of that company, to do with as it saw fit. The contract company was absolutely liable to each subcontractor for the full amount of the price agreed to be paid under the subcontracts. The aggregate sums thus due to subcontractors very much exceeded the original contract price. Payments made by the contract company were most often made from a common fund, arising in part from the capital of that company, and in part from proceeds of sales of bonds received from the railroad company; other payments were made on the check of the company against a fund traceable wholly to proceeds of sales of such bonds; and, in still other cases, partial payments were made in such bonds at an agreed cash valuation. But all these payments were made, without regard to the source from which the fund or property came, upon the direct, personal, pecuniary obligation of that company to its subcontractors, and in reduction of that acknowledged liability between debtor and creditor. The first effect of these payments was to reduce the personal and primary liability of the payor. The second and indirect effect was to relieve the property of the railroad company, in so far as such payments, on proper application, might discharge the independent liens of the subcontractors. If the subcontractors took pay in bonds at an agreed value, instead of money, it ought not to operate as a discharge of their liens to any greater extent than a like payment in money. If we are right in holding that a partial payment in money by the contract company, upon its own absolute obligation, would not operate to defeat or release the direct liens of the subcontractors to a ratable proportion of the common security for any balance left unpaid, then it must follow, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, that it is immaterial whether such payment was made in bonds or money, and immaterial to inquire as to the origin of the contract company's title. The decree declaring the liability of the railroad company proceeded upon the basis we have indicated, and meets our approval.

4. The next objection to the decree presented by the Central Trust Company is as to the method adopted for the ascertainment of the contract price agreed to be paid by the railroad company to the contract company. Appellant insists that it was the duty of the railroad company to withhold the payment of any part of the contract price until all the work contracted for by the principal contractor or by subcontractors had been finished, and all liens ascertained and perfected; that at that time only the contract price should have been ascertained, and distributed among all the persons entitled to share therein. This suggestion is based upon the peculiar facts of this case. The contract price was payable in bonds and shares of stock, and not in money. As between the principal contractor and the railroad company, the latter was obliged to pay this contract price only in bonds and stock. It was also obligated to make these payments on estimates, as the work progressed. This the railroad company did, and paid to the contract company, from time to time, as the work progressed, every dollar that it was obligated to pay. These bonds were converted into money by the contract company, as received, and the proceeds of such sales were the principal source from which the contract company made its partial payments to its subcontractors. The price of these bonds varied. Those first delivered are shown to have sold as high as 90 cents on the dollar, but from that time they declined in market value. Some were sold for 60 cents, some for 40 cents, some for 80 cents; and after a receiver was appointed in this case, and these mechanics' liens were asserted, the market value of the bonds had declined to from 12 to 17 cents on the dollar. Now the contention of the trust company is that the money value of the price to be paid by the railroad company should have been ascertained when the work was finally completed or abandoned. This contention would operate to reduce the money value of its contract to a comparatively insignificant sum. The position is inequitable, unjust, and legally unsound. The railroad company had placed itself in a position where it was obligated to pay out these securities to the contract company from time to time. The statute, as we have before said, placed it under the obligation to see that the contract price was ratably distributed among all persons who contributed to the building of the railroad or the furnishing of materials. If its own contract was inconsistent with its protection against the independent liens of subcontractors, undischarged by a proper application of the contract price by the contractor in discharge of subcontractors' claims, it did not operate to destroy the contract, or to suspend its liability thereunder. It is perhaps true that it might have resorted to a court of equity, and have brought the contractor and subcontractors before the court, and compelled a distribution of the contract price ratably among all the lienholders, or have obtained other equitable interference, by way of an injunction prohibiting the contract company from subletting any of its work unless it should give a bond for the protection of the owner against subcontractors and their liens. If the railroad company chose not to avail itself of possible equitable assistance, it had the right to go ahead and pay the contract price into the hands of the contractor, as it had agreed to do, and take the risk of liability to subcontractors whose claims should be left unpaid. Now, this is exactly what the railroad company did. If the contract price had been payable in money, instead of bonds and stocks, no such question as this would have been material, but inasmuch as the subcontractors' liens are independent, and inasmuch as their contracts with the principal contractor were for money, it follows that the subcontractors' liens operated as a security for the payment of the money; and it is no answer for the railroad company to say that it contracted to pay for the building of its road in land or bonds or shares, and that therefore their liens are dischargeable by lands or bonds or shares. That would be so if the subcontractors' liens were by way of subrogation. It would be so if the subcontractors were limited to the amount due by the owner to the contractor at the time their liens were acquired. But the lien of the subcontractor, being an independent, direct lien, is a lien for the security of the money due on his contract with the principal contractor. It therefore becomes essential that the money value of the contract price to be paid by the owner shall be ascertained. The subcontractor is bound by that contract price, for the statute provides that the aggregate amount of the liens shall not exceed the original contract price. The method adopted by the circuit court was to ascertain the market value of the bonds and shares at the time they were actually delivered by the railroad company to the contract company in pursuance of the contract between them. That method, we think, was the proper one, and did no injustice to any of the parties concerned.

The insistence of the appellees below, and again presented by their several cross appeals, was, that the contract price was $50,000 per lineal mile, plus the various county aid bonds. This contention rests upon the assumption that for the construction of the railroad, and for the other expenditures to be made by the contract company, it agreed to pay $50,000 per lineal mile, in money, or at its election, in its bonds and shares. This assumption is radically erroneous. The contract fixed no money value whatever. It provided that "in payment for this work thus to be done, and the expenditures to be made, the railroad company agrees to sign and deliver to the contract company the following named securities, to wit." This is followed by a detailed statement of the securities to be delivered in payment. By the third paragraph it was provided that payment should be made in monthly instalments, as the work progressed. By the fourth paragraph the railroad company agreed to deposit these securities as soon as practicable, with the Louisville Safety-Vault & Trust Company, as trustee under this agreement. The fifth paragraph provides the method of ascertaining, from time to time, the payments due to the contract company, by prescribing that the chief engineer shall from month to month certify in writing "what proportion the work done, and material furnished . . . bear to the total expenditures and cost of the railroad and equipments, when completed according to this contract, as same may be estimated by said engineer, and the amount payable on account thereof to said contract company, and thereupon the amount so certified shall become immediately payable by the railroad company to the contract company." The sixth paragraph, which gave to the company an option to pay in money, was in these words:

"Par. 6. As the several instalments of money shall become due to the contract company under this agreement as above provided, it shall be the duty of the railroad company to pay the same in money, or to give to the trustee an order for a delivery to the contract company, or its order, of the securities deposited with it as above provided, equal in amount, at their par value, to the amount of such instalment, as fixed by the certificate of the engineer. If the railroad company should pay any such instalments in money, it may, upon depositing with the trustee the receipt of the contract company therefor, withdraw from the hands of the trustee an equal amount, at par, of the bonds and capital stock of the railroad company, such withdrawal to be in equal proportion of each. If payment be made in securities, instead of money, the contract company shall be entitled to receive pro rata payments in the stocks and bonds of the railroad company, after deducting the amounts paid in county bonds, as provided in clause 1, ¶ 2, of this contract."

It is difficult to draw an inference that the company was to pay at the rate of $50,000 per mile in the event it elected to pay in money in place of securities. The estimates of the engineer were to be based on the proportion of the work done to the whole amount to be done. Thus, if the estimates showed that 10 per cent of the whole work had been done and materials furnished, then 10 per cent of the securities had been earned, and were deliverable. It is not within the bounds of reason that these securities were estimated at their par value, or that, if, for any reason, the company had refused to deliver them, a money judgment equal to the par of the stocks and bonds would have been recoverable. But, however this may be, the railroad company did deliver these stocks and bonds as they were earned; and this, as we have already seen, it had a right to do. The legal proposition that where a promise is in the alternative, to pay in money or in property, the promisor has an election either to pay in money or the equivalent, and that, if he fail to pay in property on the day of payment, the right of election is gone, and the promisee entitled to payment in money, is not applicable, upon the facts of this case. To be applicable, there must be a promise to pay a definite sum of money, or its equivalent in property, and there must be a failure to pay according to the contract. Neither essential is found here. No contractual relation existed between the railroad company and the subcontractors. It was under no promise to pay them anything. It is true that they had a direct, statutory lien to secure them in the payment by the contractor of the sums due under their several subcontracts, and it is also true that they have been allowed money decrees against an owner who had a contract to pay only in property. But this is because the property has been paid over to the principal contractor, thus entitling them to a decree for a proportionate part of the value of the property. That value was properly ascertained when the master reported its cash value when paid and delivered to the contract company. The amount to be paid in bonds and stocks for each lineal mile was manifestly not intended as the measure of a money price to be paid, or of a money indebtedness in case of a default in the delivery of the securities. The price to be paid for the work was fixed with reference to the speculative value of the securities in which it was to be paid, and it would be gross injustice to hold that a price so payable furnished the measure of a money indebtedness. In Cleveland & P. R. Co. v. Kelley, 5 Ohio St. 180, the agreement was that 75 per cent of the price of construction should be paid in money, 41 L. R. A.

and 25 per cent in the stock of the company. The railroad company made default in delivery of the stock, and was held to have lost the right to pay in stock. But upon a full consideration of the contract the Ohio court held that the price was a stock price, and not a money price, and the price, as payable in stock, was not, in the contemplation of the parties, a money indebtedness, and that it would be a manifest injustice to give the contractors, in cash, what was measured by payment in speculative stock. The court thereupon held that the market value of the stock was the measure of recovery. The cases of Moore v. Hudson River R. Co. 13 Barb. 156, and Parks v. Marshall, 10 Ind. 21, are to the same effect.

5. Appellant's tenth assignment of error is based upon the action of the court in overruling its twenty ninth exception to the report of Special Master Du Reille. That exception was in these words:

"Because the master valued $652,000 of bonds issued by the Richmond, Nicholasville, Irvine, & Beattyville Railroad Company, and afterwards indorsed by the Louisville, New Albany, & Chicago Railway Co. at 90 cents on the dollar, being the amount at which they sold after such indorsement, instead of valuing the said bonds at the sum they were worth at the time they were received by the Ohio Valley Improvement & Contract Company without said indorsement."

The contract company entered into an agreement with the Louisville, New Albany, & Chicago Railway Company, a corporation of Indiana, by which the latter, in consideration of the transfer to it of a controlling interest in the stock of the Richmond, Nicholasville, Irvine, & Beattyville Railroad Company, agreed to indorse the bonds of the latter company, when delivered to the contract company. The last-named railroad company is not shown to have had anything to do with this arrangement, the consideration for the indorsement proceeding wholly from the contract company. Bonds to the amount of several hundred thousand dollars were accordingly indorsed and sold before any question was made as to the validity of the indorsement. The master, in ascertaining the value of the contract price to be paid for construction, attached no value to the stock of the railroad company, except in so far as that stock had been used to enhance the value of the bonds, as furnishing a consideration inducing the Indiana Railroad Company to indorse the bonds of the Kentucky Railroad Company. We are unable to see any injustice in this. While the stock had no definite market value in money, yet a controlling interest did have value sufficient to procure an indorsement on the bonds in which the remainder of the price of construction was to be paid. If that indorsement enhanced the market value of those bonds, that enhancement furnished a reasonably fair measure of the value of the shares which were part of the contract price. Before all the bonds had been indorsed, and before most of them indorsed had been sold, the act of the Indiana Railroad Company in undertaking to indorse the bonds of another railroad corporation was, in a judicial proceeding instituted by the Indiana Company against the contract company and other holders of indorsed bonds, declared null and void as ultra vires. This decision operated to deprive the contract company of any benefit from such indorsement on unsold bonds, but it did not rob it of the benefit already realized through the enhanced value of such bonds as had been sold theretofore. To the extent of this benefit, it had been able to realize value from the shares of stock, and this enhanced value of the bonds actually sold was a fair measure of the value of that part of the price of construction paid in shares.

Costs of appeal will be paid out of the fund arising from the sale of the railroad.

v.

TRAVELERS' INSURANCE COMPANY,
Rept.

(.....Cal.....)

1. "A proviso exempting an accident insurance company from liability for injuries to a person "in or on any such conveyance not provided for the transportation of passengers" does not include injuries received by a passenger while on a locomotive of a passenger train at the invitation of a railroad official.

2. A person insured by an accident policy in a preferred class as a mining expert is not, while riding as a passenger on a railroad locomotive, within a proviso reducing the amount of insurance if he is injured "in any occupation or exposure classed . . . as more hazardous than that here given."

3. A passenger does not, by riding on a railroad engine by invitation of an officer of the road, lose his character as a passenger within the meaning of an accident policy which doubles the amount of insurance in case of injury to a passenger "in any passenger conveyance using steam," etc.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco granting a nonsuit in an action brought to enforce payment of the amount alleged to be due under a policy of accident insurance. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Mr. Daniel Titus, for appellant:

Whether the insured met his death while riding on the engine was a question of fact for the jury, and not of law for the court.

Anthony v. Mercantile Mut. Acci. Asso. 162 Mass. 354, 26 L. R. A. 406.

Where George Berliner was at the time of the accident, and whether voluntarily exposing himself to "unnecessary danger," and whether "in or on a conveyance using steam as a motive power and not provided for the transportation of passengers," were one and all questions of fact for the jury, and not of law for the court.

Atina L. Ins. Co. v. Vandecar, 57 U. S. App. 446, 86 Fed. Rep. 282.

Haynes, C., filed the following opinion:

Action upon a policy insuring George Berliner, the husband of plaintiff, against death caused by accident. At the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence, defendant moved for a nonsuit. The motion was granted, and, from the judgment entered thereon, the plaintiff appeals.

Said policy insured said Berliner against loss of time resulting from bodily injuries effected through external, violent, and accidental means, and classifies the injuries and the compensation for loss of time. It then provides: "(e) Or if death results from such injuries alone within ninety days will pay $10,000 to Mary I. Berliner, his wife, if surviving; in event of her prior death, to the legal representatives or assigns of insured. (f.) If such injuries are sustained while riding as a passenger in any passenger conveyance using steam, cable, or electricity as a motive power, the amount to be paid shall be double the sum above specified: provided, if insured is injured in any occupation or exposure classed by this company as more hazardous than that here given [that of mining expert], his insurance shall be only for such sums as the premium paid by him will purchase at the rates fixed for such increased hazard." The policy then proceeds to qualify its liability by specifying what is not covered by it, as follows: "This insurance does not cover disappearance . . . nor accident nor death . . . resulting wholly or partly, directly or indirectly, from any of the following causes, or while so engaged or affected: Disease or bodily infirmity; . . . violating law; voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger; . . . entering or trying to enter or leave a moving conveyance using steam as a motive power (except cable and electric street cars), being in or on any such conveyance not provided for transportation of passengers, or on a railway bridge or roadbed (railway employees excepted)." The insured received injuries in a railway accident in Mexico, from which he died four days afterwards. The only evidence as to the circumstances connected with the accident was the testimony of S. W. Ferguson, who accompanied Mr. Berliner to Mexico, and was travelling with him at the time of the accident. The witness and Mr. Berliner were invited by the superintendent of the railroad to go from the city of Mexico to Pueblo, and return. Mr. Cokefield, superintendent of motive power on that road, an old acquaintance of Mr. Berliner, was with the party. On the return trip the train consisted of a locomotive, a baggage car, and three or four passenger cars, and the superintendent's car, which was at the rear end of the train. While at a station, Mr. Cokefield invited Mr. Berliner to go with him to the engine, that he might better see the country, and they started towards the engine, and the witness returned to the superintendent's car. In going down the grade, the train acquired a great velocity, and leaving the track was wrecked. The engineer, fireman, and conductor were killed, and he thought, about a half a dozen of the passengers. He found Mr. Berliner in the wreck of the engine, near the fire box, and burned by escaping steam, and believed Berliner was on the engine at the time of the accident. On cross examination he testified that he advised Mr. Berliner not to go on the engine, that he would get his clothes dirty, that he could see as well from the car, and that he thought it was not a safe place, but that he might or might not have used the word "safe," that the conversation was jocular, but he desired to detain him. The foregoing is the substance of the testimony relating to the accident.

The ground of the motion for a nonsuit was "that the contract itself did not provide for the death of a party by an accident while riding upon a locomotive, but only in a conveyance intended for passengers." Assuming that Mr. Berliner was upon the engine at the time of the accident, — and we think the court might properly find that he was — defendant's contention is that Mr. Berliner was at the time of the accident on "a conveyance not provided for the transportation of passengers," and that, therefore the defendant is not liable, while appellant contends that the train on which the insured was riding was a regular passenger train composed of a locomotive and cars, and formed a conveyance for the transportation of passengers, and that the policy did not exclude him from any part of it. It is well settled that policies of insurance should be liberally construed in favor of the insured; that, where its terms permit of more than one construction, that will be adopted which supports its validity. In Equitable Acci. Ins. Co. v. Osborn, 90 Ala. 201, 207, 13 L. R. A. 267, it was said: "Exceptions of this kind are construed most strongly against the insurer, and liberally in favor of the insured. This is now the settled rule for construing all kinds of insurance policies, rendered necessary, especially in modern times, to circumvent the ingenuity of insurance companies in so framing contracts of this kind as to make the exceptions unfairly devour the whole policy." In Accident Ins. Co. v. Orandal, 120 U. S. 527, 30 L. ed. 740, it was held that "a policy of insurance against 'bodily injuries, effected through external, accidental, and violent means,' and occasioning death or complete disability to do business; and providing that 'this insurance shall not extend to death or disability which may have been caused wholly or in part by bodily infirinjuries, or by suicide, or self inflicted injuries,' covers a death by hanging one's self while insane." It was there said that "the insane suicide no more dies by his own hand than the suicide by mistake or accident," and that the words "bodily infirmities or disease" do not include insanity, and that it is "the fundamental rule of interpretation that policies of insurance are to be construed most strongly against the insurers who frame them." To this we may add that the general rule is that exceptions and conditions are to be construed strictly against the party in whose favor they are made. In a New York case it was said: "It has become a rule of law that if it be left in doubt whether words of the contract were used in an enlarged or a restricted sense, other things being equal, the construction will be adopted which is most beneficial to the promisee." Darrow v. Family Fund Soc. 116 N.Y. 537, 6 L. R. A. 495. In Healey v. Mutual Acci. Assn. 133 Ill. 556, 9 L. R. A. 371, it was held that a death caused by accidentally taking and drinking poison is a death produced by bodily injuries received through external, violent, and accidental means. Many other cases might be cited illustrating and applying the rule of construction above stated, but the rule is so well settled that we deem it unnecessary.

The policy here in question, though of a preferred class, was not special, covering only accidents to the insured while engaged in a designated employment, pursuit, occupation, or situation, but covered any possible accident which might happen to anyone under any or all circumstances, provided it did not fall within an exception expressed in the policy. The term "conveyance" applies as well to the means of transporting freight as of passengers, and in the clause exempting the insurance company from liability for accidents occurring in "entering or trying to enter or leave a moving conveyance using steam as a motive power" is so applied; while the clause here under consideration distinguishes a "conveyance provided for the transportation of passengers" from those used for the transportation of freight. Neither clause specifies railroad trains, and each includes as clearly vessels propelled by steam. If the insured had met with an accident upon a passenger steamer instead of a railroad train, upon what part of the vessel must he have been at the time of the accident to be within the protection of his policy? Must he be seated in the cabin or occupy a state room? The policy does not say so. It restricts him to no part of the vessel, and therefore, if the insurance company sought to escape liability by showing that at the time of the accident he was not in the cabin or a state room, it must import into the contract a qualification or provision which is not expressed or even implied. That the locomotive is part of the "conveyance" provided for the transportation of passengers upon a railroad is not disputed. If the deceased had been killed in trying to enter or leave the engine of a freight train, the defendant here would hardly concede its liability upon the ground that it was no part of "a moving conveyance," and therefore not within the clause exempting it from liability. Upon the theory that the engine is not part of the conveyance, it would follow that, if A were killed in attempting to get on a car of a moving passenger train, the insurance company would not be liable, while if B were killed in attempting to get upon the engine of the same train at the same moment the insurer would be liable. If it had been intended to restrict the insured to any particular part of the conveyance, apt words to express such intention could have been readily found and used; as, for example, in Hull v. Equitable Acci. Assn. 41 Minn. 232, the policy contained the following provision: "Standing, being, or riding upon the platform of moving railway coaches (other than street cars), or riding in any other place not provided for the transportation of passengers, . . . are hazards not contemplated or covered by this certificate." The same provision is found in the policy considered in Anthony v. Mercantile Mut. Acci. Assn. 162 Mass. 354, 26 L. R. A. 406; and a similar provision is found in a policy issued by still another company. See Sawtelle v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. 15 Blatchf. 216. That "a conveyance using steam as a motive power" includes railroad trains cannot be controverted. If, then, we insert "railroad trains" for or instead of "conveyance," the meaning becomes clear. Thus, "entering or trying to enter or leave a moving railroad train (except cable and electric street cars), being in or on any such moving railroad train not provided for transportation of passengers, or on a railroad bridge or road-bed (railway employees excepted)." Thus paraphrased, the only distinction made is in the character of the trains, and not as to different parts of the train. In the first clause in regard to entering or leaving trains, all trains are included; while, under the second clause, passenger trains are distinguished from freight, repair, wrecking, and other trains "not provided for the transportation of passengers." These exceptions, therefore, literally interpreted, have no application or reference to passengers or passenger trains except as to entering or trying to enter or leave, any train, whatever its character, while in motion; and therefore some term or condition not expressed in the policy must be imported into it to work a forfeiture and relieve the defendant from liability, and that is not permissible.

It follows from this conclusion that plaintiff's right to recover under clause (e) or (f) of the policy is clear, unless such right is barred by No. 1 of the provisos. That proviso is as follows: "If insured is injured in any occupation or exposure classed by this company as more hazardous than that here given, his insurance shall be only for such sums as the premiums paid by him will purchase at the rates fixed for such increased hazard." In Stone v. United States Casualty Co. 34 N. J. L. 375, a similar provision in an accident policy was considered. It was there said: "The injuries excluded from the compensation of the policy are described as those that are 'received in any employment, or by any exposure either more hazardous in itself, or classified by the company as more hazardous.' These terms, literally rendered, require that the assured, to come within their effect, must, at the time of the injury, be in an employment more dangerous than his own. The language has respect to employments, and not to individual acts. It is true that a certain degree of ambiguity is introduced by the expression 'other exposure'; but, looking at the body of the policy, we find these terms used in the sense of the risks arising from a business or occupation. By adhering to the literal signification of the terms employed, these indorsements prefixed to the several classes of employments lose all force as independent stipulations, and serve the simple purpose of graduating such employments for the service of that provision of that policy which prohibits the assured from passing, at his own option, from one business to another. Understood in this view, they are properly a part of the classifications; but, if they are to be received as containing new terms of the contract, they are entirely out of place. If the company intended to say to the assured that if he did any act which did not strictly belong to his own occupation, but was embraced more properly in some other business, and if thereby any harm to him accidentally resulted, that in such event he could claim nothing under his policy, it was easy for them to do so in plain language. . . . A qualification . . . so restrictive of the rights of the party insured ought not to be admitted unless the terms of this indorsement will bear no other rational interpretation." In that case the occupation of the insured was stated to be that of a teacher. While unemployed, he was superintending the erection of a building for himself, and fell from the building by the breaking of a joist, and was killed, and the judgment against the company was affirmed. In the case at bar the policy did not provide that it covered only those accidents which might occur to the insured while actually engaged in the direct duties of a mining expert, but covered all accidents not excluded by the terms of the policy, the occupation being inserted only to show that it was within a specified class of risks. See, upon this point, and supporting the case last above cited, Provident L. Ins. Co. v. Fennell, 49 Ill. 180, and North American Life & Acci. Ins. Co. v. Burroughs, 69 Pa. 43, 8 Am. Rep. 212.

Under the evidence contained in the record, I think it perfectly clear that the plaintiff was at least entitled to judgment for $10,000 under clause (e) of the policy, and the only remaining question is whether she was entitled to judgment for $20,000 under clause (f), which provides: "If such injuries are sustained while riding as a passenger in any passenger conveyance using steam, cable, or electricity as a motive power, the amount shall be double the amount above specified." If Mr. Berliner had been riding on the train in any other capacity than that of a passenger,—that is, as an employee of the railroad company, or an express or mail agent, or a tramp stealing a ride upon a brakebeam,—the defendant would not be liable under clause (f). But he occupied no such relation to the railroad company or the train. Though upon the engine, he was a passenger. That he did not lose his character as a passenger by going upon the engine at the request of an officer of the road, see Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Brown, 123 Ill. 186; McGee v. Missouri P. R. Co. 92 Mo. 216, and Nashville & C. R. Co. v. Erwin (Tenn.) 8 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 465. These were cases that involved the liability of the railroad company for injury to its passengers while rightfully upon the engine, and were not cases of accident insurance; but the word "passenger," as here used, is evidently intended to designate the character or relation the insured sustained to the proprietor of the conveyance, and are therefore in point. That the defendant cannot import into this clause of the policy conditions as to the part of the conveyance in which the insured must be, and thus, by construction, work a forfeiture, need not be further discussed. All that is required is that the insured shall be "riding as a passenger" in any passenger conveyance using steam, cable, or electricity as a motive power. That portion of the judgment from which the present appeal is taken should be reversed.

We concur: Britt, C.; Chipman, C.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, that portion of the judgment from which the present appeal is taken is reversed.

v.

DANNENBERG COMPANY.

(.....Ga.....)

Equity recognizes no property right in a trademark which is calculated to mislead and deceive the public as to the place where the goods sold under such trademark are manufactured. It follows that the words "Old Colony Shoe Company, Rockland, Mass." used as a trademark by the seller of shoes not manufactured at the place named, which was at the time the trademark was adopted a place having a reputation for the manufacture of fine shoes, were not such a trademark as would be protected by a court of equity. The prior use by the originator would authorize such court neither to enjoin the use of the same deceptive trademark by another dealer in the same character of goods, nor to award damages against him for such use.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Bibb County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to enjoin the alleged infringement of a trademark. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Steed & Wimberly for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Hardeman, Davis, & Turner, for defendant in error:

The plaintiff's proof showed that the trademark was a deception upon the public in leading the public to believe said shoes were manufactured at Rockland, Massachusetts, when they were not; that the shoes which it now claimed the right to sell under said trademark were manufactured by a different manufacturer than the shoes originally sold under said trademark, though the public was not put upon notice of this fact.

The court was right in sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the plaintiff's action.

An assignee should always accompany the trademark, when used by him, by words appropriate to convey to the public the knowledge that the trademark is employed to indicate that the goods on which it appears are of the same kind and quality as were formerly made by the adopter of the trademark, but are now made and sold by his assignee.

26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 885.

Simmons, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It appears from the record that in the year 1889 the S. T. Coleman & Burden Company, of Macon, Georgia, a corporation dealing in shoes, adopted as a trademark for its shoes the words "Old Colony Shoe Company, Rockland, Mass." They sold shoes bearing this trademark up to the year 1893, when the Company was dissolved. Subsequently a corporation by the name of the Coleman, Burden, & Warthen Company, was incorporated, to do a shoe business in Atlanta, Georgia. This latter company purchased the trademark as one of the assets of the former company. In 1894, and prior to that time, the Dannenberg Company, of Macon, Georgia, were selling shoes bearing this trademark. Ascertaining this fact, the Coleman, Burden, & Warthen Company demanded of the Dannenberg Company that it desist from using the trademark. This demand was refused, and the Coleman, Burden, & Warthen Company thereupon filed an equitable petition, seeking to enjoin the Dannenberg Company from the use of the trademark, and to recover damages which it had sustained by reason of such use. Upon the trial of the case it appeared from the evidence that at the time this trademark was adopted, in 1889, Rockland, Massachusetts, had a reputation for making fine shoes; that the shoes upon which this trademark was placed were not made in Rockland; they were not manufactured by the "Old Colony Shoe Company, Rockland, Mass." (there being in fact no such company in existence), but by the Commonwealth Shoe & Leather Company, of Boston, Massachusetts. The pleadings and the petitioner's evidence having shown these facts and others unnecessary here to mention, the court below dismissed the action. The plaintiff excepts to this ruling, and assigns it as error.

We have carefully considered the record, and are satisfied that the court did not err in dismissing the action. It is a well-recognized principle of equitable jurisprudence that he who comes into equity must come with clean hands. No person is entitled to equitable relief in a case where it is shown that his action is founded upon a matter in which his conduct is deceiving or is calculated to deceive the public. On the subject of trademarks the rule as to misrepresentations by the plaintiff seems to be well settled. In so far as it relates to misrepresentation as to the place of manufacture, it is announced in 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 463, as follows: "It has been decided in a number of cases that a false statement with reference to the origin of an article . . . is such deceit as will disentitle the plaintiff to relief against infringement. So, also, with reference to the place of manufacture; if an article is made in one place, but claimed to be derived from another, such a statement will deprive the plaintiff of relief. Thus, where the plaintiff had resided at one place, but subsequently moved his factory to another near by, but failed to state upon his label that he had made the change, or that he was manufacturing at the new place, relief was refused him." In the case of Joseph v. Macowsky, 96 Cal. 518, 19 L. R. A. 53, it was held that "a person who comes into a court of equity for an injunction in a case of this kind must come with clean hands; he cannot be granted relief upon a claim to the exclusive use of a trademark which contains a false representation, calculated to deceive the public as to the manufacturer of the article and the place where it is manufactured." In Ex parte Farnum, 18 Off. Gaz. 412, Marble, C., said: "Were I to admit the word 'Lancaster' to be an essential feature of the mark, the case would then seem to be open to the further objection that the use of such word would convey a false impression to the public,—viz., that the goods were manufactured in Lancaster, when, in fact, they were made in Philadelphia. . . . Words calculated to deceive the public as to the place of manufacture should not be allowed registration." In the case of Hobbs v. Francais, 19 How. Pr. 567, it is said: "To secure to the plaintiff by injunction an exclusive use of such a label, and the exclusive privilege of thereby deceiving the public, is an object to which a court of equity will not lend its aid. The court does not refuse its aid in such a case from any regard to the defendant, who is using the same efforts and misrepresentations to deceive the public; but on the principle that it will not interfere to protect a party in the use of trademarks which are employed to deceive the public." In the case of Palmer v. Harris, 60 Pa. 156, 100 Am. Dec. 557, Sharawood, J., said: "The party who attempts to deceive the public by the use of a trademark which contains on its face a falsehood as to the place where his goods are manufactured, in order to have the benefit of the reputation which such goods have acquired in the market, is guilty of the same fraud of which he complains in the defendant." See also Manhattan Medicine Co. v. Wood, 108 U. S. 218, 27 L. ed. 706; Siegert v. Abbott, 61 Md. 276, 48 Am. Rep. 101; Kenny v. Gillet, 70 Md. 574. In the present case the trademark placed upon the shoes of the plaintiff represents such shoes to have been made by the Old Colony Shoe Company, Rockland, Massachusetts. The evidence shows that there was no such company, and that the shoes were made, not at Rockland, but at another place, and by the Commonwealth Shoe & Leather Company. The trademark of the plaintiff is therefore a misrepresentation, which is calculated to deceive the public, by leading consumers to believe that the shoes were manufactured at a place which had a reputation for making fine shoes, and by a manufacturing company located at that place. Under the rulings of the above-cited cases, which are decisive of the question, we think that the plaintiff is not entitled to any relief in a court of equity against one who uses the same deceptive trademark on the same character of goods.

Judgment affirmed.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

Jacob WEBER, Piff. in Err.,
v.

STATE of Ohio.

(58 Ohio St. 616.)

"In a criminal case the court has the power to suspend the execution of the sentence, in whole or in part, unless otherwise provided by statute, and has power to set aside such suspension at any time during the term of court at which sentence was passed. Whether such suspension can be set aside at a subsequent term is not decided.

(June 24, 1898.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Franklin County to review a judgment affirming a proceeding of the Court of Common Pleas suspending the execution of sentence upon defendant and subsequently during the same term revoking the suspension. Affirmed.

Statement by the Court:

On May 8, 1897, being at the April term of the court of common pleas of Franklin county, Jacob Weber, the plaintiff in error, pleaded guilty to an indictment for keeping a room for gambling; and the court sentenced him to pay a fine of $400 and costs, and that he be confined in the county jail for the period of ten days, and to said sentence added the following words: "But execution of the sentence to jail is hereby suspended." Afterwards, at the same term of court, on the 9th day of August, 1897, the court, on its own motion, set aside the suspension of the execution of the sentence of imprisonment, for the reason that the said Jacob Weber had violated the conditions of said suspension by engaging in gambling, directly or indirectly, and ordered the sheriff to carry said sentence into execution, and ordered a capias to issue for that purpose. The court heard evidence, and a bill of exceptions was taken, setting out all the evidence introduced, and exception taken to the action of the court. The circuit court affirmed the proceedings of the court of common pleas, and thereupon a petition in error was filed in this court, seeking to reverse the judgments of the lower courts.

Mr. Cyrus Huling for plaintiff in error.

Per Curiam:

The power to stay the execution of a sentence, in whole or in part, in a criminal case is inherent in every court having final jurisdiction in such cases, unless otherwise provided by statute. The suspension, being in favor of the prisoner, is for his benefit, and is valid, whether consented to by him or not. When the suspension is upon conditions expressed in the judgment, the prisoner has the right to rely upon such conditions, and, so long as he complies therewith, the suspension will stand. But when the suspension is without express conditions, as in this case, it is within the power of the court to set aside the suspension at any time during the same term, on its own motion, and to order the sentence to be executed. Cases cited by counsel are to the effect that the suspension may be set aside at a subsequent term; but this case does not require us to go to that extent, because here the suspension was set aside at the same term at which sentence was passed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

PEOPLE of the State of Illinois, ex rel. Frederick W. SMITH, R. L. ALLEN, Warden of the Northern Penitentiary.

(155 Ill. 61.)

Power over a prisoner is lost upon indefinite suspension of sentence without recognizance after his plea of guilty, and the court cannot subsequently sentence him.

(January 14, 1898.)

PETITION for a writ of habeas corpus to obtain the discharge of petitioner from custody of the warden of the Northern Penitentiary. Petitioner discharged.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Edgar Lee Masters, for relator:

The writ of habeas corpus will not lie as a writ of error, for the purpose of reviewing the proceedings of another court where errors have been committed. It is in no sense a writ of error, but lies for relief from irregularities, which render a proceeding absolutely void.

2 Hurd, Habeas Corpus, chap. 2, pp. 229, 233, 384, 844, 569; Miller v. Allen, 11 Ind. 389; Brown v. Rice, 57 Me. 55, 2 Am. Rep. 11; Ex parte Ah Cha, 40 Cal. 426; State v. Addy, 48 N. J. When a judgment is void for illegality, authority is given to discharge on habeas corpus. Illegality in this sense, denotes a "complete defect in the proceedings.

Tidd, Pr. 435; People v. Whitson, 74 Ill. 20; Ex parte Smith, 117 Ill. 63.

The judgment or sentence of the court is usually given soon after the conviction, at least during the same term of the court at which the prisoner is convicted, unless the rendering of the judgment is stayed by the filing of a bill of exceptions for the purpose of taking the opinion of the supreme court upon the case. No court has authority to suspend sentence indefinitely against criminals who have been found guilty by a jury or have pleaded guilty; a suspension of sentence or stay is not authorized, except upon a certiorari or writ of error or an application in arrest of judgment, or for a new trial.

Wilkin, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the November term of this court the relator presented his petition for a writ of ha-beneas corpus, directed to R. L. Allen, warden of the Illinois State Penitentiary at Joliet, to the end that he might be discharged from imprisonment in that institution. Upon consideration of the petition, a writ was awarded, commanding the warden to cause the relator to be brought before the court, together with cause of his detention. A return was duly made to the writ by bringing the prisoner into court, and stating in writing that he was held in said penitentiary as a convict, under sentence of the criminal court of Cook county, by virtue of a warrant of commitment attached and made part of the return. The warrant attached is of the September term, 1893, of the criminal court and in the usual form of a mittimus on a plea of guilty. To this return relator filed a plea averring that said mittimus and the sentence of the criminal court were each void for the reasons stated in his petition, which he was ready to verify. On the issue thus formed the cause was submitted for decision.

The undisputed facts in the case are that at the December term, 1889, of the criminal court of Cook county relator was indicted for conspiracy; that at the February term, 1890, he entered his plea of guilty to the charge, but judgment upon his plea was stayed, and he was allowed by the court to depart therefrom, without recognizance, to again appear for sentence or any other purpose. No order whatever was made in the case from that time until the July term, 1893, when, on motion of the state's attorney it was stricken from the docket. At the following September term, on motion of the state's attorney, the case was reinstated on the docket of the court and, after overruling relator's motion for leave to withdraw his plea of guilty, entered at the February term, 1890, as well as his motion in arrest of judgment, the judge then presiding (not the one before whom the plea was entered) without further pleas, sentenced him to three years' hard labor in the state penitentiary at Joliet, and ordered his commitment, as shown in the warden's return to the writ. It clearly appears that the relator did not escape after his plea of guilty, and that he remained in the city of Chicago, and engaged in business, between the time of entering his plea and his final arrest and sentence. It is thus made to appear from the record of the criminal court, and all the facts in proof before us, that the attempt upon the part of that court was to indefinitely suspend sentence upon the plea of guilty; and the question now is, Having then withheld judgment upon the plea, and permitted the prisoner to go at liberty, without in any way requiring him to further appear in answer to the charge, had the court jurisdiction, more than three years thereafter, to cause his arrest, and pass sentence upon him? It must be admitted that, if such power remained in the court three years, it would continue indefinitely, and might be exercised at any future time, and that, too, without any reason for doing so, except such as might exist in the mind of the judge causing the rearrest and pronouncing judgment. Thus, a youth charged with crime, to which he pleads guilty, may be, in effect, assured by the court before whom he enters the plea that he ought not to suffer punishment, and be given his liberty, and yet, in after years, no matter what may then be his family relations or position in society, that judge, or another of the same court, may consign him to the penitentiary for any term of years within the limit fixed by law. On the other hand, the state has a right to demand, and the welfare of society requires, that those who are convicted or plead guilty to violations of the law shall be promptly and certainly punished. There is nothing whatever in this case indicating that the court acted from any improper motive, but the foregoing considerations argued so strongly against the practice that we should not hesitate, even in the absence of other reasons or authority, to hold that the sentence pronounced at the September term, 1893, was without jurisdiction, and void.

But the authorities clearly sustain this conclusion. Our statute provides: "All trials for criminal offenses shall be conducted according to the course of the common law, except when this act points out a different mode." 1 Starr & C. Crim. Code, § 188, p. 868. There is nothing in the act authorizing an indefinite postponement of sentence upon a conviction or plea of guilty. In Archbold, Crim. Pr. ¶ 180, the author says: "If no motion be made in arrest of judgment, or if made and decided against the defendant, the judge at the assizes or the recorder or chairman at the sessions proceeds to pass sentence. Sometimes this is done immediately after each trial; sometimes at the end of each day; sometimes on some other day of the assizes or sessions. The first seems to be the better method." "The judgment or sentence of the court is usually given soon after the conviction,—at least during the same term of the court at which the prisoner is convicted,—unless the rendering of the judgment is stayed by the filing of a bill of exceptions for the purpose of taking the opinion of the supreme court upon the case." "No court has authority to suspend sentence indefinitely against criminals who have been found guilty by a jury or have pleaded guilty; a suspension of sentence or stay is not authorized, except upon certiorari, or writ of error, or an application in arrest of judgment or for a new trial." 1 Colby, Crim. L. pp. 890-892. In People v. Morrinette, 20 How. Pr. 118, Balcom. J., uses the following language: "I am of the opinion the court does not possess the power to suspend sentence indefinitely in any case. As I understand the law, it is the duty of the court, unless application be made for a new trial, or a motion in arrest of judgment be made for some defect in the indictment, to pronounce judgment upon every prisoner convicted of crime by a jury, or who pleads guilty. An indefinite suspension of the sentence prescribed by law is a quasi pardon, provided the prisoner be discharged from imprisonment. No court in the state has any pardoning power. That power is vested exclusively in the governor."

This language is peculiarly applicable to all convictions for crime in this state. Our Constitution confers the pardoning power upon the executive branch of the state government, and the governor alone can prevent the infliction of punishment after a legal conviction. Courts may undoubtedly set aside verdicts of guilty and grant new trials or arrest the judgment, but they have no power, to allow the conviction to stand, and at the same time defeat its operation by an indefinite postponement of sentence. If the conviction is wrongful or the punishment fixed by the jury excessive, or if material and substantial errors have intervened in the finding and return of the indictment or upon the trial, the court has ample power, and it is its duty, to interfere; but when that relief is denied the prisoner, it is the plain duty of the court to pronounce judgment.

In the case of Weaver v. People, 88 Mich. 296, Weaver had entered a plea of guilty to an indictment in the circuit court on July 8, 1874, before Judge Stone. He was sentenced by Judge Tamant on October 25, 1875. In reviewing the case the supreme court of that state said: "The failure to take steps during the October term of 1874 was a practical abandonment of the prosecution, and corroborates the opinion that such must have been understood as the object of the suspension.

To sentence a prisoner to the penitentiary under such circumstances, and when the trial judge has distinctly said he ought not to be so sentenced, is not supplying his omissions, but is overruling his decision. This, we think, not admissible, and the sentence was unauthorized, and the judgment must be reversed, and the prisoner discharged."

These authorities are cited in the brief of counsel for relator, and we have been referred to none to the contrary. Others to the same effect as those quoted from could be cited. Until the legislature shall vest courts in this state with powers not now given them, it is their duty, in the trial of criminal cases, upon a conviction or plea of guilty to pronounce judgment at that time, unless, upon motion for new trial, in arrest of judgment, or for other cause, the case is continued for further adjudication, and the defendant, by recognition or being held in custody, required to continue to answer the charge. And if they fail to perform that duty, but discharge the prisoner, or permit him to go indefinitely, their power and jurisdiction over him cease, and a subsequent sentence is without judicial authority. It follows that the relator was unlawfully imprisoned and entitled to an order from this court discharging him, which has accordingly been entered.

Relator discharged.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

City of AUGUSTA

v.

David P. KIMBALL et al., Trustees under the Will of Horace Williams, Deceased.

(91 Me. 605.)

A tax cannot be assessed on nonresident trustees for property held by them outside of the state, under Rev. Stat. chap. 6, § 14, cl. 6, as amended by Laws 1889, chap. 175, providing for the assessment of trustees in the place where the person to whom the income is payable is an inhabitant, notwithstanding the fact that they derive their title from a devise under a Maine will through confirmation by a Maine probate court to which they have agreed to render accounts.

(June 17, 1888.)

AGREED STATEMENT for the opinion of the Law Court upon the question of the liability of trustees residing in a foreign state to taxation upon the fund which they hold in trust for local beneficiaries. Judgment for defendants.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. S. Choate and Thomas Leigh, Jr., for plaintiff:

The legislature has found no trouble in providing for the taxation of part of property in one jurisdiction and part in another.

Kittery v. Portsmouth Bridge Co. 78 Me. 93.

If the title to any piece of property is held by persons residing in several taxing jurisdictions, what possible objection can there be to taxing each, according to his share, in the place where he is legally taxable?

The cestuis que trust residing here have a beneficial interest in the trust fund which is valuable, and they are in effect the equitable owners thereof.

Hunt v. Perry, 165 Mass. 291.

There is no valid objection to assessing their interest to the trustees in proportion to the interest of the respective parties.

Davis v. Macy, 124 Mass. 198.

The language of the statute includes non-resident as well as resident trustees.

Shaw v. Hartford, 56 Conn. 351.

This property could be taxed in the state of Maine to the beneficiaries.

The interest of the beneficiaries is such as to give the state jurisdiction to tax.

If the property could be taxed to the beneficiary then it can be taxed to the trustee whether resident or nonresident.

Personal property held under a testamentary trust in this state can be taxed here as this is the legal situs of such property until distributed.

Lewis v. Chester County, 60 Pa. 325.

The fundamental principles of taxation require that property held as this is held be taxed to the trustee in the place where the beneficiaries reside.

Case of State Tax on Foreign-Held Bonds, 15 Wall. 300, 21 L. ed. 179; 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, Duties of Trustees, p. 164.

The true construction of the statute includes nonresident trustees.

This is a tax on property; the property is within the jurisdiction of the state of Maine to tax, and if within the statute the plaintiffs must prevail.

Generally a man is not spoken of as the owner of property, who merely holds it as a trustee and in a representative capacity.

Can anyone conceive of any reason why a stock in trade, bank stock, mules, horses, cattle, and lumber should be taxed in Augusta though the owner lived in Massachusetts and the tax be legal, and that trust property the real title to which is held by an inhabitant of Augusta cannot be taxed there.

Messrs. H. M. Heath and C. L. Andrews for defendants.

Emery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By his will probated in Kennebec county, Horace Williams, late of Augusta, in that county; appointed the defendants executors of the will, and also devised the residuum of his estate to them as trustees for the purposes therein named. Prior to April 1, 1896, the defendants had fully executed the will, and had been discharged as executors. They took out letters from that court as trustees under the will to execute two trusts therein created: (1) To set apart and hold sufficient of the estate to provide annuities for eight different persons, two of whom lived in Augusta, and the others of whom lived without the state; (2) to hold all the rest of the estate, and the reversion of that portion set apart for annuities, in trust to be divided at a future time among certain descendants of the testator. They qualified as such trustees, and filed in the probate court a schedule of the property held under each trust. The property by them held under the first trust, that for annuities, consisted entirely of stocks, bonds, and mortgages of corporations and lands without the state. The securities themselves were all kept without the state in Boston, Massachusetts, and were there held in actual possession by the defendant Kimball, and under the personal control of both defendants. Neither defendant was a resident of or domiciled in Maine, the defendant Kimball being a resident of Massachusetts, and the defendant Vandewater being a resident of Tennessee.

The tax assessors of Augusta for the year 1896 desired to subject to taxation in Augusta the interest of the two annuitants living in Augusta. They did not assess a tax directly against these annuitants for the annuities payable to them, nor for any sums due them or to come to them under the trusts. They, instead, undertook to assess directly against the defendants a tax upon the corpus of so much of the estate thus held by them in trust as was held to provide the annuities for the two Augusta annuitants, which amount the assessors calculated to be $\frac{1}{3}$ of the whole property scheduled under that trust.

This suit is for that tax. The plaintiff contends that the Augusta assessors were empowered to make the assessment on the corpus of the estate, and directly upon the defendants, by the statute (Rev. Stat. chap. 6, § 14, cl. 6, as amended by Laws 1889, chap. 175), which is as follows:

"Personal property held in trust by an executor, administrator or trustee, the income of which is to be paid to any other person, shall be assessed to such executor, administrator, or trustee, in the place where the person to whom the income is payable as aforesaid is an inhabitant. But if the person to whom the income is payable as aforesaid resides out of the state, such personal property shall be assessed to such executor, administrator, or trustee, in the place where he resides."

The defendants contend that the section cited did not and could not empower the assessors of Augusta to assess any such tax against them, being nonresidents and nondomiciliants of the state, upon their property, also entirely without the state.

If the defendants' title to the property thus situated had come to them from any other source than a devise to them as trustees under a will made by a resident of Maine, and probated in Maine, with a confirmation of the trust by a probate court in Maine, it would be evident that this state could not by any statute effectually empower the assessors of any town to assess a tax directly against them for this property. Neither they nor the property were within the state or within its jurisdiction or reach. Conceding, for the sake of the argument at least, that the state can tax every person subject to its jurisdiction for all of his property, wherever situated, and can tax persons without its jurisdiction for all their property left by them within its jurisdiction, yet the taxing power of the state necessarily stops at the state boundary lines. It cannot reach over into any other jurisdiction to seize upon persons or property for purposes of taxation. Apart from the source of their title and authority as trustees, these defendants could not be made in any way amenable to the taxing powers of this state, since neither they nor any of their property were within the state or subject to its jurisdiction. Northern O. R. Co. v. Jackson, 7 Wall. 262, 19 L. ed. 88; Tax on Foreign-Held Bonds, 15 Wall. 300, 21 L. ed. 179; New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 153 U. S. 628, 38 L. ed. 846; Graham v. St. Joseph Twp., 67 Mich. 652; South Nashville Street R. Co. v. Morrow, 87 Tenn. 406, 2 L. R. A. 853; Cooley, Taxn. 15. The statute cited could not affect trustees and property thus situated, even though the beneficiaries should reside in this state.

The question therefore is whether the circumstances, that these nonresident owners in trust of property without the state derive their title from a devise under a Maine will through confirmation by a Maine probate court, and have agreed to render accounts in that court, bring them or the property fairly and effectually within the purview of the statute.

The plaintiff's theories seem to be (1) that although the defendants as individuals and in every other capacity are nonresidents, yet, as such trustees and in that capacity, they have become so far residents of this state that its tax statutes will actually and effectually grasp them; (2) that, although all the articles of the property devised to them or purchased by them with trust funds are actually without the state, and physically beyond its reach, yet the estate which they form is that of the deceased, Horace Williams, and hence the estate, the entity

(of which the various articles are only component parts), is under the control of the proper Maine probate court, and thus holds their situs within this state. These are ingenious theories, but they will be found to run against actual facts and conditions.

1. The defendants themselves, the persons who own the property although in trust, none the less and notwithstanding the plaintiff's theory, actually reside without the state, with no domicile in the state. They acquire thereby none of the peculiar rights or privileges of a resident of Maine. Should they bring suits in the courts of Maine to enforce against strangers their title to any of this property, they could be required to furnish security for costs as non-residents. They cannot maintain suits concerning the trust property in the Federal courts in Maine against citizens of other states, but can maintain such suits in those courts (if for the requisite amount) against citizens of Maine. If themselves sued as such trustees in a state court by a citizen of Maine for the requisite amount, they could remove the suit to the proper Federal court upon the ground of diverse citizenship. Indeed, the plaintiff suggests that this suit could be maintained against them in the Federal courts in the states of their residence, thereby conceding them to be nonresidents of this state even as trustees.

Although their title to the property came to them from a resident of Maine through a probate court in Maine, the title is in them, and not in the court. The property vested in them. They were not annexed to the property. There was no loss nor division of the personality of either. So long as either is resident without the state, he is not resident within the state.

These propositions, if not self evident, are fairly deducible from judicial decisions. See, among others, Childress v. Emory, 8 Wheat. 642, 5 L. ed. 705; Rice v. Houston, 18 Wall. 66, 20 L. ed. 484; Relfe v. Bunde, 108 U. S. 222, 26 L. ed. 337; Hess v. Reynolds, 118 U. S. 73, 28 L. ed. 927; Clark v. Bever, 189 U. S. 86, 85 L. ed. 88; Anthony v. Caswell, 15 R. I. 159; Ailman's Petition, 17 R. I. 363; Clark v. Powell, 62 Vt. 442; People, Western R. Corp., v. Albany Bd. of Assrs. 40 N. Y. 154; People, Darrov, v. Coleman, 119 N. Y. 137, 7 L. R. A. 407; Latrobe v. Baltimore, 19 Md. 18; Appeal Tax Ct. v. Gill, 50 Md. 377; Davis v. Macy, 124 Mass. 193; Price v. Hunter, 34 Fed. Rep. 855; Detroit v. Lewis, 109 Mich. 155, 32 L. R. A. 439.

2. The other theory of the plaintiff seems equally opposed to actual facts and conditions. The estate of Horace Williams no longer exists. Its official custodians as such estate, the executors, have been discharged. It has been settled and distributed, and the distributed portions have vested in new and different owners. The portions now under consideration, the bonds, mortgages, and stock certificates, etc., vested in nonresidents, and were transferred by their nonresident owners to Massachusetts, and there they actually are. The corporation and lands out of which these securities arose were and remain out of the state. The plaintiff's theory is not powerful enough to bring within the state any of these securities, corporations, or lands. They are still in fact beyond the reach of any levying process this state can devise. No officer, however armed by statute or court process of this state, can seize upon it for taxes or other claims. The securities are held by their owners within the jurisdiction of Massachusetts, within reach of its officers and processes, and, so far as this state is concerned, are wholly subject to such taxes as that state may see fit to impose. They cannot escape her taxing power by any theory of constructive situs which the plaintiff or this court may advance. Cullin v. Hull, 21 Vt. 152; People, Westbrook, v. Trustees of Ogdensburg, 48 N. Y. 390; People, Jefferson, v. Smith, 88 N. Y. 576-585; Re Whiting, 150 N. Y. 27, 34 L. R. A. 232; Re Morgan, 150 N. Y. 35; Re Houdayer, 150 N. Y. 37, 34 L. R. A. 235; Kirtland v. Hotchkiss, 100 U. S. 491, 25 L. ed. 558; Tappan v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 19 Wall. 490, 499, 22 L. ed. 189, 194; Redmond v. Rutherford Comrs. 87 N. C. 122; State v. St. Louis County Ct. 47 Mo. 594; Finch v. York County, 19 Neb. 50, 56 Am. Rep. 741; Buck v. Miller, 147 Ind. 586, 37 L. R. A. 384; Schmidt v. Failey, 148 Ind. 150, 37 L. R. A. 442.

The only case cited which apparently supports the plaintiff's theory is Lewis v. Chester County, 60 Pa. 325. In that case, Mrs. Lewis, while residing in New York, became executrix and testamentary trustee of the estate of a New York decedent in the surrogate court of that state. She settled her final account as executrix, but no order of distribution was made, and she was not discharged as executrix. She was directed to retain and invest the balance until distribution should be ordered. She afterwards, but before distribution, removed to Pennsylvania, and invested part of the estate in mortgages upon lands there. The court held that under the Pennsylvania statute she could be taxed there for those mortgages, but also held that the statute did not extend to the property invested in other states. The court seemed to assume that Mrs. Lewis, in relation to the estate so held by her, was taxable in New York, but such an assumption was not necessary to the decision, and is only dictum.

In that case, however, the estate had not been distributed, and was regarded as still the estate of the New York decedent, and not as Mrs. Lewis's estate. In the case at bar the estate had been distributed, and could no longer be regarded as the estate of the Maine decedent.

On the other hand, the case Anthony v. Caswell, 15 R. I. 159, seems to be express authority against the plaintiff. The Rhode Island statute was very like ours, and was thus quoted by the court:

"All personal property held in trust by any executor, administrator, or trustee, the income of which is to be paid to any other person, shall be assessed against the executor, administrator, or trustee, in the town where such other person resides; but if such person resides out of the state, then in the town where the executor, administrator, or trustee resides, and if there be more than one such executor, administrator, or trustee, then in equal proportions to each of such executors, administrators, and trustees in the towns where they respectively reside." Pub. Stat. chap. 42, § 12.

The defendant Caswell was trustee under a will, and, as such trustee, held property in trust for two beneficiaries resident in Rhode Island; but the trustee himself was a resident of New York, and none of the trust property was within the state of Rhode Island. The court held that the defendant was not taxable in Rhode Island for the trust property without the state, and that the statute only extended to persons and things within the state. The case does not affirmatively disclose that the will under which the defendant Caswell claimed authority and title as trustee was that of a Rhode Island decedent probated in a Rhode Island court; but no other ground is disclosed as the basis of a power to assess and collect a tax against the nonresident defendant. If the defendant's title came from a will and probate in another state, so decisive a fact would have been mentioned by the court.

We must hold that our statute does not empower the assessors of Augusta to assess directly against these nonresident defendants a tax upon the corpus of the property owned by them in trust, and situated without the state, and hence that this action to recover such a tax cannot be maintained. We do not hold, however, that the assessors of Augusta cannot assess a tax directly against the annuitants resident in Augusta for their annuities or other interests arising out of the property or trust.

Judgment for defendants.

Haskell, J.:

I do not concur, because I think the official residence of the trustees is where the trust is under administration.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

William H. BENEDICK, Appl.,

v.

William A. POTTS.

(.....Md.....)

1. Injury to a person who was on a car when it entered a tunnel on a mimic railway operated as an amusement, and was not on the car when it emerged, but was found in an unconscious state in the tunnel, does not raise a presumption of the proprietor's negligence, when there was no defect in or abnormal condition affecting the means of actual transportation, and the other occupants of the car passed safely through.

2. A presumption of negligence does not arise from the fact of an injury, when the act that caused the injury is wholly unknown or undisclosed.

(June 28, 1898.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Queen Anne's County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. Constable, H. W. Vickers, and John B. Brown for appellant.

Mr. Hope H. Barroll, for appellee:

In order to maintain his case successfully the appellant must, as the foundation of his claim, show negligence on the part of the defendant.

There must be legally sufficient evidence to prove negligence, and to connect that negligence with the injury, before a court is justified in allowing a case to go to the jury. Speculation or mere conjecture will not do.

McSherry, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover damages for a personal injury, and the single question which the record presents is whether there was legally sufficient evidence of the defendants imputed negligence to carry the case to the jury. The facts are few and simple. The defendant, who is the appellee in this court, was, at the time the occurrences about to be stated took place, engaged in running amusements at Tolchester Beach, a pleasure or excursion resort in Kent county. He owned and operated a mimic railway, called "Pike's Peak Railroad." This is a wooden structure covering a space 150 feet long and 65 feet wide. It is elevated 85 feet at its highest point. From this point a circular, or, rather, an elliptical, inclined track runs downward, making three circuits before reaching the ground. The total length of this spiral track is about 2,000 feet. Open and uncovered cars, weighing about 600 pounds, and having two horizontal seats, wide enough for two passengers, each, are hoisted up an incline to the highest point of the railway, and are then run by gravity down and around the circular track to the ground. In making the descent, the cars pass through a tunnel which is part of the structure, and which is located about the middle of the last circle, nearest the ground. This tunnel is 150 feet long, and completely incases that portion of the track, and hides the cars and their occupants from all observation when passing through it. The roof of the tunnel is flat, and is covered with tongued and grooved boards running crosswise, and securely nailed to rails. Down the center of this roof, and on its inner surface, there is a narrow board, 2½ or 3 inches wide, which is fastened to the roof by wire nails that are clinched on the outside. The cars are provided with handles for the occupants to grasp during the rapid descent. In August, 1895, the appellant, in company with his wife, his sister-in-law, and Miss Magee, visited Tolchester Beach. While there, he, his sister-in-law, and Miss Magee entered one of these cars; the two ladies occupying the front seat, and the appellant the rear one. The car was started, and made the descent; but when it reached the ground, at the end of the track, the appellant was not in it, though as it entered the tunnel he was seen to be upon it. Search was at once made, and he was found inside the tunnel, in an unconscious condition, with a wound upon his head. He was carried out, and taken back to Baltimore, and, after several days, was restored to consciousness. For the injuries thus sustained, this suit was brought. There was some evidence tending to show that a part of the board running down the center of the tunnel roof had been slabbled off at one point, but there was nothing to indicate when that had happened. The car did not leave the track, no part of it was shown to be out of repair, the track was not defective, and no explanation is given in the record as to what caused the injury. The appellant distinctly stated that he made no effort to rise as he passed through the tunnel, and that he did not release or relax his grasp of the sides of the car. He was on the car when it passed into the tunnel. He was not on it when it emerged. How he got off is not shown. Upon this state of facts, the trial court instructed the jury that there was no legally sufficient evidence to show that the defendant (the appellee) had been guilty of negligence, and the verdict and judgment were accordingly entered for the defendant. Thereupon the plaintiff brought up the record to this court by appeal.

It is a perfectly well settled principle that, to entitle a plaintiff to recover in an action of this kind, he must show, not only that he has sustained an injury, but that the defendant has been guilty of some negligence which produced that particular injury. The negligence alleged, and the injury sued for, must bear the relation of cause and effect. The concurrence of both, and the nexus between them, must exist, to constitute a cause of action. As an injury may occur from causes other than the negligence of the party sued, it is obvious that, before a liability on account of that injury can be fastened upon a particular individual, it must be shown, or there must be evidence legally tending to show, that he is responsible for it; that is, that he has been guilty of the negligence that produced or occasioned the injury. In no instance can the bare fact that an injury has happened—of itself, and divorced from all the surrounding circumstance—justify the inference that the injury was caused by negligence. It is true that direct proof of negligence is not necessary. Like any other fact, negligence may be established by the proof of circumstance from which its existence may be inferred. But this inference must, after all, be a legitimate inference, and not a mere speculation or conjecture. There must be a logical relation and connection between the circumstances proved and the conclusion sought to be adduced from them. This principle is never departed from, and, in the very nature of things, it never can be disregarded. There are instances in which the circumstances surrounding an occurrence, and giving a character to it, are held, if unexplained, to indicate the antecedent or coincident existence of negligence as the efficient cause of an injury complained of. These are the instances where the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is applied. This phrase, which, literally translated, means that "the thing speaks for itself," is merely a short way of saying that the circumstances attendant upon an accident are themselves of such a character as to justify a jury in inferring negligence as the cause of that accident; and the doctrine which it embodies, though correct enough in itself, may be said to be applicable to two classes of cases only, viz.: "(1) when the relation of carrier and passenger exists, and the accident arises from some abnormal condition in the department of actual transportation; (2) where the injury arises from some condition or event that is, in its very nature, so obviously destructive of the safety of person or property, and is so tortious in its quality as, in the first instance, at least, to permit no inference save that of negligence on the part of the person in the control of the injurious agency." Thomas, Neg. 574. But it is obvious that in both instances more than the mere isolated, single, segregated fact that an injury has happened must be known. The injury, without more, does not necessarily speak, or indicate the cause of that injury. It is colorless. But the act that produced the injury, being made apparent, may, in the instances indicated, furnish the ground for a presumption that negligence set that act in motion. The maxim does not go to the extent of implying that you may, from the mere fact of an injury, infer what physical act produced that injury; but it means that when the physical act has been shown, or is apparent, and is not explained by the defendant, the conclusion that negligence superinduced it may be drawn, as a legitimate deduction of fact. It permits an inference that the known act which produced the injury was a negligent act, but it does not permit an inference as to what act did produce the injury. Negligence manifestly cannot be predicated of any act until you know what the act is. Until you know what did occasion an injury, you cannot say that the defendant was guilty of some negligence that produced that injury. There is therefore a difference between inferring, as a conclusion of fact, what it was that did the injury, and inferring from a known or proved act occasioning the injury that there was negligence in the act that did produce the injury. To the first category the maxim, Res ipsa loquitur, has no application. It is confined, when applicable at all, solely to the second. In no case where the thing which occasioned the injury is unknown has it ever been held that the maxim applies, because, when the thing which produced the injury is unknown, it cannot be said to speak, or to indicate the existence of causative negligence. In all the cases, whether the relation of carrier and passenger existed or not, the injury alone furnished no evidence of negligence. Something more was required to be shown. For instance, in Pennycantia R. Co. v. MacKinney, 124 Pa. 462, 2 L. R. A. 820, it was said: "A passenger's leg is broken while on his passage in a railroad car. This mere fact is no evidence of negligence on the part of the carrier until something further be shown. If the witness who swears to the injury testifies also that it was caused by a crash in a collision with another train of cars belonging to the same carrier, the presumption of negligence immediately arises,—not, however, from the fact that the leg was broken, but from the circumstances attending the fact." And, so, in Byrne v. Boodle, 2 Hurlst. & C. 728, there was not only proof of an injury, but there was evidence to show how the injury happened; and the presumption of negligence was applied, not because of there being an injury, but because of the way or manner in which the injury was produced. And in Houser's Case, 80 Md. 146, 27 L. R. A. 154, the injury was caused by cross-ties falling from a moving train upon the plaintiff, who was walking by the side of the track; and the presumption of negligence was allowed, not as an inference deducible from the injury itself, but as a conclusion resulting from the method in which, and the instrumentality by which, the injury had been occasioned. In the recent case of Consolidated Traction Co. v. Thalheimer, 59 N. J. L. 474, it appeared that the plaintiff was a passenger of the appellant, and, having been notified by the conductor that the car was approaching the point where she desired to alight, got up from her seat, and walked to the door, while the car was in motion; and, while going through the doorway, she was thrown into the street, by a sudden lurch, and thus injured. The court said: "At all events, the fact that such a lurch or jerk occurred as would have been unlikely to occur, if proper care had been exercised, brings the case within the maxim, Res ipsa loquitur." The inference of negligence arose, not from the injury to the passenger, but from the act that caused the injury. In Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Worthington, 21 Md. 276, 88 Am. Dec. 578, the train was derailed in consequence of an open switch, and it was held that the injury thus inflicted on the passenger was presumptive evidence of negligence,—not that the mere injury raised such a presumption, but that the injury, caused in the way and under the circumstances shown, indicated actionable negligence, unless satisfactorily explained. Whether, therefore, there be a contractual relation between the parties or not, there must be proof of negligence, or proof of some circumstances from which negligence may be inferred, before an action can be sustained. And whether you characterize that inference as an ordinary presumption of fact, or say of the act that caused the injury, "The thing speaks for itself," you assert merely a rebuttable conclusion, deduced from known and obvious premises. It follows, of course, that, when the act that caused the injury is wholly unknown or undisclosed, it is simply and essentially impossible to affirm that there was a negligent act; and neither the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, nor any other principle of presumption, can be invoked to fasten a liability upon the party charged with having by negligence caused the injury for the infliction of which a suit has been brought.

Now, in the case at bar there is no evidence that the car on the track was out of repair. The car went safely to its destination, carrying the other occupants. There is no evidence that the roof of the tunnel struck the appellant, or that the fact that a small part of the central plank of the tunnel roof had been slabbled off had the most remote connection with the accident. It is a case presenting not a single circumstance showing how, or by what agency, the injury occurred, and in which, with nothing but the isolated fact of the injury having happened being proved, it is insisted that the jury shall be allowed to speculate as to the cause that produced it, and then to infer from the cause thus assumed, but not established, that there was actionable negligence. It is not an attempt to infer negligence from an apparent cause, but to infer the cause of the injury from the naked fact of injury, and then to superadd the further inference that this inferred cause proceeded from negligence. If in Houser's Case, 80 Md. 146, 27 L. R. A. 154, there had been no other evidence than the mere fact of an injury, it cannot be pretended that the jury would have been allowed to speculate as to how the injury had occurred. The appellant was on the car when it entered the tunnel. He was not on the car when it emerged, but was found, in an unconscious state, in the tunnel. There was no defect in, or abnormal condition affecting, the means of actual transportation. The other occupants of the car passed safely through. What caused the appellant to be out of the car is a matter of pure conjecture. No one has explained, or attempted to explain, how he got where he was found. Indeed, the two persons who occupied the front seat were ignorant of the appellant's absence from the car until it had reached its destination; and the appellant himself distinctly testified that he did not relax his hold to the car, and did not attempt to rise, but lowered his head, as he entered the tunnel. All that is certain is that he was injured in some way, and he asks that the jury may be allowed, in absence of all explanatory evidence, to infer that some act of a negligent character, for which the appellee is responsible, caused the injury sustained by the appellant. No case has gone to that extent, and no known principle can be cited to sanction such a position. There has been no circumstance shown which furnishes the foundation for an inference of negligence, and the circumstances which have been shown obviously do not bring the case within the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. There was consequently no error in the ruling complained of,

and the judgment of the circuit court must be affirmed.

CHICAGO, BURLINGTON, & QUINCY RAILROAD COMPANY, Pf. in Err.,

v.

STATE of Nebraska, ex rel. City of OMAHA.

(47 Neb. 549.)

- *1. The essential quality of the police power, as a governmental agency, is that it imposes upon persons and property burdens designed to promote the safety and welfare of the public at large.
2. The legislature cannot, under the guise of police regulations, arbitrarily invade personal rights or private property. There must be some obvious and real connection between the actual provisions of such measures and their assumed purpose.
3. "Due process of law," as the term is used in the state and Federal Constitutions, does not necessarily imply a hearing, by one whose property is taken or damaged for public use, according to the established practice in courts of common law or equity, but is satisfied whenever an opportunity is afforded to invoke the equal protection of the law by judicial proceedings appropriate for the purpose, and adequate to secure the end and object sought to be attained.
4. The power of the legislature to subserve the general welfare of the people by all needful and proper regulations in the interest of health and safety is inherent in the sovereignty of the state, and cannot be bartered away by contract or otherwise.
6. Such power may be asserted directly by the legislature, or may, in the absence of constitutional restrictions upon the subject, be delegated to the several municipal corporations or other agencies provided for its exercise.
6. The power of the legislature over private property is not absolute. But while it cannot, at will, impose upon property burdens so excessive and unreasonable as to work a practical confiscation thereof, the court will never interfere to prevent the enforcement of statutes on account of any mere difference of opinion between them and the lawmaking power of the government respecting the wisdom or necessity of particular measures.
7. The provision of the charter of the city of Omaha (Comp. Stat. chap. 12a, § 48), authorizing said city, by ordinance, to require railroad companies to construct and keep in repair viaducts over streets therein crossed by their tracks, is a valid exercise of the police power of the state.
- 8 Ordinance requiring the reconstruction by two railroad companies of specific portions of a viaduct previously erected by them jointly with the city held not to violate prior contract obligations.

9. Nor is such ordinance void, as against the railroad companies therein named as the owners of said roads, for the failure of the city to proceed against other companies engaged in operating one or more of said tracks as lessees of the owners, the charter obligation being imposed upon railroad companies owning or operating separate lines of track.

10. The duty of railroad companies to construct or repair viaducts within the city of Omaha may be enforced by writ of mandamus.

ERROR to the District Court for Douglas County to review a judgment requiring defendant to repair a section of a viaduct within the City of Omaha. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles J. Greene, Greene & Breckenridge, and J. W. Deweese for plaintiff in error.

Mr. W. J. Connell for defendant in error.

Post, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a proceeding, on the relation of the city of Omaha, to require the Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy Railroad Company (hereafter referred to as the "respondent") to repair the south one third of the so-called "Eleventh Street Viaduct," in said city. There was a trial upon issues joined in the district court for Douglas county, resulting in a finding and judgment in accordance with the prayer of the relator, and which has, by appropriate proceedings, been removed into this court for review. It is essential to a perfect understanding of the questions discussed to refer in detail to the legislation of the state and the city, so far as it relates to the subject of the controversy; and, in so doing, we will follow the order in which they are presented in the valuable brief submitted in behalf of the respondent.

In the year 1869 the Omaha & Southwestern Railroad Company was organized under the General Statutes of this state, and immediately thereafter constructed a line of road from the city of Omaha, in a southwesterly direction, to a point on the Platte river, in Sarpy county, and which it continued to operate until the year 1871, when it transferred all of its property and franchises to the Burlington & Missouri River Railroad Company, also a Nebraska corporation, by lease for 999 years. Said road was by the last named company operated until 1880, in which year it was, together has been defined as one intended to affect transactions which occurred or rights which accrued before it became operative as such, and which ascribes to them effects not inherent in their nature, in view of the law in force at the time of their occurrence. Bishop, Written Laws, § 88; Black, Interp. Laws, p. 247. The language employed in the statute is "any viaduct or viaducts," and must, when read in the light of the authorities cited, be held to include such as were then in existence, as well as those subsequently constructed. The essential quality of the police power, as a governmental agency, is that it imposes upon persons and property burdens designed to promote the safety and welfare of the general public. It is one of the powers which has been reserved by the people of the state, and which cannot be surrendered, to require persons and corporations to so exercise and enjoy their rights as not unnecessarily to injure others. That the principle stated is especially applicable to existing rights, without regard to the time of their acquirement, or to the source from whence they are derived, appears to us a self-evident proposition, not requiring argument, and the subject will not thereafter be further pursued in this connection.

The next and most important subject of inquiry is presented by respondent's contention that the ordinance under which the city proceeded in ordering the repairs in question contemplates the taking of its property without due process of law, within the meaning of the state and Federal Constitutions, and also impairs the obligation of the contract under which its track was laid, and under which said viaduct was constructed. The difficulty attending a solution of the questions presented by this assignment is augmented from the fact that courts have not always observed the distinction between the different reserved powers of the state, and have cited indiscriminately cases involving the police power, the taxing power, and the power of eminent domain. Nor is the confusion on that account at all strange, when we remember that those powers all depend for their vitality upon a common principle, viz., the subordination of private rights to the public welfare,—of the individual to the community. Of the cases frequently cited to illustrate that principle, many involve an application of two or more of the powers enumerated, while in others the line of distinction is by no means clearly apparent. Many attempts at defining the "police power" have been made, but in none has the limit of its exercise been defined with precision. It is, in the language of Chief Justice Shaw in Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 53, "much easier to perceive and realize the existence and sources of this power than to mark its boundaries, or prescribe limits to its exercise." Doubtless, the safe course to pursue in attaining the desired result is that which is characterized by Mr. Justice Miller, in Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 24 L. ed. 618, as "the gradual process of judicial inclusion and exclusion." We held in Smiley v. MacDonald, 42 Neb. 5, 27 L. R. A. 540, that the legislature cannot, under the guise of a police regulation, arbitrarily invade private property or personal rights, but that the court must be able to perceive some clear and real connection between the assumed purpose of the law and its actual provisions. The obvious purpose of the legislation in this case, both state and municipal, is to promote the convenience and safety of the public at a grade crossing, which is judicially recognized as a place of danger. It is, in short, the exercise of the governmental power and duty to secure a safe and necessary highway, and must be upheld, if at all, as a legitimate exercise of the police power of the state. The authorities which fully sustain this proposition will be noticed in the course of our further examination of this case, and need not be here cited. The questions presented by this assignment are, in principle, nearly allied, covering substantially the same field of inquiry, and will, for convenience, be considered together.

The proceeding by the mayor and council is, it is claimed, essentially judicial in character; and, to use the language of the respondent, "such a proceeding, without notice to those concerned, and without giving them an opportunity to be heard, violates every maxim and principle of constitutional government." The term "due process of law" is, like the "police power of the state," not susceptible of a precise definition. However, that of Judge Cooley [Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 484] appears to have proved the most acceptable to the courts of this country, viz.: "'Due process of law,' in each particular case means, such an exertion of the powers of government as the settled maxims of law permit and sanction, and under such safeguards for the protection of individual rights as those maxims prescribe for the class of cases to which the one in question belongs." In Alfala Irrig. Dist. Directors v. Collins, 46 Neb. 411, we held, in effect, that the constitutional requirement with respect to that subject does not imply a hearing according to the established practice in courts of common law or equity, but that it is satisfied whenever the citizen whose property is taken or damaged for public use is afforded an adequate remedy therefor in a court of competent jurisdiction. And the doctrine is now firmly established, although after some diversity of opinion, that previous notice, and an opportunity to be heard, by persons thereby affected, is not indispensable to a valid exercise of the police power, or the power to levy and collect taxes, whether ad valorem, by the ordinary means, or such as are denominated "special assessments," and chargeable against particular property. In McMillen v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 37, 24 L. ed. 335, Mr. Justice Miller, in holding that the courts of the United States could not be invoked to prevent the collection of an alleged illegal license tax levied by the state of Louisiana, on the ground that the effect thereof was to take the petitioner's property without due process of law, said: "It seems to be supposed that it is essential to the validity of this tax that the party charged should have been present, or had an opportunity to be present, in some tribunal, when he was assessed. But this is not, and never has been, considered necessary to the validity of a tax. . . . Nor is the person charged with such a tax without legal remedy by the laws of Louisiana. It is probable that in that state, as in others, if compelled to pay the tax by a levy upon his property, he can sue the proper party, and recover back the money as paid under duress if the tax was illegal." True, it was said in Barker v. Omaha, 16 Neb. 269, that "notice of some kind must be given to a property owner, . . . before an assessment upon his property becomes finally and irrevocably fixed." But the learned author of that opinion did not say or imply that the means of redress afforded in other cases against illegal assessment fails to satisfy the constitutional inhibition against the taking of property without due process of law. What is meant—and what is the doctrine of the authorities there cited—is that a property owner shall, before being required to pay, have an opportunity to be heard in the courts, in a proceeding instituted by himself, or by the municipality to which the taxing power of the state has been by law intrusted. Although there are many cases in the state and Federal courts in harmony with the opinion of Justice Miller, from which the foregoing is quoted, and fully sustaining the proposition here asserted, we prefer to confine our examination of such as involve an exercise of the police power, rather than the power of taxation.

In Woodruff v. Catlin, 54 Conn. 295, it is said: "The legislature having determined that the intersection of two railways with a highway in the city of Hartford, at grade, is a nuisance, dangerous to life, in the absence of action on the part either of the city or of the railroads, may compel them severally to become the owners of the right to lay out new highways and new railways over such land, and in such manner as will separate the grade of the railways from that of the highway at intersection; may compel them to use the right for the accomplishment of the desired end; may determine that the expense shall be paid by either corporation alone, or in part by both. . . . And it has the power to do all this for the specified purpose, and to do it through the instrumentality of a commission."

New York & N. E. R. Co.'s Appeal, 58 Conn. 532, involved the constitutionality of an act of the legislature limiting the amount chargeable to a town or village, on the separation of the grade of a highway from that of a railway track situated therein, to one fourth of the whole cost of such improvement. Such a limitation, it was argued, authorized the taking of the appellant's property without due process of law, inasmuch as it prevented the commissioner to whom the discretion was intrusted from apportioning to the city a just and equitable share of the burden imposed by the act. But the court held otherwise. Carpenter, J., speaking for the court, after remarking that the policy of the law was to abolish grade crossings, said: "Legislation on this subject assumes that each party, in the discharge of its duty, is concerned in creating the danger, and that each may justly be required to contribute to the expense of its removal, or that either may be required to pay the whole, and, if each contributes, that the proportion which each shall pay may be determined by the legislature in each case as it arises, or by a general rule, by itself, or by a delegation of its power to the railroad commissioners. This exercise of power is justifiable on the ground that government itself, in the discharge of its governmental duties, undertakes to remove the danger; and does it in the same manner, and through the same instrumentalities, that it provides and maintains highways through, and at the expense of, the towns and other corporations. So far as towns are concerned, it is a duty that has ever devolved upon them to keep the highways reasonably safe. They are compelled to act without compensation or pecuniary profit. Their sole motive is the public welfare. Railroad companies, in some sense, are but the agents of the government in affording to the public a more expeditious and vastly-improved method of travel. . . . Unlike towns, they do not act upon compulsion, but by choice. Their motive is private gain; public benefit is incidental. . . . They contribute largely to the danger, and the state may well require them to contribute largely to its removal. . . . Requiring the railroad company to pay three fourths of the expense, however just it might be to require the town to pay more than one fourth, is not a matter of which the railroad company can legally complain." That doctrine was reasserted by the same court in New York & N. E. R. Co.'s Appeal, 62 Conn. 527, which was, upon proceedings in error to the Supreme Court of the United States, affirmed, and the validity of the act in question expressly upheld. See New York & N. E. R. Co. v. Bristol, 151 U. S. 556, 38 L. ed. 270. In the opinion last referred to this language was used by Chief Justice Fuller: "Nor is there necessarily such denial, nor an infringement of the obligation of contracts, in the imposition upon them [railway companies], in particular instances, of the entire expense of the performance of acts required in the public interest, in the exercise of legislative discretion; nor are they thereby deprived of property without due process of law, by statutes under which the result is ascertained in a mode suited to the nature of the case, and not merely arbitrary and capricious; and that the adjudication of the highest court of a state, that in such particulars a law enacted in the exercise of the police power of the state is valid, will not be reversed by this court on the ground of an infraction of the Constitution of the United States." And substantially similar views are expressed by that court in Missouri P. R. Co. v. Humes, 115 U. S. 512, 29 L. ed. 463, and Eldridge v. Trezevant, 160 U. S. 452, 40 L. ed. 490.

In Train v. Boston Disinfecting Co. 144 Mass. 529, 59 Am. Rep. 118, a regulation of the board of health for the disinfecting of certain vessels and goods imported therein, at the owner's expense, was assailed on the ground that no provision was by law made for a hearing, or for review by appeal or otherwise. But the court pronounced the regulation a reasonable one, and defensible as an exercise of the police power of the state.

In Com. v. Roberts, 155 Mass. 281, 16 L. R. A. 400, an act required all buildings used for a designated purpose to be supplied with sufficient water-closet connections. It was held, although there was no provision for notice or hearing, that said act was a valid exercise of the police power, and applicable to buildings erected before its enactment as well as to those subsequently constructed.

In People, Kimball, v. Boston & A. R. Co. 70 N. Y. 569, the appellant company was required to construct a bridge over a turnpike road, on the ground that the state may, under the powers reserved to the legislature, impose upon railroad corporations such additional burdens as are essential to the public welfare.

In State v. Missouri P. R. Co. 83 Kan. 176, the power of the city of Atchison to compel the respondents to construct viaducts was sustained under legislation substantially like that here involved. Referring to the subject of notice, the court, by Valentine, J., observed: "We might, however, say that we do not think that it is necessary that the city should have given the railroad company notice before passing the ordinance requiring them [respondents] to construct the viaduct. Notice afterwards, with an opportunity on the part of the railroad companies to contest the validity of the ordinance, and the right of the city to compel them to construct the viaduct, is sufficient."

But the clearest and most satisfactory exposition of the subject is found in New York Health Department v. Trinity Church, 145 N. Y. 82, 27 L. R. A. 710, which was an action to recover a penalty under a statute requiring all tenement houses to be supplied with water on each floor occupied, or intended to be occupied, by one or more families, whenever so directed by the board of health. The statute made no provision for notice to property owners, and none was in fact given, while it was admitted that it would cost the respondent a considerable sum of money to comply with the order of the board. In the opinion of Peckham, J., it is said: "The legislature has power, and has exercised it in countless instances, to enact general laws upon the subject of the public health or safety, without providing that the parties who are to be affected by those laws shall first be heard before they shall take effect in any particular case. . . . The fact that the legislature has chosen to delegate a certain portion of its power to the board of health . . . would not alter the principle, nor would it be necessary to provide that the board should give notice and afford a hearing to the owner before it made such order." And in answer to the argument that the effect of the act was to impair contract obligations the same learned judge said: "Laws and regulations of a police nature, although they may disturb the enjoyment of individual rights, are not unconstitutional, though no provision is made for compensation for such disturbances. They do not appropriate private property for public use, but simply regulate its use and enjoyment by the owner. If he suffers injury, it is either damnum absque injuria, or, in the theory of the law, he is compensated for it by sharing in the general benefits which the regulations are intended and calculated to secure." See also People v. Union P. R. Co. 20 Colo. 186; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 141, and note; Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 83; Baker v. Boston, 12 Pick. 184, 22 Am. Dec. 421; Thorpe v. Rutland & B. R. Co. 27 Vt. 140, 62 Am. Dec. 625; Tiedeman, Pol. Power, § 124; Prentice, Police Powers, pp. 58, 67. And the principle which underlies all of the cases cited was distinctly recognized by this court in State, Lancaster 41 L. R. A.

County, v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 29 Neb. 412.

It will not, of course, be contended that the power of the legislature is in that respect absolute, or that it may at will impose upon property burdens so unreasonable as to work a practical confiscation. There is, as all admit, a limit beyond which it cannot go, and within which it will be confined by the judicial power of the state. Prentice, Pol. Powers, p. 31; Minnesota v. Barber, 136 U. S. 313, 34 L. ed. 455, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 185. But it is unnecessary, if it were possible, to point out the boundary line between reasonable and unreasonable exactions. It is enough that the courts will not interfere to prevent the enforcement of statutes on account of any mere difference of opinion between them and the lawmaking branch of the government respecting the wisdom or necessity of particular measures.

To summarize briefly, we conclude from the foregoing authorities, and many others examined, that the legislation assailed in this cause is a valid exercise of the police power of the state over the subject to which it applies; that it does not authorize the appropriation of the respondent's property without due process of law, in a constitutional sense, since the latter is able to invoke the equal protection of the law by any appropriate proceeding, and because it did in fact put in issue by the answer, both the validity of the ordinance, and the reasonableness of the amount apportioned to it for the repair of the viaduct in question. Nor is such legislation violative of any contract obligation, since the power to subserve the general welfare of the people by all needful and proper regulations in the interest of health and safety cannot be bartered away by contract or otherwise. Such power is inherent in the sovereignty of the state, and may be asserted directly by the legislature, or may, in the absence of constitutional restriction upon the subject, be delegated to the several municipal corporations or other agencies provided for its exercise. The single purpose of the legislation, whether contemplating the erection or reconstruction of the viaduct, is to reduce to a minimum the danger to life and limb for which the railroad companies are chiefly responsible, and it is not unreasonable to require the parties to maintain the street in a condition of safety, for whose benefit and convenience it was originally rendered unsafe.

The argument assailing the ordinance on the ground that it requires the respondent to repair the south one third of the viaduct, instead of contributing a designated part of the entire cost, is, we think, without merit. Section 48, above set out, confers upon the mayor and council of the city plenary powers with respect to the subject. They may, by ordinance, determine the proportion of the viaduct and approaches to be constructed by two or more railroad companies owning or operating separate lines of track to be crossed thereby, or may determine the cost thereof to be borne by each. The ordinance, if not within the letter of the city's charter, is clearly within its declared scope and purpose. But, in the absence of any statute regulating the manner of apportioning the cost of such repairs, it cannot be said that the plan adopted is either so inequit-able or unreasonable as to amount to an abuse of the discretion conferred upon the officers of the city. Equally groundless is the contention that the city was required to proceed against the Chicago, Rock Island, & Pacific and the Chicago, Milwaukee, & St. Paul Railroad Companies, then engaged in operating, jointly with the Union Pacific Company, certain tracks belonging to the latter, across Eleventh street, and under said viaduct. The statute, as we have seen, authorizes the city to require two or more railroad companies owning or operating separate lines of track to erect, construct, reconstruct, or repair viaducts. If we admit the companies named, as lessees of the Union Pacific Company, to be within the terms of the act, it does not follow that they are in any sense necessary parties to the proceeding, since the city might still have proceeded against the owners of the tracks operated by them. Such is the plain and necessary inference from the language of the statute.

Lastly, it is argued that, conceding the respondent's duty to repair the viaduct as commanded by the ordinance, such duty is not one which will be enforced by means of the writ of mandamus. By reference to § 48 of the city's charter, it will be observed that authority to proceed by mandamus, or other appropriate proceedings, is therein expressly conferred. But, independent of that provision, mandamus has long been recognized as an appropriate remedy, if not the only adequate remedy, in cases of like character. Indeed, so firmly is that rule established by the decisions of this court as not to admit of a doubt at this time. See State, Mattoon, v. Republican Valley R. Co. 17 Neb. 647, 52 Am. Rep. 424, 18 Neb. 512; State, Farmer, v. Grand Island & W. O. R. Co. 27 Neb. 694; State, Lancaster County, v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 29 Neb. 412.

We discover no error in the record, and the judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Christopher MALLOY, Resp't.,

v.

NEW YORK REAL ESTATE ASSOCIATION, Impleaded, etc., App't.

(156 N. Y. 205.)

1. The protection of a freight-elevator shaft by the usual method of a railing is, in the absence of direction by the superintendent of buildings, sufficient compliance with N. Y. consolidation act, § 487, as amended by Laws 1887, chap. 566, requiring a substantial railing or trap doors, or both, as directed and approved by the superintendent of buildings.

2. The insufficiency of a railing to comply with the statute requiring a substantial railing at an elevator shaft will not render the owner liable to a person who falls into the shaft, not because the railing is insufficient, but because it has been left out of place and the shaft left unguarded by the negligence of a third person using the elevator.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of a General Term of the Superior Court of the city of New York affirming a judgment of a Trial Term in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendants' negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Herbert C. Smyth, with Mr. Charles C. Nadal, for appellant:

The provision requiring hoisting shafts to be inclosed distinctly states that that shall be done if it is necessary "to protect the life or limbs of those employed in such establishment." Therefore it was a statute enacted for the benefit of an employee alone, and not a stranger, even though he be in the premises on lawful business.

Flannigan v. American Glucose Co. 38 N. Y. S. R. 867.

In the law of 1887, governing the case at bar, two kinds of guards are mentioned, either, or both, of which may be used, "as may be directed and approved."

In the absence of any action on the part of the superintendent of buildings, the owner of the building did substantially comply with the statute by providing any one of the kind of guards specified therein.

Boehm v. Mace, 28 Abb. N. C. 188.

Assuming that the statute did impose a duty upon the defendant-appellant, which was not performed by it, the omission was well known to the plaintiff; and as he continued to use the elevator, knowing of the lack of guards, he must be deemed to have assumed the risk attending its use in that condition.

It has been held in McRickard v. Flint, 114 N. Y. 222, and Willy v. Mulledy, 78 N. Y. 310, 84 Am. Rep. 536, that the owner's duty under the building law was not dependent upon any action by the superintendent of buildings.

Parker, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant, in May, 1890, owned, but did not occupy, the premises 19-21 Thomas street, New York. It leased the ground floor, cellar, and subcellar to J. L. Bailey & Co. and Jonas Brooks & Co., and all of the rest of the building to Porter Bros. & Co. A steam freight elevator ran from the top floor to the subcellar, the motive power being furnished by the defendant. The operation of the elevator was entirely controlled by the tenants. On every floor except the ground floor there were trap doors. At the latter the elevator shaft was 5 feet and 10 inches inside of the building line; and this hatchway had a storm door and iron doors, which closed it up entirely in non-business hours. At other times a chain, one end of which was permanently fastened on the easterly side of the building and the other end caught into a staple by means of a hook, barred the way to the elevator shaft. The reason assigned for using a chain instead of a trapdoor at the ground floor is that the fire department required the elevator to be left on a level with the street when not in use, so that, in the event of the building being broken into in case of fire, the firemen would not fall down the shaft. It appears from the testimony of the plaintiff, who was a drayman, that the freight elevators in that neighborhood were similarly guarded. For more than seven years the plaintiff had been accustomed to take to and from this elevator cases of goods, and, as he testified, was familiar with it and its approaches on the ground floor. Between 12 and 1:30 o'clock of a bright sunny day, the plaintiff, supposing that the elevator was at the ground floor, attempted to step into it, but instead stepped into a well hole, and received serious injury. Only a few, if any, minutes had elapsed since Charles Maxson, an employee of one of the defendants, had entered the elevator, and ridden on it to the floor above, where it was at the moment of plaintiff's fall. Whether Maxson unhooked the chain from its staple and hung it up by the side of the elevator is a subject of controversy; but that someone wholly unconnected with the defendant did it is firmly established.

The plaintiff's story of the accident and the circumstances surrounding it as told on his direct examination, is as follows: "I had been in the habit of using this elevator for about seven years prior to the accident, on and off. The first time that I ever rode on that elevator, that I can remember, was when the building was built,—in 1871, probably; I wouldn't swear to that. I became quite familiar with the elevator,—the approach to the elevator on the ground floor. I came from Church street up towards the store. J. L. Bailey's porter, Thomas Gorman, was on the walk, getting a case preparatory to shipment.

He told me . . . there was another case downstairs going in the same direction (Mallory Line Steamship Company), for Jonas Brooks & Co. I had heard of that previously, and passing by I looked to see if the elevator had been there, as I wanted to use it immediately, and the elevator was there. I noticed the chain. It was hooked up on the easterly side of the building, not across.

The elevator was on a level with the sidewalk. I went for my truck to Church street, and then came back, and I could not come within 15 or 20 feet of where the case was. . . . I backed in 9 or 12 feet west of the lamp post. I still seen the chain in the position in which it was when the elevator was there. I was in a hurry to get the goods away. It was on the 29th of May, and we were to have three holidays, Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, and I wanted to get everything cleaned up. I went for the elevator, to rush over diagonally across. I couldn't see the elevator; it was dark. I went with a rush, and could not stop myself, and went in the cellar,—thinking the chain was still hanging up in the position I had seen it." On cross-examination plaintiff testified as follows: "I took a diagonal look across, and saw the chain as it was when I passed it by. I could see the chain, but not the elevator. When I say I took a diagonal look, I mean to say that the westerly pillar came between me and the elevator as I sat on my truck. . . . Q. Now, what did you do then? A. I ran for the elevator. I took a run. I didn't walk. I ran to the elevator in my great haste to get through my work as soon as possible, and do it all that day. I couldn't tell you whether I ran a three-minute gait or less. I ran a good gait in my great haste to get up the case. . . . I couldn't stop myself, I went with such great haste. I did not intentionally jump in the elevator shaft. I was not going to commit suicide." The story may be told still more briefly. When the elevator was at the ground floor, the occupants of the building were not accustomed to have the guard placed across the opening into the elevator, because no accident could happen while the elevator remained in that position. The plaintiff, with this knowledge, glanced at the elevator before going after his horse, and saw that the elevator was in position at the ground floor, and the chain hung up by the side of it. When he returned, which he did in great haste, he saw the chain still hanging up, and supposed that the elevator was in the position which the chain indicated, and so rushed on into the elevator shaft. He was relying upon the well-understood rule of the occupants of the building that the chain should be stretched across the opening to the elevator shaft whenever the elevator should be taken from the ground floor,—a rule which, if faithfully observed by all of the occupants of the building and their employees, would have prevented the accident; but, instead of being observed, it was violated, and the result was the injury for which a judgment has been obtained against this defendant. It is not pretended that this defendant, or any of its agents or servants, moved this elevator from the ground floor to the floor above while the plaintiff was trying to get his horse near the elevator entrance. On the contrary, all of the evidence points in the direction of Maxson, an employee of one of the occupants of the building, as the man who carelessly moved the elevator to the floor above, leaving the well hole unguarded.

Notwithstanding the fact that the negligent act which was primarily responsible for the accident is distinctly pointed out and found to be an act which the defendant neither committed nor was legally responsible for, a judgment has been obtained against it for the damages sustained by the plaintiff. This liability was worked out to the satisfaction of the court and jury upon the following lines: The defendant failed to furnish such a guard at the elevator shaft as was required at the time by the factory act or the building law, and it is established by many cases that a failure to comply with the requirements of a statute is competent evidence of negligence to be submitted to the jury. By this process of reasoning it is insisted that the defendant is legally chargeable in damages for the injuries clearly occasioned by the fault of another, as we have seen. Whether this position be well taken we shall now inquire. The learned judge at general term held that the factory act (Laws 1887, chap. 462) has no application to this case, as the building was not a manufacturing establishment within the meaning of the statute. We pass this question without other comment than that we agree with the position taken by the general term. That learned court also held, and correctly, we think, that § 487 of the consolidation act, which constitutes a part of the building law, was applicable. Counsel, however, seem to have made a mistake in not calling the attention of the court to the last amendment of that section, with the result that the court assumed in its discussion that that section, as amended by chapter 410 of the Laws of 1882, was in force at the time of the happening of this accident. The court correctly stated the effect of the statute as amended by the act of 1882 to be that it "requires that the opening in each floor of such a building shall be protected by such a substantial railing, and trapdoors to close the same, as shall be approved by the superintendent of buildings, and that such trapdoors shall be closed at all times, except when the elevator is in actual use." It will be observed that in the statute referred to by the court both substantial railings and trapdoors are required to be used to guard the entrance to the elevator shaft, and such was the condition of the law when the accident happened out of which the action of McRickard v. Flint, 114 N. Y. 222, arose. Prior to the happening of this accident it was amended so as to read as follows: "In any building in the city of New York, in which there shall be any hoistway or freight elevator or well hole, not inclosed in walls constructed of brick or other fireproof material, and provided with fireproof doors, the openings thereof, through and upon each floor of said building, shall be provided with and protected by a substantial railing, or with such good and sufficient trap doors with which to close the same, or both, as may be directed and approved by the superintendent of buildings, and such railings and trap doors shall be kept closed at all times, except when in actual use by the occupant or occupants of the building having the use or control of the same." Laws 1887, chap. 586, § 487. In the McRickard Case the statute required both guards, and both were omitted, and this court decided that the failure of the superintendent of buildings to give directions could not constitute an excuse for the absence of the guards. But as the statute now stands two kinds of guards are mentioned, each or both of which may be used "as may be directed and approved." Thus the superintendent of buildings is permitted to exercise his discretion. He may direct that a railing be used, or that a trapdoor be employed as a guard, or that both a railing and a trapdoor be used. In the absence of direction on the part of the superintendent, it would seem that the adoption of either one of the three methods provided by statute would operate to save the owner from being charged with negligence solely on the ground of non-compliance with the statute. It is unnecessary to consider whether there might not be special circumstances surrounding a given situation which would call upon a prudent owner to make such a choice of statutory methods as would permit a jury to find him guilty of negligence for the choice made, but there are no such facts present in this case. The method selected was, on the contrary, the usual one for the ground floor, as appears by the testimony of the plaintiff. Under such circumstances it may be safely asserted that a charge of negligence cannot be based solely on the omission to adopt one of the other methods of guarding the well hole rather than the one chosen.

But the respondent says the owner did not provide a railing; he provided a chain instead. This distinction certainly seems too narrow to furnish a foundation for charging damages against a party for an injury which was the direct result of the carelessness of another. It is not pretended that a railing of iron or wire or wood would have been stronger or more servicable in any way than this chain. It appears from the testimony of the plaintiff that chains were generally used to rail in shaftways of elevators in the vicinity of the premises in question. It thus appears that the chain was treated, as it might well have been, as a "substantial railing" within the meaning of the statute. But if we assume that the chain is not a technical compliance with the statute we must still reach the conclusion that the defendant is not liable for the reason that its act in furnishing a chain instead of a railing did not occasion the injury. If a rail had been used instead of a chain, the result could not have been different. The statute provides that "such railing and trapdoor shall be kept closed at all times except when in actual use." This contemplates necessarily that the railing must be a movable railing, such as this chain was. Whatever might have been used as a railing, whether made of wood, iron bars, or even iron links, would have been movable at the pleasure of anyone desiring to use the elevator, so as to leave the elevator opened or closed, as work or prudence should require. There is nothing in the character of such a railing as the statute requires as enables it to protect an elevator shaft against the malicious or careless act of a party who leaves it open when he moves the elevator. Either guard is powerless to bar the ingress of the heedless into an elevator well hole if deliberately left open by persons operating the elevator. If either be sufficient to accomplish that purpose if left in proper position, it would seem to follow that it is not the act of the owner in providing the one rather than the other which is the proximate cause of the accident, but rather the act of him who puts away the guard, and refuses to permit it to perform its office of protecting the well hole during the absence of the elevator. For the act of the person who deliberately moved the elevator, leaving the well hole unguarded, this defendant is neither morally nor legally responsible, and should not be visited with its consequences. There are other exceptions upon which a reversal might well have been based, but we prefer to rest our decision upon the ground that this defendant was not at fault.

The judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

All concur.

The sudden jolting of a passenger car on a mixed train while the train was being made up and a passenger was attempting to enter the car at a distance from the station, without the knowledge of any person in control of the train, although the station baggagemaster knew it, does not render the railroad company liable to the passenger for resulting injuries, in the absence of any invitation to get on the car at that place.

2. A custom to take passengers on a mixed freight and passenger train at a distance from the station is not shown by the fact that they sometimes got on there, where no direction, authority, or consent to do so is shown, except the direction of a baggageman in a single instance and the fact that a flagman saw them board the train, while it appears that the train, when made up, always came to the station.

(June 7, 1898.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of a General Term of the Supreme Court, Fifth Judicial Department, affirming a judgment of the Monroe County Circuit in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Hamilton Harris, with Mr. Ashbel Green, for appellant:

It was plaintiff's duty to look and listen for the approaching engine before attempting to board the train. Not having exercised any care or prudence in getting on to the car she was guilty of negligence.

In the operation of railroad trains there must be more or less jarring, jerking, and sudden movements of the train, which are a necessary concomitant to their operation at all, and for which no right of action lies, even though injury results.

Even if plaintiff, without a ticket, went into the yard to board the car because others had occasionally boarded cars there without invitation of defendant, yet that not being the place set apart for passengers to board the cars, the defendant owed her no active vigilance.

Walsh v. Fitchburg R. Co. 145 N. Y. 801, 27 L. R. A. 724.

The baggageman's business was to look after and take care of the baggage at the station. He was not connected with and had no charge of the train, and had no power or authority to stop her from going down into the yard.

There is not a particle of evidence that the conductor or any of the trainmen were in sight.

If a person is invited on a train by some employee of the company not having the supreme control in that department of the company's business, but is at the time out of the range of his employment, and the person invited is injured whilst so on the train, the company is not liable.

Mr. Elbridge L. Adams, for respondent:

If a railroad company admit a passenger into a caboose car attached to a freight train, and take the customary fare, it incurs the same liability for his safety as though he were upon a regular passenger train.

Edgerton v. New York & H. R. Co. 89 N. Y. 227.

The jolt which caused plaintiff's injuries was so severe as to knock the plaintiff down between the coach and the freight car, although she had hold of the railing. If the jolt was the usual one in the starting of that train there was all the more reason why the defendant should have exercised some care for the safety of the passengers whom, by a long course of custom, it had permitted to take its train at this place. They should have had a brakeman there to warn passengers not to get on while the engine was backing down.

The negligence of starting a train with any motion while passengers are boarding it, is too well established to be questioned.

Parker, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The judgment awards to the plaintiff $5,000 for injuries sustained by her in a fall occasioned by the sudden jolt of defendant's car while she was entering it. The story of the accident was told by the plaintiff, and from it we extract the following: "On the 9th of February, last year [1894], I left my home in Fairport, intending to make a visit. I left my house about half past eight in the morning, intending to take the West Shore local train for Pittsford. That train was due to leave Fairport a little after 9 o'clock, or about 9 o'clock. I went to the station of the West Shore. I think that is also the depot of the New York Central at Fairport. It is the only station there. It is east of Main street on the north side of the track. There are three or four tracks south of it. When I got to the station I went into the ladies' waiting room. I went up to the ticket agent at the ticket office, and asked him how long before that train was due. I spoke of the West Shore local train. He said it was due about 11 o'clock. The ladies' waiting room is on the west side of the station, and the baggage room is at the right, or still west of that. As I came out the door I saw Mr. Johnson, the baggage master of the railroad. He wears a uniform. I know him, and had seen him there before. I asked him if that train was the West Shore local for Pittsford, and he said it was. He wanted to know if I wanted to take the train. I told him I did. He then signaled in this way, as I supposed, I don't know who, I suppose to the engineer. He simply raised his hand, and said, 'Take on this lady.' Then, after I started, I said, 'I guess I will go right on, and get on while the train is still, before the engine gets on,' and I started to go east. Mr. Johnson went off the steps before I did. He walked along out near the platform to the east, and I walked right on the platform until I came near the east end of it, and then I went off, and went in the path. We were nearly along together. Then he crossed over when he got to the end of the platform. I continued east to take the train on the northeast side of the track down as far as the caboose, way down to the end of the train. It was down to very near the first crossing. I couldn't tell you how far it is. The crossing is a drive. I don't believe I know how far that is. When I got down opposite the caboose I crossed over to take the car. I crossed two tracks. I don't know whether I crossed any more or not. When I got to the caboose I went up the steps the same as I always go into a car. I took the outside railing of the car as I went up. . . . And as I went to put my left hand onto the knob of the door to go in, I was . . . the next I knew after that I was thrown right backward, a sudden jolt, and I found myself right on my back with my head . . . something hit my head right there."

A recovery was had at the circuit, and sustained at the general term upon the ground that the plaintiff's injuries were due to the fault of the defendant. The particular wrong of which the defendant was held to be guilty is that in switching certain cars for the purpose of coupling them it brought them so sharply together as to jolt the other cars on the train, including the one passenger car which this plaintiff was at the time entering. If the passenger car had been alongside of the station platform, where people are invited by railroad companies to enter their cars, there could be no doubt that the judgment would be well grounded. When a passenger car is drawn up to the platform of a railroad station, the act of itself constitutes an invitation to enter it, extended to those desiring to become passengers therein, and the invitation necessarily carries with it an assurance that the passenger may safely enter without fear that there will be any sudden jerk or jolt of the car. But, as has already been observed in reading the testimony of the plaintiff, she did not enter the car at the station. It was standing some 525 feet from the station at the time she climbed on board of it. The train was what was known as a mixed freight and passenger. It consisted of one passenger car on the rear and such number of freight cars as the local business from time to time demanded. On this particular day, when the train came into Fairport station, and passed on beyond the depot for the purpose of doing the necessary switching, it consisted of the ordinary passenger coach and fourteen freight cars. Seven of the cars were taken out of the train at Fairport and left there, and a car which was on one of the side tracks was attached to the train, so that when it left that station for Pittsford the train had six cars less than it had upon its arrival. This necessary switching was being done at the time the plaintiff attempted to board the train, to do which she had left the platform, and passed down the track several hundred feet. "When [as she testified] I got down opposite the caboose, I crossed over to take the car. I crossed two tracks. I don't know whether I crossed any more or not." There was neither steps nor platform of any kind at this point upon which the plaintiff could stand while trying to reach the steps of the car, nor was there present a conductor, brakeman, or other person connected with the defendant to invite or assist her to enter the car. The car itself was empty. The plaintiff knew that the engine was detached from the train, and would have to be put on again before the train could move. This fact appears from the testimony which we have quoted, where the witness says that she said to another person, "I guess I will go right on, and get on while the train is still, before the engine gets on." To the situation thus briefly, but with sufficient accuracy, presented, we must apply such legal principles as it demands. And the first inquiry is, Did the defendant owe to the traveling public the duty of preventing this car from being jolted at the place where it was when the plaintiff boarded it? No special duty was owed to this plaintiff, for she was not personally invited to get on the car at this point by any of the defendant's officers or employees. It does not appear that the engineer, or any person in control of the train, knew that she was attempting to get on, and these facts justify the assertion made that the defendant owed no special duty to the plaintiff.

The further inquiry, then, is whether the defendant was under any obligation to the traveling public, of which the plaintiff forms a part, to prevent any jolting of the car at this point while making up the train. It is obvious that the answer to that question will be furnished by the evidence which discloses whether or not, by long and open user on the part of the public, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the representatives of the defendant, an invitation had been extended to the general public to board the car at this place; for certainly it will not be contended that in making up a freight train with an empty passenger car attached the engineer may not shunt the cars together with sufficient force to jolt every other car in the train. That this is so was well recognized by the learned justice who presided at the trial, who with clearness pointed out to the jury the right of the defendant to make up its train in its own way at any other point than one where passengers were invited to board it, and he left it to the jury to say whether, under the evidence presented, the custom was established on the part of the defendant of taking passengers on this freight train at this point. The jury found that such a custom was established, and, if there is evidence to support the finding, the judgment must stand, unless some other error shall call for reversal. It seems to us that there is no evidence to support such a finding. There was at Fairport a regular passenger station to which this train always came after being made up, when there were any passengers to be taken. On this day as usual, and after the accident had happened to the plaintiff, it pulled up to the depot and two passengers got on. Three witnesses in all gave testimony upon which the plaintiff relied to prove her claim that the custom had been established of receiving passengers for this particular train at the place of the accident. One of the witnesses, Jacob Morrell, testified: "I live at Fairport. I know the train known as the West Shore local that leaves Fairport in the morning about 9 o'clock, going west to Pittsford. I took it the 8d day of July, 1898. My wife and children were with me. I was going to Pittsford. I took the train just below the station. I should think 5 or 6 rods below. I went down and got into the caboose at the end of the train. Q. Who told you to? A. I don't remember as anyone. . . . I didn't ask anybody where I was to take that train. The train was standing there, and I got on. . . . The conductor was in the car. I don't remember seeing the brakeman." This isolated instance does not even tend to prove custom. No one connected with the defendant as an officer or employee invited him to get on the train at that point. It is not altogether certain that the conductor saw him get on, but assuming that he did, what could the conductor do about it? He was without authority to put this passenger and his family off the train, or do any other act calculated to serve as punishment to them for failure to obey the well understood rule of steam-railroad corporations that passengers shall board their trains at stations, and not elsewhere. The plaintiff's son testified that he had been to Pittsford by the West Shore train. Q. Where did you take the train? A. Down; it was a little way beyond that little house there. East of the depot. Q. The first time you went, did you have anything to say to Johnson, the baggageman, or he to you, about taking the train? A. No, sir; only he told me to go down there, and get on. Down to the caboose. It was east of the depot, a little ways beyond that house there. I don't know what that house is. Some railroad house on the north side of the track. I did go down there and get on. The conductor or the brakeman was down on the steps there to the platform. He helped me on. I don't remember whether he had a uniform on. He looked like a railroad man." Here we have one instance where it is pretended an employee of the defendant invited a passenger to board the train at some other point than the depot platform, and it furnishes the only evidence we have in this record of either invitation or consent on the part of the employees to the boarding of a train by passengers at any other point than the station. The third witness, John D. Maloney, formerly a flagman of the defendant, testified that the train was a freight train with a passenger coach at the end of it, with some shifting generally to do at Fairport, where the train usually remained ten or fifteen minutes. "I have seen passengers take that train below the station and at the station. I have seen them take it perhaps 200 yards below the station. They would go down and get into the caboose while the engine was off shifting. Times when passengers would be at the station when, I suppose, the engineer would be notified, and he would stop there. Days I have seen four or five people go down east and take this train, and days less. I suppose the conductor's orders are, before the train goes out, to go into the station, and inquire whether there is anybody to get on the train, — whether any person has bought tickets. I think that has been done. If there are passengers to get on, the train stops at the station; if there are no passengers to get on, it goes on. Not a word in the testimony of this witness tends to show that any one of the persons whom he saw boarding this car below the station did so at the invitation of any of the defendant's officers or employees. He testified that there were days when he had seen four or five people go down and take the train at this point, but he did not say how often it occurred. Probably it was not very often, for it is made quite clear by the testimony that there were days when there were no passengers whatever at this station. In all of this record, then, we have the testimony of one witness that he was told by the baggageman to go down east and get on the train while the engine was switching. Not another act on the part of a railroad employee of any grade tending to encourage the public, or any portion of it, in boarding the train at this point. Nothing to show that any employee of the defendant save the flagman, Maloney, ever saw passengers boarding the train except at the station, or that such employee consented to their boarding the train elsewhere. It is not at all likely that the defendant or its employees would encourage such conduct as would require the maintenance of two stations within about 500 feet of each other for the boarding of a single car, which many days was without passengers from the village of Fairport. We have, it is true, evidence that some people boarded the train at this point, but they boarded it apparently without direction, authority, or consent; and this trespass upon the well-understood regulations of all railroad companies that passengers shall board trains at railway stations only cannot support a finding that the defendant had invited the public to get on the train at this point as well as at the station. The safety of the traveling public has made it necessary to apply to common carriers, especially in respect to vehicles propelled by steam, far more stringent rules than govern many other relations that exist among men; but neither the public interest nor good morals would be subverted by permitting evidence of a few trespasses to establish a right in the public, and to impose a duty upon the railroad to be watchful lest future trespassers should come to harm. Reaching the conclusion that there was no negligence on the part of the defendant in this case, we omit a discussion of the other questions presented by the appellant.

The judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

Gray, Haight, and Martin, JJ., concur with Parker, Ch. J., for reversal.

Bartlett, J., dissenting:

I am unable to vote for the reversal of this judgment. The questions of plaintiff's contributory negligence and defendant's negligence were involved in a conflict of evidence, and properly submitted to the jury. It was for the jury to determine whether, by reason of the usual course of business, there was an implied assent on the part of defendant that passengers might board the freight caboose a considerable distance east of the passenger station platform. This being established, it was for the jury to further decide whether due care was observed by defendant in coupling cars at the time plaintiff sought to board the train. While this is a close case, there were three witnesses besides the plaintiff who gave evidence tending to establish a general course of business and assent, either express or implied, on the part of defendant, that passengers might enter the train at or about the point, where the plaintiff did at the time of the accident. I am of the opinion that the judgment should be affirmed.

O'Brien and Vann, JJ., concur with Bartlett, J., for affirmance.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

Clara D. COYNE, Resp't.,
v.
MISSISSIPPI & RUM RIVER BOOM COMPANY, Appl.

(.....Minn.....)

- *1. If a party, in the exercise of a legal right,—more especially one conferred by statute.—
•Headnotes by COLLINS, J.

NOTE.—Liability for injuries to riparian owner by running logs in stream.

If the stream is not floatable within the rules shown in note to Carlson v. St. Louis River D. & Imp. Co. (Minn.) ante, 371, one attempting to use it to float logs will be liable for all injury done by him.

If the stream is not navigable a person who injures the dam of one owning the land on both sides of the stream by attempting to float logs in the stream will be liable for the injury. Hoskins v. Archer, 6 Ky. L. Rep. 671.

The one attempting to float logs down a stream which is not floatable will be liable for injuries done by him. Gwaltney v. Scottish Carolina Timber & Land Co. 111 N. C. 547.

A log owner, who fills the bed of a stream with logs in winter when it is not navigable, is liable to a lower mill owner who is injured thereby. Wooden v. Mt. Pleasant Lumber & Mfg. Co. 106 Mich. 412.

The mere fact that the statute requires dams to be constructed in such a way as to permit the passage of timber through them does not justify one who tears down a dam to permit his timber to pass, in case it is not shown that the stream is a common public highway. Shipman v. Clothier, 8 U. C. Q. B. 592.

Liable for negligence.

The rule of COYNE v. MISSISSIPPI & RUM RIVER BOOM CO., that liability for injuries in case of floatable streams depends on negligence, is the one generally adopted by the courts, and is correct if the requirements of duty are not placed too low. Injury to riparian lands by logs floating in the stream should of itself raise the suspicion that all was not right. If the logs could not be run without causing the injury, then without the destruction of private rights the stream cannot be held to be floatable. If it is possible to run the logs without injury, the very fact that an injury happens should raise the presumption of negligence, casting the burden of showing due care on the one running the logs. Most of the injuries appear to result from jams or flooding dams. Jams in turn seem to be caused by overtaxing the capacity of the stream at the stage of the water when the run is made. Overtaxing the capacity of the stream, or bad management of the flooding dam, would seem to be negligence. So that from whichever point the subject is viewed the injuries which ordinarily are caused to riparian owners should be paid for.

2. The right of passage on a navigable stream is a common and paramount one, but must be exercised with due regard to the rights of riparian owners, and with ordinary care and skill. Floating logs in such a stream may cause damage to the estate of such owners; but if driven in an ordinarily careful, prudent stream, or bad management of the flooding dam, would seem to be negligence. So that from whichever point the subject is viewed the injuries which ordinarily are caused to riparian owners should be paid for.

These views are sustained by an Oregon decision, and by the cases in title Flooding land.

The right of floatage can only be used with due regard to the rights of the owners of the banks through which the stream flows. The right to float logs down a stream gives no right to run them upon the land, nor to cause the water to overflow its banks to the injury of the riparian owner. The one attempting to run the logs will be liable in case the logs run out of the channel, or lodge in the channel, or cause the water to dam and flow over upon the land of a riparian owner to his injury. Negligence is not necessary to give a right of action. Haines v. Welch, 14 Or. 819.

But most of the decisions are placed upon the more clearly established rule of negligence.

The easement of floatage must be exercised with due care for the avoidance of injury to the interest of riparian proprietors. Burke County Comrs. v. Catawba Lumber Co. 115 N. C. 590.

A person who puts logs on the ice, and gives them no attention, will be liable for the injury in case, when the ice breaks up, they, together with the ice, form a dam which causes the water to cut a new channel through the land of a riparian proprietor. George v. Flak, 32 N. H. 82.

The owner of a toll bridge which is carried away by logs floating in the stream through the negligence of their owner may hold the owner of the logs liable for the loss. Sewall's Fall Bridge v. Flak, 23 N. H. 171.

Negligently floating logs down a stream so as to destroy a milldam renders the one doing so liable for the injury. Trevitt v. Barnes, 21 N. Y. Week. Dig. 590.

If the works of a booming company are not properly constructed, and it is guilty of mismanagement and negligence in keeping too large a quantity of logs in the boom at a time, by reason of which the property of riparian proprietors is injured, it will be liable for the injury. Doucette v. Little Falls Improv. & Nav. Co. (Minn.) 73 N. W. 847.

manner, the party driving is not liable for damages which may result to the riparian owners.

(June 14, 1898.)

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for Anoka County denying a motion for new trial after verdict in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injury to plaintiff's land by defendant's booming operations. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John B. Atwater for appellant.

Mr. Everett Hammons, for respondent:

If there was "a taking" it matters not whether the appellant was negligent or not. If there was no taking then it became material to prove negligence. Respondent established both propositions by a fair preponderance of evidence.

This court has in three distinct cases decided that acts like those in evidence here constitute "a taking" within the meaning and intent of the law.

Weaver v. Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. 28 Minn. 534; McKenzie v. Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. 29 Minn. 288; Cotton v. Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. 22 Minn. 372; Dou-

Persons attempting to use a stream for floating logs are liable for injuries to a milldam the right to maintain which has been acquired by use for more than fifty years if caused by their negligence either in not securing their logs until a time when they can be safely turned adrift, or in the manner in which they are sent over the dam. James v. Carter, 96 Ky. 378.

One in possession of a milldam under a deed of property on which the dam was not situated, but in connection with which it was used, may maintain an action against one who negligently floats logs down the stream and injures the dam. Trevitt v. Barnes, 21 N. Y. Week. Dig. 580.

In Silver v. Connecticut River Lumber Co. 40 Fed. Rep. 122, an award of arbitrators for injuries done by logs running in a river was enforced after the remission of a part of the amount as representing what might have been allowed for the breaking of a particular bank which the referee found had been broken before and was not broken by the defendant's logs.

Conversely, if negligence is not shown, the log owner is not liable, however great may have been the infringement of the rights of the riparian owner.

The land of a riparian owner may, without compensation, be flowed to some extent by persons exercising the right to float logs. Every log that floats down the river over his land causes the water to rise above its natural level. Floating logs in large quantities may in various ways cause an appreciable and substantial damage to his real and personal estate; and the owner of the logs is not liable for damage resulting from an enjoyment of the public right of navigation. Logs may be lodged by the subsiding freshet, and the owner may reclaim them, without being liable for the mishap. Thompson v. Androscoggin River Improv. Co. 54 N. H. 558.

Where logs are driven in a navigable river in an ordinarily prudent and skilful manner, the owner is not liable for damages which result to the land of riparian owners. Field v. Appie River Log Driving Co. 67 Wis. 599.

A person running logs down the stream is not liable for injuries caused by the sudden breaking of a jam, in the absence of negligence on his part. 41 L. R. A.

cette v. Little Falls Improv. & Nav. Co. (Minn.) 78 N. W. 847.

Collins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff had a verdict in an action brought to recover for injuries claimed to have been caused by reason of defendant's construction and maintenance of certain piling, piers, and booms in the Mississippi river, above plaintiff's farm, whereby huge quantities of logs and ice were accumulated and held back in the spring of 1897, and then, because of the breaking away of the piling, piers, and booms, alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligent management and operation thereof, suddenly precipitated down the river, and upon plaintiff's farm, by reason of which soil and trees along the banks were swept away and destroyed. Defendant's appeal is from an order denying its motion for a new trial, and the assignments of error go to the claim of counsel that the court should have dismissed the case when plaintiff rested; that there was error in the admission of certain evidence in rebuttal; that the charge to the jury was erroneous in respect to the grounds upon which plaintiff could recover, and also in reference to Hopkins v. Butte & M. Commercial Co. 13 Mont. 229.

If in running the logs down the stream the water is not caused to rise higher than it would by reason of the logs moving down in its natural state an injury done to the riparian owner is damnum absque injuria. Anderson v. Thunder Bay River Boom Co. 61 Mich. 489.

A booming company is not liable for injuries caused to a riparian owner by a proper and reasonable use of the right of floating logs; but it is liable if by a wilful or negligent management it creates or enlarges jams in the stream and thereby overflows its banks to their injury. White River Log & Boom Co. v. Nelson, 45 Mich. 578.

Some of the above decisions were evidently made in view of the supposed necessity of getting the timber to market. But if the timber cannot pay for the injury which its transportation necessarily causes to third persons it might better stay in the forest.

Trespass on banks.

Log owners are liable to the riparian proprietor for the actual injuries caused by traveling upon the banks of a floatable stream for the purpose of propelling their logs. Hooper v. Hobson, 57 Me. 278, 90 Am. Dec. 769.

Legislative authority to maintain side booms will not authorize the grantee to enter the close of any person without his consent, or to place logs therein for safe keeping. Perry v. Wilson, 7 Mass. 333.

Fastening a boom to the shore without necessity is a trespass which will render the trespasser liable to the riparian owner. But there is a right to use the shore so far as it is necessary. Weise v. Smith, 3 Or. 445, 8 Am. Rep. 621.

A boom company cannot be given the right to use the banks belonging to a riparian owner without making compensation. Cohn v. Wausau Boom Co. 47 Wis. 314.

If logs are carried down a river and cast upon the land of a riparian owner without fault of their owner, he will be liable for the injury done in case he reclaims them, but not if he abandons them. Sheldon v. Sherman, 43 N. Y. 454, 1 Am. Rep. 569.

A person properly using a stream for floating the time up to which damages might be estimated in case damages were awarded to her.

The defendant is a corporation duly organized and acting under the provisions of Minnesota Special Laws 1857, chap. 60, and several amendatory acts. Its power and authority to build and construct piling, piers, and booms in the river mentioned,—a navigable stream,—and its right to handle and drive logs, under its franchise, stand conceded. It was exercising a lawful privilege when it erected piling and piers and maintained its booms at the point in question, but it was bound to exercise this privilege with due regard to the concurrent rights of riparian owners, above and below, to the use of their lands. And, as before noticed, the cause of action set forth in the complaint was based upon an allegation of defendant's negligence in the management and operation of its works above plaintiff's farm.

logs is not liable for injury occasioned by the stranding of logs which he has used every reasonable effort to retain within the stream, and he may reclaim the logs, being responsible only for unnecessary injury. Carter v. Thurston, 68 N. H. 104, 43 Am. Rep. 584.

If a person is negligent in handling logs in a floatable stream by reason of which they lodge on the banks of a riparian proprietor causing injury, the one causing injury will be liable to answer for it. If the logs were thrown there by inevitable casualty there can be no liability in case of failure to reclaim the logs. And if the owner seeks to reclaim them he will be liable only for the injury caused by leaving them there an unreasonable time. Ford Lumber & Mfg. Co. v. McQueen, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 522.

In Weaver v. Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. 30 Minn. 477, an injunction restraining defendant from causing logs or other material to run upon plaintiff's lands so as to injure them was modified pending proceedings to condemn a right in the land.

The owner of logs will not be liable for injuries done by their being cast upon the shore where it resulted from the raft being broken up by a violent storm while it was being towed through a navigable body of water, and before the logs could be collected they were driven ashore by another storm which in its fury and destructiveness had never, but once before, been heard of in that country. New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. v. McEwen & Co-Murray, 49 La. Ann. 1184, 38 L. R. A. 134.

In Maine the statute provides that if logs are lodged upon the banks the owner may, within a certain time, go upon the bank and remove them, tendering to the owner or the occupier of the land a reasonable compensation for his injury. Brown v. Chadbourne, 81 Me. 9, 50 Am. Dec. 641.

The Maryland act giving a riparian owner a lien of twenty-five cents upon each log cast by wind or tide upon his land, is valid. Henry v. Roberts, 50 Fed. Rep. 903.

Flooding land.

A boom company cannot cover the land of a riparian owner with water, logs, earth, and other material, to his injury, without paying compensation. Weaver v. Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. 28 Minn. 584.

A log-running company will be liable for injury caused to riparian lands by the raising of the water by obstructions to facilitate passage of logs. Grand Rapids Boom Co. v. Jarvis, 50 Mich. 308.

Persons putting logs into a navigable stream, or causing the same to be done, are liable to riparian owners for injury to their lands or crops caused by log jams raising the water to such an extent as to overflow the land. Bauman v. Pere Marquette Boom Co. 66 Mich. 544.

If a boom company, after its logs have jammed in the stream, continues to run logs against the jam until it extends and fills the river above the level of the adjoining land, where it is permitted to remain for a month, it will be liable for the loss of crops thereby caused to adjacent owners. Witheral v. Muskegon Boom Co. 68 Mich. 43.

If the boom causes the water to overflow the land of riparian proprietors the one maintaining it will be liable, although the overflow only occurs at times of high water, which are rare, if the times of occurrence can reasonably be foreseen and anticipated. McKenzie v. Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. 29 Minn. 288.

A company which has been authorized by statute to improve the floatage of a stream will be liable to a riparian owner in case it injures his property by floods, or the jamming of logs. White Deer Creek Improv. Co. v. Sassaman, 67 Pa. 415.

The owner of a flooding dam will be liable for injury caused by his raising the stream so as to overflow land farther down the stream. Hackstack v. Keshena Improv. Co. 66 Wis. 439.

A boom company is not liable for the flooding of lands by the boom in co-operation with the unusual accumulation of logs and a large rise of water, if it was not negligent in the erection or management of the boom. Lawler v. Baring Boom Co. 56 Me. 443.

A company formed for the purpose of running logs cannot be held liable to riparian proprietors for injuries caused by log jams, unless, by the exercise of due care, the formation of such jams could have been prevented; but it is liable for the injury caused by unreasonable delay in breaking the jams. Bauman v. Pere Marquette Boom Co. 66 Mich. 544.

If the floating of the logs causes an unnatural flow of the water to the injury of a riparian owner the question of liability is for the jury. Anderson v. Thunder Bay River Boom Co. 61 Mich. 499.

In Michigan it has been held that if a boom company contracts to have logs driven in a stream the reasonable performance of which contract obligates the contractor so to run the logs and manage the water as to injure riparian owners, the company will be liable for the injury. McDonell v. Rifle Boom Co. 71 Mich. 61.

But in New York it has been held that if the log owner contracts with a third person to run the logs down the stream and deliver them at his boom he will not be liable for the negligence of the one driving the logs by which they jam and tear down a bridge. Pierrepont v. Loveless, 72 N. Y. 211.

Other injuries.

If a dam erected under authority of the legislature for the raising of a head of water to float logs causes the carrying away of the banks and widening and deepening of the channel, the riparian owner has no cause of action, it being damnum absque injuria. Brooks v. Cedar Brook & S. C. River Improv. Co. 52 Me. 17, 7 L. R. A. 480.

One obstructing a landing by logs floating down the stream, and by sand caused to be deposited by a boom, will be liable for the injury. French v. Connecticut River Lumber Co. 145 Mass. 261.

The owner of a wharf will not be liable for loss of a raft which is left moored so as to obstruct access to his wharf if without doing unnecessary damage, he unties it to permit a boat to come up to the wharf. Harrington v. Edwards, 17 Wis. 587, 84 Am. Dec. 768.

A millowner who is prevented from operating his mill by reason of the holding back of water by

A part of the evidence was directed towards establishing that a great quantity of logs and ice gathered at defendant's piling, piers, and booms, causing a jam, and then broke loose, rushing down in a mass, and tearing and washing out more or less of the soil along the shores of the stream where it flowed through the farm; and a part was produced for the purpose of showing that defendant was careless and negligent in the management and operation of its booms, and carelessly and negligently allowed the jam to form, and then to break; and the court charged the jury upon this branch of the case. But it went further, and charged, in substance, that if the tearing and washing away of the soil along the shores were caused by the obstructions placed in the river by defendant, and this result might have been foreseen by an ordinarily prudent man, this constituted a taking of plaintiff's property, a log-driving company so as to make the stream floatable at a time when it was not naturally so may recover for the injury. Thunder Bay River Boom Co. v. Speechly, 81 Mich. 386, 18 Am. Rep. 184.

If persons who have improved a stream for floatage purpose have held back the water so as to back up the stream to the injury of millowners lower down, the latter are entitled to an injunction to restrain such use of the stream. Middleton v. Flat River Boom Co. 27 Mich. 533.

If a boom company makes an unreasonable use of the stream in holding up and letting down the water it will be liable for injuries thereby inflicted upon the land of a riparian owner. Thompson v. Androscoggin River Improv. Co. 58 N. H. 108.

In case a dam is so erected as to interfere with the right of floating logs on a stream which is given by statute, a log owner may remove such portion of it as is necessary to permit the logs to pass without being liable for the trespass. Little v. Ince, 3 U. C. C. P. 523.

And if the log owner is not negligent, and the force of the logs passing over the dam tears away a large portion of the structure, he will not be liable for the injury. Little v. Ince, 4 U. C. C. P. 96.

If the legislature authorizes the construction of a bridge over a river, log owners must float their logs with due regard to the rights of the bridge owner, and must conduct the floatage in such a manner as to number and condition of the logs as to suit the passage through the bridge, and in case he fails to do so he will be liable for the injury he inflicts on the bridge owner. Buckl v. Cone, 25 Fla. 1.

Excessive floods.

If a boom is rightfully thrown across a river, and the owner is guilty of no negligence, he will not be liable in case it breaks by reason of heavy floods and causes the logs to jam against a bridge, thereby flooding the lands of a riparian owner. Langstaff v. McRae, 22 Ont. Rep. 78.

A company which has constructed a boom, in a particular manner, and by authority of the legislature, is not liable for the flowage of riparian lands by an extraordinary freshet such as it could not reasonably have anticipated and provided against. Borchardt v. Wausau Boom Co. 54 Wis. 107, 41 Am. Rep. 12.

If logs are placed on the bank of a stream which the public has a right to use, and by an unprecedented rise in the stream are carried down causing damage to property lower down the stream, the owner will not be liable if he had no reason to anticipate the flood and was not negligent in placing the logs where he did. Goodin v. Kentucky Lumber Co. 90 Ky. 625.

Contributory negligence.

The owner of a milldam cannot recover for injuries to his dam caused by logs carried down by a sudden rise in the stream through a boom negligently left open by the owner, if he knew that it was open and took no steps to have it closed, and was as cognizant of the liability of the stream to rise as was the owner of the boom. Lilley v. Fletcher, 81 Ala. 234.

The owner of a dam so defectively constructed as to increase the danger of a jam cannot recover for injury to the dam caused by a jam, although it was caused in part by negligence of the one running the logs. Miller v. Sherry, 65 Wis. 129.

Statutes.

The Michigan statute provides for arbitration in case of injury to riparian property by floatage of logs and failure to agree on the damage. Gratwick, S. & F. Lumber Co. v. Lewis, 66 Mich. 533.

The New Hampshire statute authorizes the erection of dams to facilitate the floatage of logs, and provides that an owner of property injured thereby may apply to the supreme court for the assessment of damages. Schoff v. Upper Connecticut River & Lake Improv. Co. 67 N. H. 110.

A provision for appraisal of damages for injuries caused by running logs down a stream applies only to a natural and necessary injury, and not to those caused by negligence, and for the latter a common-law action will lie. Mandlebaum v. Russell, 4 Nev. 551.

The Vermont statutes providing damages for injuries caused by the lodging of lumber on the land or dam of a riparian owner, and authorizing the improvement of streams upon payment for the injuries caused, does not preclude a common-law action for injuries caused by floating logs on the stream. Coe v. Hall, 41 Vt. 325.

A boom company which in conveying property reserved the right to go upon the banks and remove logs is not affected by a statute subsequently passed which requires the payment of damages for injury caused by so doing. Bradley v. Tittabawassee Boom Co. 82 Mich. 9.

Injunction.

Equity will not enjoin the use of the stream by a boom company in favor of the owner of a milldam, although the dam is wrongfully injured; but will leave the owner to his remedy at law if it will be difficult to prevent the right by injunction without interfering with the rights of floatage. Buchanan v. Grand River & G. Log Running Co. 48 Mich. 364.

Equity may restrain the use of a nonfloatable stream for the attempted floatage of logs if the result will be irreparable injury to the riparian owner. Haines v. Hall, 17 Or. 165, 3 L. R. A. 609.

Riparian owners of piers and booms upon a navigable stream may enjoin the placing of obstructions in the stream for the purpose of aiding the running of logs which will interfere with their use of the stream. Stevens Point Boom Co. v. Reilly, 44 Wis. 295.

Where an improvement company has illegally caused land to be overflowed, and threatens and intends to continue to do so, injunction is a proper remedy. Carlson v. St. Louis River Dam & Improv. Co. (Minn.) ante, 371.

The difference in the result in the two cases of Carlson v. St. Louis River Dam & Improv. Co. ante, 371, and COYNE V. MISSISSIPPI & RUM RIVER BOOM CO. appears to have been caused solely by the attempt to put the latter case on the ground of wrongful taking when no taking could be shown.

H. P. F.

within the meaning of the law, for which defendant would be liable, without regard to its negligence or carelessness in maintaining or operating its works. To this part of the charge defendant's counsel duly excepted. We infer that the court relied upon the case of Weaver v. Mississippi & Rum River Boom Co. 28 Minn. 534, when using this language. But the facts are not at all similar, for in that case it appeared that the company built its piers and hung its booms on Weaver's land, and directly invaded and appropriated it, not only by those acts, but by flooding with water, and casting quantities of logs and drift thereon, which, remaining when the water subsided, destroyed the usefulness of the land. It was with reference to these facts that it was held that there had been a taking of plaintiff's property by defendant, for which compensation could be recovered. It was not a mere consequential injury to plaintiff's land which was under consideration in the Weaver Case, but a physical invasion and appropriation by a defendant who was not exercising a legal right when so doing. The authority relied on is not in point. The defendant, in the exercise of its corporate franchise, and to facilitate its authorized work of handling and driving logs in a navigable river, constructed its piling and piers, and then hung booms,—one extending from an island on the east side of the main channel to the east shore; the other, from an island on the west side of said channel to the west shore; leaving the main channel, between the two islands, unobstructed. Logs were pocketed in both of these booms, but the latter did not give way, nor did the logs escape. The injuries complained of resulted from the jam which formed in the channel between the islands while defendant was lawfully handling and driving the logs from above. As the river was a navigable stream, the public, as well as defendant under its charter, had the right to use it as a highway for the floating or driving of logs; and the rights of riparian owners were subordinate to this use, if reasonably exercised. Doucette v. Little Falls Improv. & Nav. Co. (Minn.) 73 N. W. 847. The doctrine stated in 1 Hilliard, Torts, p. 103, thus, "If a party, in the exercise of a legal right,—more especially one conferred by statute, . . . does an injury to another's property, he is not liable for damages, unless they were caused by his want of the care and skill ordinarily exercised in like cases,"—is the one applicable where the right of passage in a navigable stream is involved. The right is a common and paramount one, but must be exercised with due regard to the rights of riparian owners. The use of the stream must be reasonable, and must be exercised with ordinary care and skill, such as the great mass of mankind would exercise under like circumstances when driving logs. The party using the highway is not an insurer, but he must not be negligent and careless. Floating logs may cause damage to the estate of the riparian owner; but, if the party floating or driving the same uses due care and skill, he is not liable for such damage. "Land on navigable streams is subject to the danger incident to the right of navigation, and where logs are driven in a stream in an ordinarily careful, prudent manner the owner is not liable for damage which may result to the riparian owner." Field v. Apple River Log Driving Co. 67 Wis. 569; Harold v. Jones, 86 Ala. 274, 3 L. R. A. 406; White River Log & Boom Co. v. Nelson, 45 Mich. 578; Lawler v. Baring Boom Co. 56 Me. 443; Hollister v. Union Co. 9 Conn. 436, 25 Am. Dec. 36; Lansing v. Smith, 8 Cow. 146; Thomson v. Androscoggin River Improv. Co. 54 N. H. 558.

The gravamen of an action of this kind is defendant's negligence, and the charge was incorrect. We need not consider other alleged errors.

Order reversed.

COMMONWEALTH of Pennsylvania, ex rel.

v.

BOARD OF PUBLIC EDUCATION.

(187 Pa. 70.)

1. The power of the sectional boards of school directors to elect principals of grammar schools under act May 26, 1871 (P. L. 1157), applicable to Philadelphia, is subject to the prior acts on the same subject which authorize the board of education to provide the qualifications of all teachers, and grade and classify them into principals and others, and to classify each grade.

2. Teachers are not included in the provision of Const. art. 10, § 3, that "women twenty-one years of age and upwards shall be eligible to any office of control or management under the school laws."

3. The exclusion of women from the principalship of grammar schools for boys or mixed or combined grammar schools is within the discretion of the Philadelphia board of education, which is empowered to determine the qualifications of teachers and classify or grade them.

(July 21, 1898.)

A PPEAL by relator from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 2, for Philadelphia County denying a writ of mandamus to compel defendants to approve her election to the principalship of a grammar school. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William Henry Lex and John G. Johnson, for appellant:

It is the duty of the board of controllers to provide a system of examination of all persons who may desire to become teachers in the public schools, and it is the right of the sectional board to elect any person so examined and qualified and receiving a certificate of qualification which is unimpaired and is in no way restricted to the selection of a person of a particular sex.

NOTE.—As to right of women to hold office, see note to State, Crow, v. Hoettner (Mo.) 88 L. R. A. 208.

The act of May 25, 1871 (Pub. Laws, 1157), enacts: "The sectional board of school directors in the first school district are hereby authorized and empowered to elect the principal or principals of the grammar school or schools in their respective sections, and the said person or persons so selected shall be entitled to act without further confirmation."

In Chestnut v. Philadelphia, 17 Phila. 32, Allison, P. J., of Common Pleas, No. 1, Philadelphia County, in considering this act said that the rules of the board of controllers 18 and 21 (now 19 and 22) which provide that before a person elected a teacher shall be entitled to the rights, privileges, and emoluments of such position, his or her election must be approved "in so far as they related to the election of principals of grammar schools, may therefore be regarded as abrogated by the latter statute [1871], and in so far as they are to be considered as a part of the statute of 1865, because passed in pursuance of that act, the act to that extent is repealed."

In Com., Sherry, v. Jenks, 154 Pa. 368, it is said: "No woman qualified for supervising principal should be refused appointment because of sex alone."

Messrs. James Alcorn and John L. Kinsey, for appellee:

In Com., Sherry, v. Jenks, 154 Pa. 374, the power of the board of public education to provide qualifications for teachers, and to consider the sex of the applicant, was sustained by this court.

Everything pertaining to the public schools, within the city and county of Philadelphia, has been committed to the board of controllers, excepting only the public purse, which has been kept carefully in the hands of the city councils.

Philadelphia v. Johnson, 47 Pa. 382.

In Chestnut v. Philadelphia, 17 Phila. 32, it was held that the board of public education, notwithstanding the act of 1871, had all the authority conferred upon it by the act of 1865 to provide rules and regulations for the qualifications of the teachers, and that a sectional school board could not elect as a principal of a grammar school anyone who did not have the qualifications provided by the board of public education.

The rule of the board, that certain positions should be occupied by male teachers only, has been in force many years. It was recognized as within its power in McManus v. School Controllers, 7 Phila. 23.

A teacher is not an officer in the ordinary sense of the word. He has duties to perform incident to his employment, but they are not official duties and he is not under oath.

Seymour v. Over-River School Dist. 53 Conn. 509; 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 741; Com. v. Stokley, 20 W. N. C. 315; Com. v. Filler, 147 Pa. 283, 15 L. R. A. 205.

The discretionary power of the board of public education in the selection of suitable and duly qualified persons as principals of mixed grammar schools will not be interfered with by the court.

Kell v. Ruay, 1 Pa. Super. Ct. 507.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By the act of February 17, 1865 (Pub. Laws, 176), the controllers of the public schools of Philadelphia (now called the "Board of Public Education") were directed to "establish a system for the examination of the qualifications of all persons who may desire to become teachers in the public schools of said district." And, by § 2, "no person shall, from and after the passage of this act, be elected to the position of teacher in any of [the public schools of said district] by any of the sectional boards of school directors within the same, unless such persons shall have been found duly qualified for the position to which he or she shall have been elected, nor unless he or she shall have received a certificate of qualification, duly issued by the authority of said controllers, after his or her examination, provided for in the 1st section of this act." The purpose of this act was to vest the entire control of the general subject of teaching and teachers for the whole district in the central and superior body, leaving to the local bodies of sectional directors the selection of individual teachers out of the class coming within the regulations of the board. The act of 1818 had previously committed to the controllers the general superintendence of all the schools, including authority to provide "such suitable books as they shall deem necessary for the use of the pupils belonging to the different schools within the district." 7 Smith's Laws, p. 54. In Com., Sherry, v. Jenks, 154 Pa. 368, it was said that, under these acts, "the regulation of the grade of schools and the transfer of a school from one grade to another is within the powers, and it is among the duties, of the board." In like manner, the grading or classification of teachers is as much within the powers and duties of the board as the grading of schools. The public school system of this district includes a central high school for boys, a normal school and a high school for girls, and from these downward through the more elementary grades of education, to the kindergartens. The system therefore requires teachers of very various qualifications, including acquirements, capacity to impart knowledge as well as to acquire it, age, experience, ability to maintain order and discipline, etc.; and the classification and assignment of teachers by such qualifications to the various grades of schools is entirely within the province of the board of education. This was clearly settled in Com., Sherry, v. Jenks, 154 Pa. 368.

The gradation of teachers into principals and subordinates is of long standing, and is recognized in our acts of assembly. In fact, an executive head, by whatever name called, is necessary to the harmonious and effective conduct of any school having several classes under different teachers. But the qualifications of principles themselves, considered in relation to the various schools over which they may be called to preside, may, and practically do, vary so widely as to require classification; and this is also a matter within the discretion and control of the board of education. It appears by the pleadings that the board has, in fact, classified principals to a certain extent, and for certain purposes, by the following proviso to § 8 of by-law 21: "And provided, further, that male teachers only shall be eligible to the principalship of a grammar school for boys, a mixed grammar school, or a consolidated school having three or more full grammar divisions, and to the position of supervising principal of a combined school containing a grammar school for boys or a mixed grammar school."

The relator, holding a general certificate of qualification as a principal, was elected by the sectional board as principal of the mixed or combined grammar schools of the eighth section, and now claims that her election is not subject to any confirmation by the board of education, whose duty to certify her name to the city controller is ministerial and imperative. For this position reliance is placed upon the act of May 25, 1871 (Pub. Laws, 1157), providing that "the sectional boards of school directors in the first school district are hereby authorized and empowered to elect the principal or principals of the grammar school or schools in their respective school sections, and the said person or persons so elected shall be entitled to act without further confirmation." But it is entirely clear that this act must be read in connection with the prior acts on the same subject, and was not intended to take away or diminish the powers of the board of education to prescribe the qualifications of all teachers, and, in so doing, to grade them into principals and others, and to classify each grade as among themselves according to knowledge, age, experience, or other test as the board may deem proper. The act of 1871 consists of the single section above quoted, and is merely declaratory of the law as it existed before. The act of 1865, already quoted, authorized the board of education to prescribe the qualifications of "all persons who may desire to become teachers," and in the proviso to the 2d section declared that "the exclusive right of the several sectional boards of school directors within said district to elect the teachers of their respective sections shall be and remain unimpaired, except in so far as the same is qualified by this act." The use of the single word "teachers" in this proviso was thought to raise a doubt as to the power of the sectional boards to elect principals, who might be claimed under the subsequent phrase, "except in so far as the same is qualified by this act," to be subject to a discretionary confirmation by the controllers. The act of 1871 quieted this doubt. No other intent can be perceived in it, and it has no other effect on the previous law. This view is confirmed by the act of May 25, 1887 (Pub. Laws, 264), on the same subject, where, in providing for the certification of names by the sectional boards to the board of education, care is taken to include expressly "all persons qualified as aforesaid, who shall hereafter be elected to the position of principal or assistant teachers," etc. The rights of the respective boards are well defined, and in no wise doubtful. It is the right of the board of education to prescribe the qualifications of all teachers, and to classify or grade them in accordance therewith, in such manner and by such tests as the board, in its discretion, may deem best for the interests of the public school system of the district. It is the right of the sectional boards to select, from the classes thus established, the individuals to fill the required positions in their several sections. They are directed to certify the names of the persons so selected, whether as principals or assistant teachers, to the board of education. The board of education then has the right to inquire whether the person so certified is a qualified member of the class from which the particular position should be filled, and, if so, it is charged with the duty of certifying the name and position to the city controller. The latter duty is ministerial and imperative, but it only arises after the board has ascertained, in pursuance of its right of inquiry, that a proper occasion is presented for its performance.

So far in dealing with the subject of qualifications of teachers, I have omitted mention of sex, as that is a matter of present controversy. But it is manifest that, apart from the legal point involved, sex is a most important element to be considered in the selection of teachers. The system, as already said, includes schools of all grades, from high school to kindergarten; and the curriculum embraces instruction in sewing, cooking, and in mechanical or manual occupations. To set men over kindergartens of children from four to six years of age, or to teaching small girls to sew or larger ones to cook, would in the present state of the world's social organization, seem incongruous, although there are men cooks and men tailors. So, on the other hand, women in charge of a night school of mechanics, or of a school of half grown and intractable youths, could hardly be expected to have a successful administration. Unless, therefore, some positive mandate of law prevents, it would seem that the question of sex in relation to the qualifications of teachers for different kinds of schools was one peculiarly within the discretionary control of the board of education. It is claimed by the relator that such mandate is found in the provision of § 8 of article 10 of the Constitution that "women twenty one years of age and upwards shall be eligible to any office of control or management under the school laws of this state." It may well be questioned whether teachers are officers of a school in any but a very restricted sense, as contrasted with pupils or scholars. But even conceding them to be officers in some vague popular sense, they are officers of instruction, and not of "control and management." The meaning of these words was well known at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. They referred to the public officers recognized by the statutes of the state as intrusted with the general administration of the public school system—the state superintendent of public instruction and local school directors and controllers, empowered to lay school taxes, build schoolhouses, establish schools, appoint teachers, regulate the admission of pupils, the course of study, etc. These were officers of control and management. To these offices women were not eligible. It is part of the current history of the times that the sentiment for the participation of women in the affairs of government had its initiative point, both in England and in this country, in connection with the education of the young, for which they had certain very manifest natural capacities. It was the force of this sentiment that inserted the provision in question in the Constitution of 1874. Teachers were not intended to be included, for there was no occasion to think of them in that connection. It is said in the appellees' argument that nearly 97 per cent (8,016 out of a total of 8,117) of the teachers in the public schools of Philadelphia at the present time are women, and the proportion at the time of the adoption of the Constitution was not materially different. The school laws of the state put women under no disability as teachers that required removal, and it was not with any reference to such positions that the constitutional provision was adopted.

It appears, then, that the board of education has classified principals with reference to certain classes of schools to which they may be appointed; that the relator though holding a general certificate of qualification as a principal, is not within the class entitled to appointment to the particular school to which she was elected; and that the test of sex established with reference to such schools is not unlawful but is within the discretion of the board. Judgment, therefore, was properly entered for the defendants.

Judgment affirmed.

SOUTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of South Carolina

v.

(.....S. C.....)

The sale of a frame for a portrait, made in another state to fill an order taken by a solicitor in the state where it was delivered, is a mere incident to the taking of the order for the portrait, and is not within the provisions of a state statute against peddling without a license, where the order for the portrait contained a provision that it should be delivered in a frame which the purchaser of the portrait should have the option of buying at wholesale price.

(July 5, 1898.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Sessions Circuit Court for Orangeburg County convicting him of violating the statute against peddling without a license. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. P. H. Nelson, for appellant:

A hawker and peddler is "one who travels from town to town, or from plantation to plantation, carrying to sell or exposing to sale, goods, wares, and merchandise."

State v. Belcher, 1 McMull. L. 40.

The defendant could not, by any construction, be held a hawker and peddler; he was not offering goods for sale to anyone; nor was he carrying them from point to point; but, on the contrary, was delivering portraits which had been ordered by certain persons, at particular points, and to those certain persons exhibiting frames, which they had been notified, and expected, would be presented with the portrait when same was delivered for acceptance and payment.

Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist., 120 U. S. 489, 80 L. ed. 694, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 45, is similar to this case. The court held the act unconstitutional, saying: "Interstate commerce cannot be taxed at all by a state, even though the same amount of tax should be laid on domestic commerce, or that which is carried on solely within the state."

A city cannot be empowered by the laws of its own state to impose a license tax upon a commercial drummer or other person of another state, for merely offering to sell goods within the city by sample, where the goods are to be brought from another state, and where the owner of the goods does not reside within the state where the goods are offered for sale.

Mr. W. St. Julien Jervey, for the State:

The act of 1898 (Hawkers and Peddlers) is not inimical to art. 1, § 8, of the Constitution of the United States.

The act of 1893 refers to hawkers and peddlers as a class already ascertained.

State v. Moorehead, 42 S. C. 211, 26 L. R. A. 585.

Gary, A. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was tried and convicted before a magistrate for selling picture frames without a license. The case contains the following agreed statement of facts, to wit: "The Chicago Portrait Company is a corporation of the state of Illinois, its place of business being in the city of Chicago, in the said state, engaged in the business of making portraits in oil, India ink, water color, and pastel, from photographs. That in the prosecution of its business the said company has agents traveling in this and other states, who solicit orders, and upon securing an order the agreement marked 'Exhibit A' in the brief is signed by the agent and turned over to the party giving the order, and a duplicate forwarded to the company at Chicago. When the portrait ordered is ready for delivery, a notification, as appears by Exhibit B, is sent to the person who had ordered same, and the agent of the company delivers the portrait at the time therein named, in a frame, which the party can purchase if he sees fit. The portraits and frames are shipped from Chicago to the place where they are to be delivered, consigned to the Chicago Portrait Company, and are received and receipted for by the agent of the company. The defendant, C. E. Coop was delivering portraits in frames on the 5th day of May, 1897, in the town of North, county of Orangeburg, state aforesaid, in pursuance of the agreement and notification above set forth, when he was arrested, tried and convicted for not complying with the act of 1893, in reference to hawkers and peddlers."

Exhibit A is as follows:

The defendant appealed to the Circuit Court. His honor, Judge Buchanan, dismissed the appeal, whereupon the defendant appealed to this court upon the following exceptions: "(1) Because his honor erred in overruling the defendant's exceptions and grounds of appeal from the ruling of and judgment of the magistrate herein. (2) Because his honor erred in not holding, as he was requested to do, that the defendant was not a hawker and peddler of whom a license was required under the provisions of the said act. (3) Because his honor erred in not holding, as he was requested to do, that said hawkers' and peddlers' act is unconstitutional in so far as it relates to the defendant for making the sales of pictures and frames in this case or in similar cases, and in conflict with article 1, § 8, and art. 14, § 1, of the Constitution of the United States."

The statute under which the appellant was convicted has been construed by this court in the recent decisions of State v. Moorehead, 42 S. C. 211, 26 L. R. A. 585, and Alexander Bros. v. Greenville County, 49 S. C. 527. In those cases it was decided that a person engaged in the sale of articles by sample does not become amenable to the statute against hawkers and peddlers, who does not make it his practice, but occasionally sells the sample which he is then carrying around. The reason for this rule is because the sale of the sample is merely incidental to the regular employment of selling by sample for future delivery. Was the sale of the picture frame a mere incident to the business in which the appellant was regularly engaged? It is not contended by the state that the sale and delivery of the portraits for which orders had been previously given was in violation of the hawkers' and peddlers' act, but that it was unlawful to sell the frames. The portraits and frames are shipped to the agent at the same time, and the portraits are delivered in frames, which the party is not compelled to purchase, but may do so if he sees fit. A portrait is not complete without a frame, and the frame may be properly regarded as a part of or incidental to the picture. If the person to whom the portrait was delivered did not purchase the frame in which it was then placed, he would very likely purchase a frame elsewhere. It does not appear that the agent sells the frame to any except those who had given orders for the portraits; nor that he goes to any place to sell the frames except where he is required to go to deliver the portraits. The person ordering the portrait knows then that it will be delivered in a frame, and that he will have an opportunity of purchasing it at that time. The tendency of these negotiations is to lead to a sale of the frame at the wholesale price, when the portrait is delivered. This case does not fall either within the letter or the spirit of the statute against hawkers and peddlers, and, even if the statute could be construed as intending to embrace a case like this, it would be unconstitutional on the ground of interference with interstate commerce. This court does not undertake to say that the agent might not have sold the frames in such a manner as to have violated the said statute, but the language herein used must be construed as applicable alone to the facts of this case, which show that the sale of the frames was a mere incident to the regular employment of the agent. But it is also conclusive of this case that it was a part of the obligation of the contract that the party selling the picture would deliver it in the frame, with the right of the person to whom it was delivered to purchase the frame if he so desired.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the circuit court order a new trial.

Jones, J., dissenting:

I dissent. The defendant, under the facts in this case, so far as concerns the picture frames, was a hawker or peddler, within § 294 of the Criminal Statutes of 1893. The sale of the picture frames was not exceptional, or occasional merely, but was within the general scope and purpose of defendant's business. It was a part of defendant's avocation to sell a picture frame to any and every customer who had given an order for a portrait. Therefore the rule in State v. Moorehead, 42 S. C. 211, 26 L. R. A. 585, and Alexander Bros. v. Greenville County, 49 S. C. 527, has no application here. These picture frames were not sold by sample or pursuant to an order solicited, but were carried about from place to place within this state, and sold, or offered for sale, for a price separate and distinct from the price of the portrait ordered. The fact that the frame was convenient for the use, protection, and enjoyment of the portrait can 41 L. R. A.

make no sort of difference in determining the question whether "picture frames" come within the definition of goods, wares, and merchandise, and whether the sale of such goods by an itinerant, carrying them from place to place for such purpose, constitutes hawking and peddling. Nor do I think the act in question unconstitutional as interfering with interstate commerce. The act does not discriminate against the citizens and products of another state. Town of CHESTERFIELD, Appt.,

W. N. RATLIFF et al., Respts.

1. Evidence that persons charged with shooting firearms without reasonable excuse within the corporate limits of a town shot at a rabbit in the corn patch of one of them, who had suffered from the depredations of rabbits in his garden, is admissible as tending to show a reasonable excuse for the shooting.
2. The reasonableness of an excuse for shooting firearms within the limits of a municipality is a question of fact for the jury, and not for the court.

(July 7, 1898.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Chesterfield County reversing proceedings of the town council finding defendants guilty of violating a town ordinance forbidding the shooting of firearms within the corporate limits. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. J. Kennedy for appellant.

Messrs. Stevenson & Matheson for respondents.

McIver, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants were prosecuted before the town council of Chesterfield for the violation of an ordinance of said town forbidding the shooting of firearms anywhere within the corporate limits of the town without a reasonable excuse for doing so. Upon their trial they demanded a jury, which was accorded to them. Evidence was offered on the part of the prosecution tending to show that the defendants had fired, one a pistol, and the other an ordinary shotgun, within the corporate limits of the town; but when the defendants offered testimony tending to show that they had shot a rabbit in a corn patch of one of the defendants, who had suffered from the depredations of rabbits in his garden, such testimony was objected to, and ruled to be incompetent. "After argument of counsel and the charge of the court, the jury brought in a verdict against the defendants as follows: 'We find the defendants, W. N. Ratliff and D. H. Laney [guilty] of shooting firearms in the corporate limits in the town of Chesterfield,'—the same being the form prescribed by the Intendant, the form of which appears in the reports of the town council; whereupon the court sentenced each of the defendants to pay a fine of $10 or be imprisoned in the county jail for ten days." The defendants appealed upon numerous grounds to the circuit court, where the appeal was heard by his honor, Judge Klugh, who reversed the judgment of the court below upon two grounds: (1) Error in ruling out the testimony offered by defendants for the purpose of showing that they had a reasonable excuse for shooting; (2) for error in charging upon the facts. From this judgment the town council appeals upon numerous grounds, which in various forms impute error to the circuit judge in reversing the judgment of the town council upon the two grounds above stated. We shall therefore confine our attention to the inquiry whether Judge Klugh erred in reversing the judgment of the town council upon the two grounds stated.

The ordinance which the defendants were charged with violating reads as follows: "Be it ordained by the town council of Chesterfield that any person who shall shoot any firearms anywhere within the corporate limits of the town, without a reasonable excuse for doing so, shall be fined not less than one or more than ten dollars, or be imprisoned not less than one or more than ten days." So that the offense denounced by the ordinance consists, not merely in shooting firearms within the corporate limits of the town, but in doing so "without a reasonable excuse." Hence it is apparent that when one is prosecuted for a violation of this ordinance it must appear, not only that the accused fired a pistol, gun, or some other species of firearms within the corporate limits, but also that he did so without reasonable excuse; or at least, if he can show that he had a reasonable excuse for shooting, that would be a good defense. Hence it was clearly competent for the defendants to introduce any testimony tending to show that the shooting was not done wantonly, but for a reason that the jury might regard a good excuse. When, therefore, the defendants offered testimony tending to show that it was customary for persons "to shoot cats, rabbits, birds, and other wild animals in the corporate limits of the town of Chesterfield," such testimony was competent as a circumstance going to show that it was regarded as a reasonable excuse to do so. And certainly, when testimony was offered to show that defendant Laney had a garden upon which the rabbits had been depredating, such testimony was competent as tending to show that there was a reasonable excuse for the shooting with which the defendants were charged. It is clear, therefore, that there was no error in the first ground upon which the circuit judge based his judgment reversing the judgment of the town council.

So, too, we agree with the circuit judge as to the second ground. Whether there was a reasonable excuse for the shooting was clearly a question of fact for the jury, and not for the court, to determine. It involved two inquiries: First, What was the excuse relied on? and, second, Was such excuse reasonable? The ordinance did not pretend to define what should be a reasonable excuse, nor is there any law which defines those terms, so far as we are informed. It must, therefore, necessarily be left for the jury to determine, under all the circumstances of each, what was the excuse offered, and whether such excuse was reasonable. If any authority be needed to sustain what seems to us to be so plain a proposition, it may be found in the cases cited in respondents' argument, to which we will add a case of our own which clearly sustains the same doctrine,—State v. Hatcock, 20 S. C. 419, 47 Am. Rep. 842.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

APPEAL by Theodore E. Christensen, guardian, etc., of Hannah Christensen, from an order of the District Court for Sanpete County denying her petition to be awarded rights in the decedent's estate as his widow. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. D. Livingston and Moyle, Zane, & Costigan, for appellant:

The statute conferring jurisdiction in divorce cases on the probate court was absolutely void, because contrary to the organic act, § 9 of the organic act (Laws 1888, vol. 1, p. 44), gave common-law and chancery jurisdiction to the district courts.

Zane, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It appears from the record in this case that Hermon J. Christensen, late of the city of Manti, in the county of Sanpete, in the state of Utah, died intestate on June 26, 1897, the owner of real and personal property valued at $77,571.96; that three children by Hannah Christensen, his first wife, and two children by his last alleged lawful wife, Petrea Sorenson Christensen, from whom he was divorced, after their birth, survived him; that after Luther T. Tuttle had been appointed administrator of the intestate's estate, and had filed an inventory thereof in the probate court of said county, Hannah Christensen, by her guardian, Theodore E. Christensen, filed her petition, as the intestate's widow, for an allowance from his estate. It also appears that the administrator of the intestate answered the petition admitting the marriage, but alleging a divorce on December 5, 1854, by a decree of the probate court of Sanpete county, and that petitioner afterwards intermarried with John Haihaway, and that she was therefore estopped from claiming she was the widow of the decedent. It further appears that the district court, sitting for the disposition of probate business, after hearing the evidence offered by both sides, without making findings, entered an order denying the prayer of the petitioner. From this order the petitioner, by her guardian, has appealed to this court.

These alleged facts present for our decision the question, Was petitioner the lawful wife of the intestate at the time of his death, and as his widow is she entitled to an interest in his estate? The determination of that question requires us to decide upon the validity of the alleged decree; and if we shall find the decree to be void, to decide whether her conduct estops her from obtaining the rights of a widow. An issue as to petitioner's sanity was also raised on the trial. Insanity, if found, would appear to be more pertinent to the question of estoppel, but we think it should have a bearing upon the decision of the other question. Therefore we will first consider the evidence upon that issue.

It appears from the evidence in the record that the petitioner and the intestate were married in the Kingdom of Denmark about 1843; that three sons were born to them there; that a daughter was born to them upon the plains.

Mrs. Snow, an old resident of Manti, who knew them in Copenhagen, and emigrated to Utah in the same company, testified, in substance, that Hannah Christensen had great trouble because her husband, after they reached this country, always wanted to get rid of her and take the children from her, and was always looking after other women; that he took up with a girl by the name of Elizabeth, while crossing the plains, whom he married at Springville, Utah, on the way to Manti. Witness knew the petitioner was left behind at Salt Lake City; that she followed out to the Jordan river, and her husband took her back; that she knew them afterwards in Manti; that her troubles appeared to unbalance her mind; that she had a great deal of trouble, and had queer ways; that there always appeared to be something on her mind vexing her, caused by her husband's actions; that petitioner's peculiar actions indicated her mind was affected; that her mental condition has appeared better since the death of her husband.

Elsie C. Dungaar also testified, in substance, that she came across the plains in the same company with Hermon J. Christensen and Hannah, his wife. Their first stop was at Salt Lake City. Remembered the time when Hermon tried to get rid of his wife. He put her away. She wanted to come with him and the children. When the company left, she went out in the night to the camp. They had three little boys, and a little baby, Sarah, born on the plains. The petitioner followed out to the camp, and her husband and another man took her back to Salt Lake City, because he did not want to take her with him. He took the boys, and left the baby with her mother. He had a woman with him, who was the first one he married afterwards. The petitioner afterwards followed her husband. She was troubled after she reached Manti because her husband had put her away, and she was flighty,—wrong in her mind. She could work a little. She had no place to go to. She remained in Manti many years, and lived at witness's home part of the time. After her sons grew up, they built her a small house. Afterwards she was moved to Gunnison, a neighboring town, for a time. She traveled around the streets night and day. She came to witness's house many times, and would sleep there. She was running around like an irresponsible person. She had no home there.

Theodore Christensen testified, in substance, that he was the second son of petitioner and intestate. The eldest son was dead. Witness was born in the Kingdom of Denmark, in 1845, and came with his parents to Utah, in 1853, and remembered the trouble when his mother was left behind, and the children were brought to Manti. Remembered her following out to the camp when they left Salt Lake, and how she hung on to the wagon, and tried to come with the children. Remembered all that. "At that time, after the trouble began, my mother's mind failed her. It became very weak. She appeared to be losing her reason. Witness noticed the change even as a boy. His mother followed them to Manti, a few months after she was left behind. When she got there she was not allowed to see her children. She came to the house, and to the windows, and was screaming and crying, and we children wanted to get out to her, and were not allowed to. Quilts were put up to the windows, and some woman came, and said 'For God's sake, let her see her children.' After that she would come every little while to see us, but was not allowed to stay. She appeared to be out of her right mind. Recently her mental condition has improved." The children on the streets called her "Crazy Hannah" (witness objected to that). At times she would talk rationally, and at other times she appeared crazy. Witness's father brought another woman with him to Manti. Did not know why his mother was left behind and deserted. When witness grew up he built a little house for her, and his mother and Sarah lived there until she moved to Gunnison. We boys took care of her after we grew up. She has wandered around a good deal.

Titus Christensen, the third son, testified, in substance, that he was two years old when his father and mother reached Salt Lake City, and can remember as far back as 1860. Witness remembered that he liked to go and see his mother, but his father would object. That his mother talked about his father a great deal, and appeared to be confused and bothered. After witness got old enough, he thought she was deranged. She said wild things. She treated witness well, but she would talk to herself about reformation. Was troubled about the way father was doing. After witness grew up, people told them they ought to have a guardian appointed for her.

Witness Luke testified, in substance, that he had known petitioner since 1854. That his wife had employed her to wash for her. Sometimes she would talk reasonably, and at other times her mind appeared to be unbalanced. That was his deliberate judgment. When the name of her husband was mentioned, or her children were spoken of, she would fall all to pieces. She would say Hermon was a villain. Had robbed her of her children. Witness would try to pacify her, but it did no good. Some people called her "Crazy Hannah." She was treated like a crazy person.

Sarah Martin testified, in substance, that she was the daughter of petitioner and intestate, and was born on the plains. Could remember living with her mother as a child. She made pictures on the walls, and said that was witness's father. Sometimes she would say the devil was after him with big sticks. She would run out at all hours of the night screaming, and witness would lie in bed, when a little girl, also screaming. "Her mental condition has continued the same until the present, except of late years she has been more calm, but she still makes the pictures on the walls, and thinks they are trying to murder her." Whenever she would talk about witness's father, she would go into a frenzy. Witness and her mother lived for a while in an old cellar. Her mother broke pictures once, and set the house on fire at another time, and partially burned it. She said something bothered her; that she could hear it all the time, but she could not tell what. It was reported that Hathaway was a deserter from Johnson's army, and drifted to Manti, and her mother was a poor demented woman running around, and that he took advantage of her.

In substance, such was the testimony of the witnesses who knew the petitioner longest and most intimately. Other witnesses who saw petitioner occasionally, and whose acquaintance was not so intimate, did not think she was insane. Some of them, however, who had talked with her, testified that, when her husband's name would be mentioned, she would become agitated and greatly excited.

The opinions of witnesses not competent as experts, and not intimately acquainted with persons whose sanity is the subject of investigation, unless they have closely observed their appearance and expressions, are worth but little; while the opinions of intimate acquaintances who have been close observers of their conduct, though not competent as experts, when they can instance acts indicating mental derangement, are often most reliable and more valuable than professional experts, who have not had the benefit of such intimate acquaintance. It must be conceded that the treatment of this woman, and the wrongs and hardships she endured, were well calculated to agitate her feelings, and arouse her emotional nature, becloud her reason, and to impair and unsettle her mental balance and equilibrium. One witness, who had known her in Denmark, after speaking of her troubles on the plains, at Salt Lake, and Manti, said, in her judgment, "They unbinged her mind." Another said, "Her mind became unbalanced." Another said that "she talked queer,—not like others in similar trouble; that she was flighty, and her mind was wrong." Another said she was regarded as crazy; that she was called "Crazy Hannah." Her daughter said she would get out of bed at night, and go screaming into the street; that she covered the walls of her house with pictures, and called some of them devils with big sticks after her husband; that she broke pictures on one occasion, and set her house on fire on another, saying they bothered her; that she was tired of living there; that she could bear them all the time, but she did not know what.

Such are some of her acts and expressions, detailed by those who knew her best. It would appear that her feelings and her emotional nature were subject to uncontrollable excitement and agitation, and that her mind was haunted with delusions, and that, therefore, it was not in its normal condition. There is no evidence tending to prove that her mind was unsound before her husband deserted her and took another wife, and forcibly separated her from her children. After she had been put away by her husband (as one witness expressed it), and she was left behind, and had attempted to follow and hold on to the wagon in which her children were, and after she had been in the night forcibly brought back to Salt Lake by her husband and another man, and after she had followed her husband and children more than 150 miles, to Manti, and was denied admission to the house where her children were, or the privilege of seeing them, she became incapable of controlling her feelings and emotions, and of exercising her reason. Her mental equilibrium and balance was overthrown, and a cloud passed over her mind, her life was blasted, and she was left a mere wreck. There can be no doubt that the case of this much wronged and abused woman appeals strongly for remedial justice, and that she should be given a portion of her husband's estate during the remainder of her days, if the rules of law will permit.

The decree on which the administrator relies to show the petitioner was not the intestate's wife, at the time of his death, is as follows:

December 5, 1854.

Probate court of Sanpete county, in session, by a special call by his honor, George Peacock, in place of the regular term on the following Monday, and proceeded to business. The court then proceeded to investigate the charge contained in the petition presented by Hammond J. Christensen v. Hanne Christensen. 41 L. R. A.

for divorce. Polance Koffert was sworn as interpreter to interpret the Danish language. The court heard the testimony, and decided that Hammond J. Christensen be divorced, and that he have control of three children, namely, Julius H. Christensen, Theodore Edward, and Titus I. E. Christensen, and Hanne Christensen to have F. C. Christensen, aged eighteen months, until otherwise directed by the court, and the said Hammond J. Christensen to pay all costs of suit, which is $10. Court adjourned.

George Peacock, Probate Judge.

To its admission in evidence the petitioner, by his counsel, objected on numerous grounds, and exceptions were taken to its admission. The decree recites that the court was in special session by a special call of the judge, in place of the regular term, to convene on the following Monday. By what authority such special session was called and held does not appear from the record. The decree also recites that the court proceeded to investigate the charge contained in the petition presented by Hammond J. Christensen against Hanne Christensen for divorce. It appears from the transcript that petitioner's husband was named Hermon J. Christensen, while the name in the decree is Hammond J. Christensen. It is not stated what the charge in the petition was, or what the petition contained, and there were no findings made by the court, and it does not appear otherwise that there was any petition filed. It is recited that the court heard the testimony, and decided that Hammond J. Christensen be divorced (from whom it is not mentioned), and that he should have control of three children, naming them, and that Hanne Christensen should have F. C. Christensen, aged eighteen months, until otherwise ordered.

Counsel for the petitioner insist that the foregoing decree is absolutely void for several reasons.—First, because the probate court, who assumed to render it did not have jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit. An act of the territorial legislature in force March 6, 1852, under which the probate court assumed jurisdiction to enter the decree, expressly provided that probate courts should have jurisdiction in all cases of divorce. But that legislature possessed only such authority to confer jurisdiction on those courts as the act of Congress known as the "Organic Act" conferred upon it. While that act conferred common-law and chancery jurisdiction upon the supreme and district courts, respectively, it gave to the probate court only such jurisdiction as its name indicated,—such as that court had theretofore exercised in England and in the United States. It did not give it general jurisdiction in chancery or at law, nor did it authorize the legislature of the territory to do so. Divorce causes belong to chancery jurisdiction. In Ferris v. Higley, 20 Wall. 875, 22 L. ed. 388, the Supreme Court of the United States held that the territorial law now in question, so far as it purported to confer general common-law and chancery jurisdiction on the probate courts, was absolutely void. Garcia v. Perea v. Bareln, 6 N. M. 239, 5 N. M. 458; Cast v. Cast, 1 Utah, 112; Higbee v. Higbee, 4 Utah, 19. The authority of the court to try a cause and render judgment must be determined from the facts alleged as the cause of action, and the law conferring and limiting its powers. If the only law purporting to confer jurisdiction on the court to try the case is void, then all acts of the court are without authority, and also void. In such a case, no intendment of law or presumption of fact can be made in favor of its jurisdiction, whether it be as to the subject-matter or the person, or as to averment or proof. Therefore we must hold the decree admitted in evidence absolutely void: (1) Because the court had no jurisdiction to try a divorce case; (2) because there was no proof of service of notice on the defendant; (3) because it does not appear that any cause for a divorce, such as the law required, was stated; and (4) because it does not appear that any proof was made on which to grant the decree. It is true that one witness testified that Hannah Christensen was present, and said she did not want to be divorced. That could only be regarded as an objection to the divorce, not as an entry of appearance, even if she had been competent to enter her appearance. Freem. Judgm. (4th ed.) §§ 120, 123; Galpin v. Page, 18 Wall. 851, 21 L. ed. 959. "A judgment pronounced by a tribunal having no authority to determine the matter in issue is necessarily and incurably void, and may be shown to be so in any collateral or other proceeding in which it is drawn in question." 1 Freeman, Judgm. § 120; Brown, Jurisdiction of Courts, § 1.

Counsel for the intestate's estate rely on the following provision of § 8 of an act of Congress in force June 23, 1874, as follows: "All judgments and decrees heretofore rendered by the probate courts which have been executed, and the time to appeal from which has by the existing laws of said territory expired, are hereby validated and confirmed." A preceding clause of the same section expressly provides that "probate courts, in their respective counties, shall have jurisdiction in the settlements of estates of decedents and in matters of guardianship and other like matters; but otherwise they shall have no civil, chancery, or criminal jurisdiction whatever: they shall have jurisdiction of suits of divorce for statutory causes concurrently with the district courts." In addition to the territorial statute of March 6, 1852, intended to confer jurisdiction upon the probate courts of the territory to grant divorces, the same legislature passed an act in force January 19, 1855, § 29, declaring: "The several probate courts in their respective counties have power to exercise original jurisdiction, both civil and criminal as well in chancery as at common law, . . . and they shall be governed in all respects by the same general rules and regulations as regards practice as the district courts." Under this provision the probate courts for nine years had assumed jurisdiction to try causes and render judgments in criminal and civil cases both at law and in equity. During this time men had been tried in those courts in the various counties, and convicted of various crimes, and sentenced to imprisonment or fined, and had served terms of imprisonment; others had paid their fines. Judgment had also been rendered against parties for sums varying in amounts, which had been paid, and determining property rights that had been executed. Doubtless Congress presumed the parties had been served with process, or had appeared, and had received justice; that in some cases sentences had been made upon pleas of guilty; that some of the judgments and decrees in civil cases had been by agreement or confession; that many had been paid, and possession of property, personal or real, had been given under others; and in that way the judgments or decrees had been executed, and justice had been done. It does not appear from the language of the curative provision that Congress understood that the judgments and decrees referred to were absolutely void. Judgments and decrees that had been executed, and from which the time for appeal had expired, were intended. No appeal can be necessary from a judgment that is entirely and absolutely void. Such judgments and decrees are of no effect, and parties endeavoring to execute them may be treated as trespassers. As we have seen, "a judgment pronounced by a tribunal having no authority to determine the matter in issue is necessarily and incurably void, and may be shown to be so in any collateral or other proceedings in which it is drawn in question." Again, the same author says: "A void judgment is, in legal effect, no judgment. . . . From it no rights can be obtained. Being worthless in itself all proceedings founded upon it are equally worthless. It neither binds nor bars anyone. All acts performed under it, and all claims flowing out of it, are void. The parties attempting to enforce it may be responsible as trespassers. The purchaser at a sale by virtue of its authority finds himself without title and without redress." 1 Freeman, Judgm. §§ 117, 120.

At the time the curative provision in question was enacted by Congress, the cases of Cast v. Cast, 1 Utah, 112, and Ferris v. Higley, 20 Wall. 875, 23 L. ed. 883, declaring the probate courts of Utah had not common law or chancery jurisdiction, and that so much of the act of the territorial legislature as purported to give them jurisdiction in divorce cases and general jurisdiction in criminal and civil cases were absolutely void, had not been rendered. We are therefore not disposed to hold that Congress intended to make a decree like the one admitted in evidence, and relied upon in this case, valid,—a decree rendered without jurisdiction to grant a divorce, and without jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, and in which it did not appear that a petition was filed stating any cause for divorce, as the law required, and in which it did not appear that any proof was made of a cause for divorce, as required by law; and if the national legislature had, by the provision in question, intended to validate such a decree, absolutely void beyond all question, the provision would have been as void as the decree. The United States is based on the will of the people, possesses only such powers as they have expressly conferred upon it, and such as are necessary to the use of such as are expressed, and no more. And the legislative branch of those delegated powers Congress possesses. It does not possess absolute power. It has no more power to make a valid decree out of a void one than it has to make such a decree out of a sheet of blank paper. It cannot make black white, or white black, or something out of nothing. Undoubtedly the law making department of the government may validate judgments and decrees voidable on account of errors or irregularities merely. If the court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit and of the person, and some essential step is omitted which the legislature had the right to dispense with, it may validate the judgment or decree, notwithstanding the omission or irregularity. The legislature prescribes the methods and mode of procedure, and the rules under which judicial power shall be exercised, and in doing so may dispense with such formalities as are not essential to the jurisdiction of the court. Whatever it may have dispensed with by law before action brought, it may dispense with by statute afterwards. It cannot, however, dispense with jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit, or of the parties, nor with a complaint, declaration, petition, or claim. There must be some right, duty, or claim specified. There must be a subject-matter stated, and it must be such a one as the court has the right to take jurisdiction of, and, if the judgment or decree is to be based upon facts, they must be first ascertained and found to exist. These requirements are essential to remedial justice, and appear to be axiomatic.

Judge Cooley says [Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 126]: "We have elsewhere referred to a number of cases where statutes have been held unobjectionable which validated legal proceedings, notwithstanding irregularities apparent in them. These statutes may as properly be made applicable to judicial as to ministerial proceedings; and although, when they refer to such proceedings, they may at first seem like an interference with judicial authority, yet if they are only in aid of judicial proceedings, and tend to their support by precluding parties from taking advantage of errors which do not affect their substantial rights, they cannot be obnoxious to the charge of usurping judicial power. The legislature does, or may, prescribe the rules under which the judicial power is exercised by the courts; and in doing so it may dispense with any of those formalities which are not essential to the jurisdiction of the court; and whatever it may dispense with by statute anterior to the proceedings, we believe it may also dispense with by statute after the proceedings have been taken, if the court has failed to observe any of those formalities. But it would not be competent for the legislature to authorize a court to proceed and adjudicate upon the rights of parties, without giving them an opportunity to be heard before it; and, for the same reason it would be incompetent for it, by retrospective legislation, to make valid any proceedings which had been had in the courts, but which were void for want of jurisdiction over the parties. Such a legislative enactment would be doubly objectionable: First, as an exercise of judicial power, since, the proceedings in court being void, it would be the statute alone which would constitute an adjudication upon the rights of the parties; and, second, because, in all judicial proceedings, notice to parties and an opportunity to defend are essential—both of which they would be deprived of in such a case. And for like reasons a statute validating proceedings had before an intruder into a judicial office, before whom no one is authorized or required to appear, and who could have jurisdiction neither of the parties nor of the subject-matter, would also be void."

The weight of authority is undoubtedly against the proposition that the lawmaking power may validate void judgments and decrees, and we find no authority for the validation of such a decree as the one relied upon by the administrator. Authority is against it. Some of the cases, however, fail to distinguish between void and voidable judgments. Nor do we think it can be supported on principle. McDaniel v. Correll, 19 Ill. 236, 68 Am. Dec. 587; Richards v. Rote, 68 Pa. 248; Roche v. Waters, 72 Md. 264, 7 L. R. A. 533; Nelson v. Rountree, 28 Wis. 367; Yeatman v. Day, 79 Ky. 186; Maxwell v. Goetschius, 40 N. J. L. 383, 29 Am. Rep. 242.

It is claimed, however, that Congress had the power to grant the divorce in question, and could therefore validate this void decree by a law enacted ten years after it was framed. Congress attempted to validate judgments in criminal and civil cases which had been executed. The effect of the curative act was (if held to validate the decree in question) to divorce the petitioner from her late husband, and make the divorce take effect ten years before it was actually granted. But Congress is a legislative body. It is not vested with judicial powers, like the British Parliament and many of the states of this Union during their early history; nor has Congress ever attempted to exercise such judicial power, as some of the state legislatures, after their Constitutions had partitioned the powers of the state government, and confined their functions to lawmaking, have. U. S. Const. art. 1, § 1, declares that "all legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." And § 1, art. 2, declares that "the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America." And § 1 of article 3 of the same instrument declares "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." All the legislative power delegated to the national government is vested in Congress, except so far as the President may participate therein, in the approval of laws or by his veto; and all the executive power is vested in the President, except so far as the Senate may give effect to appointments and treaties by its advice and consent; and all the judicial power delegated to the national government is vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish, except as the Senate may use such power in impeachment trials, and in such investigations as it may make in exercising its legislative power, and in requiring witnesses to appear and testify therein. It is plain that no express or implied authority to try divorce or other causes is vested in Congress, but, on the contrary, all judicial power, except as above pointed out, is vested in the judicial department of the government.

There are decisions to the effect that the granting of a divorce may be regarded as a legislative act, and that the legislature may, without any alleged cause for divorce, and without any notice to either party or opportunity to be heard, and without any proof, by an authoritative order or fiat, grant divorces; and there is a second class of cases which hold that divorce is a judicial act in those cases upon which general laws confer on the courts authority to grant divorces for cause, and that in such cases the legislature cannot grant divorces, but that the legislature may by special act grant divorces for other causes. A third class of cases, however, hold that marriage secures to the respective parties legal rights which cannot be dissolved except for sufficient cause, which must be alleged, and that the other party should have notice and an opportunity to be heard; that the truth can only be ascertained by proof; that a decree of divorce can only be granted on such proof; and that such a proceeding is necessarily judicial; and, in those states whose Constitutions vest all judicial power in the judicial department of the government, decrees of divorce can only be granted by courts of justice. In the case of Higbee v. Higbee, 4 Utah, 19, it appeared that Lyman P. Higbee, an attorney at law, residing with his wife in Idaho, sent her to California for her health, assuring her that he would follow. Soon afterwards he was elected to the legislature of that territory, and he induced that body to grant him a divorce from his wife without notice to her, without her knowledge, without assigning any cause for divorce, and without any proof. Afterwards he removed to the late territory of Utah, and after his death his wife, as his widow, was denied any interest in his estate by the probate court; but, on appeal to the supreme court of the territory, the legislative divorce of Idaho was held to be void, and his wife was held to be his widow, and entitled to a share of his estate. The case of Maynard v. Hill, 125 U. S. 190, 31 L. ed. 654, is relied upon to establish the authority of Congress to grant a divorce and to validate the void decree in evidence. The opinion was by a divided court. It held a divorce granted by the legislature of the territory of Oregon valid. In that opinion the court among other things said: "It is conceded that to determine the propriety of dissolving the marriage relation may involve investigations of a judicial nature, which can properly be conducted by the judicial tribunals. Yet such investigations are no more than those usually made when a change of the law is designed. They do not render the enactment, which follows the information obtained, void as a judicial act, because it may recite the cause of its passage. Many causes may arise, physical, moral, and intellectual,—such as the contracting by one of the parties of an incurable disease, like leprosy, or confirmed insanity, or hopeless idiocy, or a conviction of a felony,—which would render the continuance of the marriage relation intolerable to the other party, and productive of no possible benefit to society. When the object of the relation has been thus defeated, and no jurisdiction is vested in the judicial tribunals to grant a divorce, it is not perceived that any principle should prevent the legislature itself from interfering, and putting an end to the relation, in the interest of the parties as well as of society. If the act declaring the divorce should attempt to interfere with rights of property vested in either party, a different question would be presented."

In this it is conceded that investigations of a judicial character, to determine the propriety of dissolving the marriage relation, may be involved, and that a decree of divorce cannot be granted except for cause; and it was further said, when the object of the marriage relation has been defeated, and no jurisdiction is vested in the judicial tribunals to grant a divorce, that no principle was perceived that should prevent the legislature from granting a divorce. It was also added that, if the act declaring the divorce should attempt to interfere with the rights of property vested in either party, a different question would be presented. Undoubtedly legislatures should pass a general law such as they may believe the happiness and welfare of society demands, specifying causes for divorces. There was such a law in force in the territory of Utah when the divorce in question was attempted to be granted, and when the validating act was passed, and the district courts were open, with undoubted jurisdiction.

Inasmuch as the welfare of society, and the happiness of the people of the state, depend so largely on the family founded on marriage, and the public has an interest in its protection and maintenance, as well as the parties, some courts have gone so far as to hold the legislature may ignore the rights of the parties, and dissolve the relation, without inquiry and without opportunity to the parties to be heard, and may disregard the rights of the husband or wife not at fault; that the legislature in that way may break up the family, and set the wife and the children adrift without any provision for support, for it is conceded that the legislature in granting the divorce cannot make a decree for alimony, or as to custody of children, or as to property. In effect, it is held by such cases that the legislature may at the instance of the delinquent or one at fault, without inquiry, strike in the dark, and break up the family, and without warning set the wife and children adrift, humiliated and disgraced, without any provision for their support and maintenance.

The weight of authority undoubtedly is to the effect that a divorce should not be granted except for sufficient cause; that the party complained of should have an opportunity to be heard,—should have a day in court; that the decree of divorce should be upon proof; and that such a proceeding is judicial in its nature. Our conclusion is that the trial of divorce causes should be had in courts of justice under Constitutions conferring judicial power on those tribunals. Higbee v. Higbee, 4 Utah, 19; Ponder v. Graham, 4 Fla. 23; Bryson v. Bryson, 44 Mo. 232; State v. Fry, 4 Mo. 181; 2 Kent, Com. 13th ed. 106; Dartmouth College v. Woodward (Story, J.) 4 Wheat. 694, 4 L. ed. 678; Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 132; Greenough v. Greenough, 11 Pa. 489, 51 Am.

Dec. 567; Re Handley, 15 Utah, 212; Marwell v. Goetschius, 40 N. J. L. 893, 29 Am. Rep. 242. When the people of Utah formed a state government, they set the question at rest for the future in this state, by forbidding the enactment of private or special laws granting divorces.

Counsel for the decedent's estate also insist that the petitioner is estopped from claiming any interest in her late husband's estate, because of her misconduct, after the void decree, in contracting a marriage with another man, or by acting towards him for a time as though they were married. An estoppel cannot be based on a void decree or judgment. If the decree or judgment is simply voidable, a different rule may be applied. When the court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit and of the parties, and the decree or judgment may be reversed or set aside for error or irregularity, if the defendant waives his right to do so, by executing or accepting it, he will be estopped from denying its binding effect; but, when such judgment is void for any reason, he will not be estopped. The void decree in controversy was obtained by the decedent when he knew he was not entitled to it. The evidence is conclusive that about a year before the divorce he married a young girl, and, in view of that fact, his lawful wife had a complete defense to a divorce at his instance. Besides, he had deserted and abandoned his wife, and had taken her children from her under circumstances so cruel and hard as to overthrow her reason. Under such circumstances, there is no legal rule or equitable principle that would have permitted the decedent during his lifetime to be divorced from her because of her imbecility or misconduct, which his unkind and inhuman treatment brought about. Nor can his administrator or heirs rely upon it to defeat her rights as his widow.

She is not responsible for the void decree, nor does it appear that she consented to it. In her forlorn, wretched, and pitiable condition she did say that she did not want a divorce, and it appears from the evidence that from that day she has been incapable of forming a rational conclusion with respect to the consequences and effects of her own actions. When her husband was the subject of conversation, her feelings and emotions overwhelmed her reason.

The disastrous consequences suggested that may follow a judgment of this court holding the decree of divorce in question of no effect, notwithstanding the curative act relied upon, are not likely to follow. Nearly forty years have elapsed since the last of such decrees or judgments was rendered. It will, in all probability, be found that the statute of limitations and the dispensations of time have shorn such decrees, and transactions in consequence of them, of the consequences feared by counsel. If they are now ascertained to have been void. Owing to the peculiar circumstances of this case, we are of the opinion that the petitioner's right to an interest in the decedent's estate has survived, notwithstanding the statute of limitations and the lapse of time; and that this aged woman, with her physical and mental infirmities, is entitled, as his widow, to an interest in decedent's estate, and to whatever comfort it may afford her during the remainder of her days.

The order appealed from is reversed, and the court below is directed to recognize the petitioner as the lawful widow of the decedent, and to adjudicate the rights of the respective parties found to have an interest in his estate, and to make payment or distribution thereof according to law.

RICHMOND & ALLEGHANY RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

R. A. PATTERSON TOBACCO COMPANY.

(92 Va. 670.)

A state statute making a carrier which accepts anything for transportation to a point beyond its own route liable for its safe carriage to such point of destination in the absence of a written contract to the contrary, and imposing upon the carrier the burden of proving, even in case of such contract, that the loss or injury did not occur while the thing was in his charge, is not an unconstitutional interference with interstate commerce.

(March 12, 1896.)*

*This case was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States February 21, 1898.

NOTE.—For state regulation of contracts to limit carrier's liability, see also Solan v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (Iowa) 28 L. R. A. 712; Ohio & M. R. Co. 41 L. R. A.

A PPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court of the City of Richmond allowing the claim of intervenors for compensation for breach of a carriage contract in a suit to foreclose a mortgage on defendant's road. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William J. Robertson and Henry Taylor, Jr., for appellant:

It would be idle to say that the state cannot regulate transportation between the states, and at the same time admit its power to regulate the contract without which there can be no transportation. Any regulation, therefore, of the contract of transportation must, of necessity, be a regulation of commerce.

Bagg v. Wilmington, C. & A. R. Co. 109 N. C. 279, 14 L. R. A. 596, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 803.

Keith, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Patterson Tobacco Company filed its petition in the chancery causes styled "Terrell and Bocock, Trustees, v. Richmond and Alleghany Railroad Company and Others," and "Alexander and Ellyson, Trustees, v. Same," pending in the circuit court for the city of Richmond, from which it appears that on August 1, 1888, the tobacco company delivered to the receivers of the Richmond & Alleghany Railroad Company, at Richmond, a lot of tobacco, consigned to Mann & Levy, at Bayou Sara, Louisiana, to be transported in accordance with the bill of lading filed with the petition. The bill of lading is in the usual form, and acknowledges the receipt of the several boxes and packages shipped, their weight and classification. Among other provisions it sets out that it "is mutually agreed that if the ultimate destination of the packages received be beyond the point for which rates are named in the margin, they may, by the connecting carrier nearest to such ultimate destination, be delivered to any other carrier, to be transported to such ultimate point, and the carrier so selected shall be regarded exclusively as the agent of the owner or consignee. . . . It is mutually agreed that the liability of each carrier as to goods destined beyond its own route shall be terminated by proper delivery of them to the next succeeding carrier." From the agreed facts it appears "that the bill of lading is not signed by the shippers or their agent; that the tobacco in question was an interstate shipment; that it was delivered by the Richmond & Alleghany Railroad Company to the next succeeding carrier, and was lost after it had left the possession of the Richmond & Alleghany Railroad Company; that the sole question submitted to the court for decision was whether § 1295 of the Code was in conflict with article 1, § 8, cl. 3, of the Constitution of the United States, it being agreed that, if said section was constitutional, the Richmond & Alleghany Railroad Company was responsible to the petitioner for the loss of the tobacco; but, if it was in conflict with the aforesaid clause of the Constitution, then under the terms of the bill of lading filed with the petition, the railroad company was not responsible." By its decree the circuit court held that § 1295 was not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and the prayer of the petition was granted, and a decree entered in favor of the petitioner for the sum of $299.71; and thereupon the railroad company obtained an appeal and supersedeas from this court.

Section 1295, above referred to, is as follows: "When a common carrier accepts for transportation anything to a point of destination beyond the terminus of his own line or route, he shall be deemed thereby to assume an obligation for its safe carriage to such point of destination, unless, at the time of such acceptance, such carrier be released or exempted from such liability by contract in writing signed by the owner or his agent; and, although there be such contract in writing, if such thing be lost or injured, such common carrier shall himself be liable therefor, unless, within a reasonable time after demand made, he shall give satisfactory proof to the consignor that the loss or injury did not occur while the thing was in his charge." That Congress has, under the Constitution of the United States, the power to regulate commerce, is, of course, uncontroverted. That this power is, when exercised, exclusive in its character, and that the omission on the part of Congress to exercise the power over commerce with which it is clothed, is, in those respects in which the subject is capable of being dealt with by general regulations, equivalent to a declaration of the will of Congress that it shall remain free and uncontrolled, are propositions which seem to be thoroughly settled by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. We need, therefore, only to inquire whether the statute just quoted is a regulation of commerce. If it be, we must declare it unconstitutional, as trenching upon a province beyond the domain of state authority, and over which Congress is given exclusive jurisdiction. The supreme court has construed clause 3 of § 8 of article 1 in many cases. It has held that the power to regulate commerce among the states embraces the power to regulate all the various agencies by which that commerce is conducted. From these decisions it may be said that state laws which undertake to enforce a tax upon interstate or foreign commerce in any form, or any law of a state which imposes a burden or hindrance upon commerce, or which tends to embarrass commercial intercourse and transactions, or which under any disguise or in any manner seeks to give the citizens of one state any advantage over the citizens of other states engaged in interstate commerce, are regulations of commerce repugnant to the Constitution, and void. But that court, with its accustomed conservatism, content to watch over and guard our system of government as time and occasion may render its intervention necessary, has wisely refrained from all effort at generalization, or any attempt at enumeration of subjects as being within or without the one jurisdiction or the other which will furnish a safe guide in determining cases which have not come under its criticism. It is, indeed, somewhat difficult to classify the adjudged cases, and from them deduce harmonious rules of interpretation. Having given them, however, diligent investigation, and our best consideration, we find that there is no reported decision which can be held directly to control the case before us. Now, it is entirely clear that, if there were no such statute law as that embodied in § 1295, there would be no liability upon the appellant, for it appears from the agreed facts that, in accordance with the provisions of the bill of lading, the packages intrusted to its care were duly delivered to the next succeeding carrier, and then its liability under the bill of lading terminated. At the first blush it would seem that the statute did regulate and control the bill of lading, which is conceded to be one of the instrumentalities of commerce. Upon a closer inspection of it, however, it is apparent that the law is careful to avoid any interference with the utmost freedom in the making of contracts, and does not in any way attempt to control the legal effect of the contract when made. It, in effect, establishes a rule of evidence. The common law measure of liability being considered onerous and oppressive, the carrier is permitted to stipulate with the shipper so as to limit his responsibility by the insertion of any just and reasonable ground of exemption. It has therefore come to pass that bills of lading, like policies of insurance, have been expanded into cumbrous documents, in which the liability of the carrier is hedged about by almost innumerable exceptions, conditions and exemptions, to which no one ought to be bound until they have been brought to his knowledge and attention, and have received his intelligent approval. The statute does not say a certain exception, condition, or stipulation shall be void, though embraced in the contract between the shipper and the carrier, but it declares what shall be the implied liability upon the carrier who receives goods for shipment in the absence of a special contract; and, in order to protect shippers from imposition, it further declares that a contract relied upon to reduce the measure of the implied liability must be in writing, and signed by the shipper. For the protection of the insured it has been found necessary in this and other states to declare by statute that certain provisions in policies of insurance shall be void unless printed in type of a certain size, and the "statute of frauds" is, in some form, it is believed, a part of the jurisprudence of every state in the Union. The statute under consideration was doubtless conceived in a like spirit, as a necessary and salutary precaution and safeguard against the dangers to which experience had shown that shippers were exposed. Such contracts are not without precedent. There was such a contract signed by the shipper in Hart v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 112 U. S. 331, 29 L. ed. 717.

State laws have been upheld which declare "all contracts, receipts, rules, and regulations . . . void" which exempt a railroad company, or other person, from full liability as a common carrier. See Talbot v. Merchants' Despatch Transp. Co. 41 Iowa, 249, 20 Am. Rep. 539. It is true, the constitutionality of the statute was not in terms passed upon, this case having been decided in favor of the contract, upon the ground that it was made in Connecticut; but the court distinctly asserts the validity of the Iowa law, which had been upon the statute book for many years, and was expressly upheld in the case of McDaniel v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 24 Iowa, 412, and a liability under it enforced; the contract of the parties being overridden by the law. In Maryland, a law which makes bills of lading in all respects negotiable was upheld, though no one need be told that it changed very materially the rights and liabilities of the parties, and was attended with far more serious and important consequences to shippers, consignees, and carriers than a law which only declares how a contract shall be evidenced. See Tiedeman v. Know, 53 Md. 618. In same connection, see Shaw v. North Pennsylvania R. Co. 101 U. S. 557, 25 L. ed. 892, where Mr. Justice Strong, delivering the opinion, discusses at great length the interpretation and effect of the statutes passed by the states of Missouri and Pennsylvania, and shows very satisfactorily that those acts did not make bills of lading in all respects negotiable, while there is not one word to show that he at all questioned the power of the states so to make them, though a denial of the power would have gone to the very root of the subject under discussion. So, too, statutes which render the principal responsible for the act of his agent in issuing bills of exchange have been upheld, and others of a like nature, which need not be mentioned.

Viewed, therefore, as a law which levies no tax, prescribes no duty, imposes no burden upon, and in no way interferes with or regulates commerce, and which in no manner diminishes the power to contract, but which merely requires certain contracts to be in writing, and signed by the shipper, the party with respect to whom the duties and liabilities of the common carrier are by such special contracts to be limited, it seems to us that § 1295 of the Code, or rather the first branch thereof (the remainder of the section having no bearing upon the question before us), which reads as follows: "When a common carrier accepts for transportation anything directed to a point of destination beyond the terminus of his own line or route, he shall be deemed thereby to assume an obligation for its safe carriage to such point of destination, unless, at the time of such acceptance, such carrier be released or exempted from such liability by contract in writing signed by the owner or his agent,"—is not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. As was said by Judge Lewis in Western U. Tel. Co. v. Tyler, 90 Va. 800, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 481, where § 1292, which imposes a penalty upon telegraph companies for failure to deliver messages, was called in question as being a regulation of commerce: "If it can be said to affect commerce at all, it does so only remotely or incidentally." Mr. Justice Matthews, in Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, 31 L. ed. 508, states the law with his usual force and accuracy as follows: "It is among these laws of the states, therefore, that we find provisions concerning the rights and duties of common carriers of persons and merchandise, whether by land or by water, and the means authorized by which injuries resulting from the failure properly to perform their obligations may be either prevented or redressed. A carrier exercising his calling within a particular state, although engaged in the business of interstate commerce, is answerable according to the laws of the state, for acts of nonfeasance or misfeasance committed within its limits. If he fail to deliver goods to the proper consignee at the right time or place, he is liable in an action for damages under the laws of the state in its courts; or if by negligence in transportation he inflicts injury upon the person of a passenger brought from another state, a right of action for the consequent damage is given by the local law. In neither case would it be a defense that the law giving the right to redress was void as being an unconstitutional regulation of commerce by the state. This, indeed, was the very point decided in Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S. 99, 23 L. ed. 819. If it is competent for the state thus to administer justice according to its own laws for wrongs done and injuries suffered, when committed and inflicted by defendants while engaged in the business of interstate or foreign commerce, notwithstanding the power over those subjects conferred upon Congress by the Constitution, what is there to forbid the state, in the further exercise of the same jurisdiction, to prescribe the precautions and safeguards foreseen to be necessary and proper to prevent by anticipation those wrongs and injuries which, after they have been inflicted, it is admitted the state has power to redress and punish? . . . But for the provisions on the subject found in the local law of each state, there would be no legal obligation on the part of the carrier, whether ex contractu or ex delicto to those who employ him; or if the local law is held not to apply where the carrier is engaged in foreign or interstate commerce, then, in the absence of laws passed by Congress or presumed to be adopted by it, there can be no rule of decision based upon rights and duties supposed to grow out of the relation of such carriers to the public or to individuals. In other words, if the law of the particular state does not govern that relation, and prescribe the rights and duties which it implies, then there is, and can be, no law that does until Congress expressly supplies it, or is held by implication to have supplied it, in cases within its jurisdiction over foreign and interstate commerce. The failure of Congress to legislate can be construed only as an intention not to disturb what already exists, and is the mode by which it adopts, for cases within the scope of its power, the rule of the state law, which, until displaced, covers the subject."

To the luminous exposition of the law contained in the above quotation we feel that we can add nothing. Therefore, without prolonging this discussion, we are, for the foregoing reasons, of opinion that § 1295 is a valid and constitutional law, and the decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Washington, ex rel. W. S. GRINSFELDER, Respt.,

v.

SPOKANE STREET RAILWAY COMPANY, App't.

1. A prior demand for the operation of a street railway is not absolutely necessary to sustain a proceeding for mandamus to compel its operation.
2. One who lives adjacent to a street railway, and owns considerable property there which he has improved, relying upon the facilities afforded by the line, has a material individual interest which entitles him to be a relator in mandamus to enforce the operation of the line.
3. A street-railway company, which has received from the state and entered upon the enjoyment of a franchise for its business, cannot cease to operate the line without the consent of the granting power.
4. The operation of a street railway can be enforced by mandamus where a company which has acquired the right and commenced to perform the service attempts to discontinue it.
5. The absence of any grant or privilege or franchise to operate a street railway will not relieve a company which has occupied the streets for such purpose for several years without objection, from the duty to continue the service.

(June 20, 1898.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Spokane County in favor of relator in a mandamus proceeding to compel defendant to operate its railway on certain streets. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Thomas C. Griffith for appellant.Messrs. Graves, Wolf, & Graves, for respondent:

A corporation formed for the purpose of constructing and operating lines of railway upon the public highways, for the purpose of transporting passengers for hire, is a quasi-public corporation. When, in pursuance of the powers granted it by the state, it engages in this business, it may not at its pleasure discontinue the operation of its lines; but, on the contrary, it owes to the public generally the duty of carrying on this business until it be relieved from its obligation to do so by the state—the authority which conferred its powers and imposed its liabilities.

Re Loader, 14 Misc. 208.

Where the duty sought to be enforced is one which is imposed by law and owing to the public at large, there is no necessity for a demand and refusal. The duty imposed by law, and the omission to perform it, stand in the place of a demand and refusal.

High, Extr. Legal Rem. 2d ed. §§ 18-41;

NOTE.—For mandamus to compel the operation of a railroad or street railway, see State, Little, v. Dodge City, M. & T. R. Co. (Kan.) 24 L. R. A. 564, and note; also Chicago & A. R. Co. v. People, Hunt 41 L. R. A.

The relator is entitled to use the name of the state in bringing this action because the duty sought to be enforced is one imposed by law.

Union P. R. Co. v. Hall, 91 U. S. 354, 23 L. ed. 432.

Where the duty sought to be enforced is one owing to the public generally, private parties may sue out the writ without showing that they suffer a special injury.

The franchise granted to a railroad company, or to a street-railway company, by the state, is not granted to it alone for the profit that may be made therefrom by the incorporators. The franchise is granted in a large measure for the public good. Peculiar privileges are conferred upon them on the consideration that they will provide facilities for the communication and intercourse of the public. They are common carriers.

Therefore, such corporations may not, by any act of their own, without the consent of the state, disable themselves from performing the functions, the undertaking of which was the consideration for the public grant.

Application by relator for a writ of mandamus to compel the defendant, a street-railway company, to operate a line of street railway to Bell Park addition, in the city of Spokane. The alternative writ founded on the affidavit of relator was demurred to by the defendant, and, upon the overruling of the demurrer by the superior court, defendant answered denying some of the facts stated in the affidavit, and setting up new matter, to which reply was made by relator. Upon the issues raised a trial was had before the court without the intervention of a jury and findings of fact made by the court. Defendant excepted to a number of findings because not sustained by the evidence, but we find substantial evidence to sustain each finding of the court, and as this is a law action, the findings of fact by the court have the same force and effect as a verdict of the jury, and this court cannot, therefore, weigh conflicting testimony in the case.

The material facts found by the court are substantially that about the 17th of April, 1888, the Ross Park Street Railway Company was incorporated under the laws of the state, for the purpose of constructing, equipping, operating, and maintaining a system of street railways in the city and county of Spokane, for the transportation of freight and passengers, such railways to be operated by steam, horses, or electricity, and likewise to borrow money, and to secure the payment of the same by mortgage on its property and franchises. That subsequent to the incorporation, and from time to time until the spring of 1892, the Ross Park Street Railway Company, by building, leasing, and purchasing, operated a line of street railway commencing at the corner of Howard and Riverside avenues, in the city of Spokane; running thence along Howard street to Front street; thence on Front street to Olive street; thence east on Olive street to Hamilton street; thence north upon Hamilton street to Illinois avenue; thence east and northeasterly on Illinois avenue to C street; thence north on C street to Diamond street; and thence east on Diamond street to the northeast corner of block 1 of Bell Park addition to Spokane. That all of the streets mentioned were within the corporate limits of Spokane, to and including C street and the remainder of the streets were in platted additions to the city. The line of railway extends to the intersection of Illinois avenue and Hamilton street near a point known as Martha avenue, to the town of Hillyard. The Hillyard line was built by a separate corporation known as the "Arlington Heights Street Railway Company." Subsequently, in the year 1894, the defendant, through a corporation known as the "Washington Water-Power Company," acquired control of all the lines of Ross Park Street Railway Company and of the Arlington Heights Street Railway Company, and operated the same thereafter, until May, 1897, as one system. At that date a sale was made of all the lines of the Ross Park Street Railway Company by foreclosure of a mortgage executed to the Franklin Trust Company to secure payment of bonds, at which sale the Franklin Trust Company became a purchaser, buying all the property rights and franchises along the lines and appertaining thereto. On the same day a lease was executed by the Franklin Trust Company to defendant, by which the defendant covenanted to operate the said lines, and pay, as rent therefor, 100 per cent of the gross earnings to the Washington Water Power Company, the line of street railway running from Illinois avenue to the northeast corner of block 1, of Bell Park addition, being expressly mentioned and described in the lease, and being a portion of the line covenanted by the defendant in the lease to be by it run and operated. Thereupon defendant entered upon and continued under the lease to operate all the said lines of street railway until a few days before the commencement of this action, in December, 1897, when it discontinued that portion of the line from Illinois avenue to Bell Park addition. That at all times during the operation of these lines they were operated as one system, under one management, and passengers paid but one fare for the entire trip. In December, 1897, a short time before the commencement of this action, the defendant ceased to operate that portion of the railway line extending from the intersection of Illinois avenue and Hamilton street, at Martha street, to Bell Park, which in the findings of fact is designated as the "Minnehaha Park Line." Its poles, wires, and tracks were, however, left in the street, and have been left there ever since, and the defendant has declared no intention to remove the same or not to recommence the operation of the line at some future date. There are about forty families living reasonably adjacent to the Minnehaha Park Line who are in the habit of using the same for street-car facilities. There were daily carried over this line from 80 to 120 people. A large number of these people have built houses there, improved their lands and yards, and taken up their residence there, because of the street car facilities afforded by said line. The relator lives adjacent to this line, and several years ago commenced to reside there, and owns considerable property, which he has improved, relying upon the facilities afforded by this street railway line. No franchise was ever granted by the authorities of the city or county of Spokane to the defendant, or any of its predecessors in interest, for the occupation of Hamilton street, C street, or Diamond street. At the time the line along Hamilton street was built Hamilton street was not within the city limits. In 1891 the addition within which lies Hamilton street was included within the limits of the city. C street and Diamond street have not yet been included in the corporate limits, but all the streets mentioned are within platted additions to the city of Spokane. Hamilton street was dedicated by the persons along the northeast addition to Ross Park addition, and in the dedication of the streets in that addition the dedicators reserved the exclusive right to lay street railways along the streets, and prior to the building of the line, the defendant, or its predecessors in interest, received permission from the dedicators and owners of the property along the street to lay the same. Since Hamilton street has come within the city limits, the corporate authorities have not interfered with the occupation of the street by the railway company, and it has been in the undisputed use and occupation thereof. Along C street and Diamond street a like reservation was contained in the dedication of the additions through and along which these streets ran, but no permission has been obtained from the dedicators or the adjacent property owners by the street-railway company or its predecessors in interest to occupy said streets. It has, however, continuously occupied the same since 1892, and no objection has ever been made, so far as appears, by the county authorities, and at the time of ceasing to operate said line it was in undisturbed use and occupation of said streets. All of the Minnehaha Park line and all of the Ross Park line run along and upon public streets of the city of Spokane, and public streets of additions thereto, dedicated according to statute as public highways. The system operated by the defendant includes the major portion of the street-railway mileage in the city of Spokane. It is not found what is the actual cost of operating the Minnehaha Park line. The court found that a half-hour service on the Minnehaha Park line, run in connection with the Ross Park line, is a reasonable operation of the road and is such an operation as the company has maintained for a period of over five years. No demand was made by any person upon the defendant to continue or resume the operation of the line. Upon the findings of fact the superior court entered judgment awarding a peremptory writ of mandamus commanding the defendant to run and operate an electric car or cars on that portion of this road in the city of Spokane and additions mentioned and described in the findings of fact as the Minnehaha Park line.

1. It is urged by the defendant, appellant here, that, no demand having been made upon it to resume the operation of its line, the action cannot be maintained. It is true that, upon the necessity of a previous demand and refusal to perform the act which it is sought to coerce by mandamus, the authorities are not altogether reconcilable. Mr. High says: "The better doctrine, however, seems to be that which recognizes a distinction between duties of a public nature, or those which affect the public at large, and duties of a merely private nature, affecting only the rights of individuals. And while in the latter class of cases, where the person aggrieved claims the immediate and personal benefit of the act or duty whose performance is sought, demand and refusal are held to be necessary as a condition precedent to relief by mandamus, in the former class, the duty being strictly of a public nature, not affecting individual interests, and there being no one specially empowered to demand its performance, there is no necessity for a literal demand and refusal. In such cases the law itself stands in lieu of a demand, and the omission to perform the required duty in place of a refusal." High, Extr. Legal Rem. 2d ed. § 13. See also Id. § 41. In Union P. R. Co. v. Hall, 91 U. S. 343, 23 L. ed. 4-8, there was under consideration an application by private parties to compel the Union Pacific Railroad Company to operate its line as one continuous system into the town of Council Bluffs, Iowa. It was urged that these parties could not lawfully be relators in the suit, but it should have been brought by the attorney general of the United States, or the district attorney of the district of Iowa, because the object of the suit was to compel the performance of a public lic duty. The court concludes: "There is, we think, a decided preponderance of American authority in favor of the doctrine that private persons may move for a mandamus to enforce a public duty, not due to the government as such, without the intervention of the government law officer." In consonance with these views may be mentioned State, v. Marshall County Judge, 7 Iowa, 186; Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S. 313, 25 L. ed. 667; Atty. Gen. v. Boston, 123 Mass. 460. In Northern P. R. Co. v. Territory, 3 Wash. Terr. 303, it was said by the court: "No demand for the facilities required was ever made upon the company. That a demand would be necessary, as a foundation of proceedings of this nature to establish a mere private right, is conceded; but it is claimed by appellee that this was a question of public right, and that the company was neglecting to perform a duty which it owed to the public, and that in such a case a demand was not necessary. We think this claim is established by the facts and law of this case." It may be noted that appellant did not deny that it had discontinued the operation of its street railway line indefinitely. The rule which requires a demand to be made before application to the court for a writ of mandamus is founded upon reason; that is, it is unjust that defendant should be subjected to the payment of costs for a failure of some duty which it was willing to perform had it been requested to do so. In Atty. Gen. v. Boston, 123 Mass. 460, the supreme court of Massachusetts said: "But where a municipal corporation or board has distinctly manifested its intention not to perform a definite public duty, clearly required of it by law, no demand is necessary before applying for the writ." The appellant's duty is a public one, due to the public, if due at all, and therefore falls within the rule announced by the best authority. Upon the facts found, it was not absolutely necessary for the relator to make a demand for the operation of the line.

2. It is also suggested that the relator has not such interest in the subject matter of the action as will enable him to maintain the action. It is shown, however, he has a material individual interest in enforcing the performance of a duty to the public. Union P. R. Co. v. Hall, 91 U. S. 343, 23 L. ed. 428; Re Loader, 14 Misc. 208; Savannah & O. Canal Co. v. Shuman, 91 Ga. 400.

3. It is maintained by appellant that the facts failed to show any legal duty which it as a corporation is bound, either by law or its charter, to do or perform. The statute regulating mandamus in this state (Ballinger's Codes & Stat. § 5755) is as follows: "It may be issued by any court, except a justice's or a police court, to any inferior tribunal, corporation, board, or person, to compel the performance of an act which the law especially enjoins as a duty resulting from an office, trust, or station, or to compel the admission of a party to the use and enjoyment of a right or office to which he is entitled, and from which he is unlawfully precluded by such inferior tribunal, corporation, board, or person." High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 1, defines the writ as follows: "The modern writ of mandamus may be defined as a command issuing from a common-law court of competent jurisdiction, in the name of the state or sovereign, directed to some corporation, officer, or inferior court, requiring the performance of a particular duty therein specified, which duty results from the official station of the party to whom the writ is directed, or from operation of law." The controversy is whether, under the principles of the common law, a corporation authorized to transact the business which appellant is authorized to do, and which it has actually transacted, in the acquisition and operation of its street-railway lines, owes a duty to the public to continue the operation. The franchise was granted to appellant by the state, not for its profit alone or that of its stockholders, but in a large measure for the public benefit. Peculiar privileges were conferred upon it in consideration that it would provide facilities for communication and intercourse for the public. It is a common carrier. New York & M. Line R. Co. v. Winans, 17 How. 80, 15 L. ed. 27; Booth, Street Railways, § 1; Talcott v. Pine Grove Twp. 1 Flipp. 120. It was granted the power of eminent domain, a part of the sovereignty of the state, and, with the consent of the municipalities, it may lay its tracks over the public streets and highways. Such corporations, then, may not, by their own acts, disable themselves from performing the functions which were the consideration for the public grant. Thomas v. West Jersey R. Co. 101 U. S. 71, 25 L. ed. 950. The opening of a highway or ferry, and the common carriage of persons or property over them, was at common law a franchise and a matter of governmental concern. It was a part of the subjects in immediate possession of the sovereign power, and to exercise which demanded a special grant or charter from the sovereign. Such avocations, in their nature and history, are unlike the private avocations of milling, hotel keeping, and traffic, which all may be pursued at pleasure, unless restrained by the exercise of police power. Judge Kent says in 8 Kent, Com. p. 458, that there are certain franchises which are understood to be royal privileges in the hands of a subject. The right to set up a ferry or road, and the taking of tolls, is one of them, and in this the public has an interest. In 2 Bl. Com. p. 37, it is said that a franchise is a branch of the royal prerogative in the hands of the subject, such as the right of taking toll for a bridge, way, or wharf. In Prosser v. Wapello County, 18 Iowa, 327, it was held by Judge Dillon that a public ferry franchise could only be conferred by the government, and must be founded on grant, license, or prescription. Ownership of the soil on each side of a stream does not confer the right to establish thereon without a grant a public ferry at which tolls are charged. These rights, then, are held by the grantee, the holder of the franchise, as the agent and trustee for the sovereign power, and are in no sense private, but continue after as well as before, the grant to be but a portion of the public interests. The absolute commercial and business necessity for permanence when established forbade, from the earliest years, the manifest impolicy of leaving this interest to the laws of supply and demand, which thus far have sufficiently supplied the community with hotels, mills, etc.

And it is not in degree only that these franchises differ from mills and inns. The one is private property; the other is a public function, which originally resided in the government, and, when delegated to either persons or corporations, still retains the public use. In Gates v. Boston & N. Y. Air Line R. Co. 53 Conn. 838, it was said: "One public right consists in the continuous uses of the railroad. Its franchises and corporate property, in the manner and for the purposes contemplated by the terms of the charter. All these corporate franchises and this property are held subject to, and charged with, this obligation." In an early case, that of King v. Seavern & W. R. Co. 2 Barn. & Ald. 646, a writ of mandamus was issued to compel the restoration of a tram road and the relaying of the track which the company had worn out. In State v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co. 29 Conn. 538, a railroad company was incorporated to construct and operate a railroad for the transportation of passengers and freight between certain main points. The road was constructed, and thereafter it discontinued operating its trains to one of its termini. The court said: "We hardly know what doubtful principles of law are thought to be involved in the case. . . . All jurists and judges will at once agree that chartered companies are obliged fairly and fully to carry out the objects for which they are created, and that they can be compelled by mandamus to do it; and it will not be questioned that in the case of public highways, whether turnpikes or railroads, they are bound to keep them fit for use, and, in the case of railroads, to keep them furnished with suitable cars, engines, and attendants, without which they cannot be used at all." The supreme court of Maine, in Railroad Comrs. v. Portland & O. Cent. R. Co. 63 Me. 269, 18 Am. Rep. 208, compelled the erection and maintenance of a depot for freight and passengers upon a line of railroad. The Supreme Court of the United States in Union P. R. Co. v. Hall, 91 U. S. 343, 23 L. ed. 428, upon the relation of private parties by mandamus, compelled the Union Pacific Railroad Company to operate its road as a continuous line from Council Bluffs westward. In Potwin Place v. Topeka R. Co. 51 Kan. 609, it was held that the performance of the duties which a street-railway company owes to the public may be enforced by mandamus. There lines of street railway were operated in connection with a system of railways in the city of Topeka, and then discontinued, when the law was invoked. In San Antonio Street R. Co. v. State, 81 Mem. Tex. Civ. App. 38 S. W. 54, the supreme court of Texas held that, where a street railway company had undertaken the operation of its line upon certain streets, the public acquired a right to the operation of the lines which could be enforced by mandamus. It was also held that it was no defense to a writ of mandamus that a city might forfeit its franchise for failure to continue to operate its cars over a portion of the line; and it was further determined that an answer which set up that the operation of the line was a continual loss to defendant, that the revenues received were not sufficient to pay the actual expenses of its operation, and that if it continued the operation of the line the value of its whole property would be consumed and it would become bankrupt, was no defense, for the reason that, so long as it retained its franchise, it would not be allowed to urge, as an excuse for failure to perform the duties imposed by it, that it was nonproftable. A similar principle is sustained with regard to a canal company in Savannah & O. Canal Co. v. Shuman, 91 Ga. 400, where a peremptory writ of mandamus was issued against a canal company requiring it to keep its canal in a navigable condition. It was also held that the answer of the defendant, that the operation of the canal was unprofitable, was no defense; that it could not retain its franchises and refuse to perform its duty. In Haugen v. Albina Light & W. Co. 21 Or. 411, 14 L. R. A. 424, it was determined that a corporation formed for the purpose of supplying a city and its inhabitants with water, and which had laid its pipes in the streets of the city for that purpose, could be compelled by mandamus to supply persons living along the streets with water.

Counsel for appellant has called our attention to two cases to support the position that mandamus cannot be maintained here: One, People v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 103 N. Y. 95. But the statute of New York provided that a peremptory writ of mandamus is only authorized, in the first instance, "where the applicant's right to a mandamus depends only upon questions of law." In that case the material averments of the petition of the attorney general were put in issue, and the facts were that a short line of road was abandoned where there was another line, only 2 miles longer, that accommodated the same public. The court said: "The present line [in operation] is a little longer than the one originally adopted and slightly varying therefrom, but it accommodates the people of the state and the people of the locality substantially as well as the line originally adopted. Suppose two roads were consolidated, and the lines of the two between two places were parallel and near to each other, could the consolidated road be compelled by mandamus to operate both lines, or could it discharge its duty to the public by using only one line?" And the court concluded that one only was sufficient in that case. The conclusion in no wise negatives the established principle of the public duty owed by the railroad company. The other authority is State, Scully, v. Canal & C. Streets R. Co. 23 La. Ann. 838, which was an application for a writ of mandamus to compel the officers of a street railway company to collect from subscribers to the capital stock of the corporation their delinquent subscriptions. The relators were stockholders. The defense was that the amounts to be paid and the times of payment were, by the charter and agreement signed by the relators, left to the discretion of the board of directors, and the provision was that "five per cent of each subscription shall be payable at the signing of these articles, and the balance shall be paid at such times and in such amounts or installments as the board of directors may order." The court there held that, as a general rule, a writ of mandamus would not lie to compel an officer or a company to do an act coming within the range of their duties, where the law or the charter under which they act has vested in them a discretion to do or not to do it. The case is clearly not in point here, for no discretion is vested by our laws in the charter of a street-railway company that would authorize its discontinuance of a street-railway line which it had already established and operated. Permanency in the service of the public in a reasonable manner is an essential duty in all such avocations.

4. But it is also urged by counsel for appellant that it had no grant or privilege or franchise from the city or county to operate its tracks upon the public streets, and was simply a licensee from the owners of the additions through which these streets ran. But it has continuously occupied these streets, since 1892, with its lines, and no objection has been made by the city or county authorities to such occupation, and it is in undisturbed use and occupation of these streets. The city could not object now. Spokane Street R. Co. v. Spokane Falls, 6 Wash. 521. We do not think it can urge this objection so long as it is undisturbed in its use of the streets. We conclude that a corporation of the nature of appellant, receiving its franchises from the state and entering upon the enjoyment of them, cannot cease to perform the functions which were the consideration for the grant of such franchises without the consent of the granting power. The question of the public convenience is one which appeals to the discretion of the court. The distinction between a franchise granted by the state of the right to exist and engage in peculiarly favored operations, and upon which special and peculiar burdens are imposed, and the license granted by a municipality to such corporations to transact their business within its limits, was discussed by this court in a recent case. Commercial Electric Light & P. Co. v. Tacoma, 17 Wash. 661. It was there stated that an electrical company was a quasi-public corporation, and might not, without the consent of the state, disable itself from the performance of its public duties by transferring its corporate privileges and franchises, but that it might transfer to others the privilege granted by the municipal corporation to perform its business in the public streets within the limits of the city. DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURT OF APPEALS

John J. JOHNSON, Trustee of the Estate of

v.

Kate VAN WYCK.

(..... D. C.)

1. An agreement by an attorney to prosecute a suit entirely at his own expense in consideration of one half of the recovery is champertous.
2. Champerty is illegal, independent of statute, and the English statutes of Edw. I. and III. and 32 Hen. VIII. on this subject were merely declaratory of the common law.
3. The fact that a champertous trust is in part for the benefit of one who conveyed land in consideration of a share of the prospective recovery in champertous litigation will not make the trustee's title valid for any part of the property.
4. The rule that champerty in an incidental contract will not defeat title does not apply so as to allow a recovery of land by a trustee whose title is derived through champertous conveyances which have a merely nominal consideration aside from champertous agreements to prosecute suits for the property at the expense of the various grantees.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Supreme Court for the District of Columbia in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the possession of certain real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. J. Johnson and W. H. Armstrong for appellant.

Mr. William F. Mattingly, for appellee:

When a contract is clearly champertous it is still held void and will not be enforced.

Stanton v. Haskin, 1 MacArth. 558, 29 Am. Rep. 612; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 86; Matthews v. Hennen, 2 App. D. C. 349; Brown v. Bigne, 21 Or. 260, 14 L. R. A. 745; Gilbert v. Holmes, 64 Ill. 548; The Mohawk, 8 Wall. 153, 19 L. ed. 406; Boardman v. Thompson, 25 Iowa, 487.

This ejectment is based upon the deed to the plaintiff, and to maintain the action it is essential that the deed should be free from taint and one that a court could enforce.

Shepard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of ejectment brought by J. J. Johnson, trustee, to recover a square of land in the city of Washington. This square is a part of the original tract of 494 acres of land known as "Jamaica" before the laying out of the city of Washington, and is, with the exception of about 50 acres, included in the original plan and survey thereof. Samuel Blodgett purchased the tract subject to a contract with the commissioners made by his grantors, and in the allotment thereunder took a title in fee simple to about one half of the squares and lots as designated on the original map of the city.

The plaintiff claiming under grant from the heirs of said Samuel Blodgett and certain grantees and agents of theirs, proved heirship properly, and then offered in evidence the conveyance under which he claimed, together with certain other instruments referred to therein and made parts of it. The deed was excluded upon the objection of defendant "that it was void as champertous and against public policy." As this objection is founded on the recitals of the papers excluded they are fully described and stated in the order of their execution, as follows: 1. June 27, 1873, the heirs of Samuel Blodgett, deceased, entered into an agreement with one Lorin Blodgett, authorizing and empowering him to institute suits at law and in equity to recover all real estate of Samuel Blodgett in the city of Washington, including claims against buildings and property of the United States and claims against the commissioners charged with laying out the city, and certain personal claims, and so forth, excepting only "French spoliation claims." The said Lorin Blodgett was fully empowered to bind the grantors "in contracts for conveyances, acquittals, and releases of title to all or any part of said estates and claims, and to settle and adjust them in his discretion, and to execute final and absolute deeds and other conveyances, and to hold and lease such properties when in his judgment their interests rendered it desirable to do so, and to sign in final release on proper settlement for any and all of said claims." The said Lorin Blodgett promised to prosecute the claims with diligence, "and to pay all expenses and costs of such proof and prosecution." It was also stipulated that in consideration of said Lorin Blodgett's contract to "prosecute, recover, and collect the said estates and claims at his own proper costs and expenses, he shall be entitled to and shall have the one half of all the proceeds thereof." The said Lorin Blodgett further agreed to file an account annually as trustee in the proper court in the city of Philadelphia, if requested by any of the parties of the first part, in which he shall set forth all his transactions and settlements. It was admitted on the trial that the said Lorin Blodgett was neither an heir of said Samuel Blodgett, nor a kinsman of an heir. 2. May 28, 1884, an indenture was made between the said heirs and the said Lorin Blodgett, as parties of the first part, and one Robert Morrison as party of the second part, which recites the aforesaid agreement of June 27, 1873, and makes it a part thereof, and declares a desire to make said trust and agreement "effectual to the fullest extent." Then, reciting a consideration of the premises, and the further consideration of $10, it conveys to the party of the second part (Morrison) "all the right, title, interest, and estate in and to all the estate, real and personal, of which Samuel Blodgett, deceased, died seised and possessed; consisting of certain claims and rights in law and equity against certain of the buildings and property of the United States in the district of Columbia, and of claims upon the commissioners of Washington," and so forth, "... and also consisting of and being certain tracts, squares, lots, and parcels of ground in said District of Columbia, being all that piece of land known as and commonly designated as 'Jamaica.'" The land is then described by its ancient boundaries and again also by numbers of the many squares into which it was divided, as shown on the city map. This conveyance is made "in trust for the sole use, benefit, and behoof of the said parties of the first part and the said party of the second part as declared in the trust to the said Lorin Blodgett of record as aforesaid—and upon this further trust, from time to time, and at all times to dispose of, convey, acquit, and release the same or any part thereof, to such person or persons, to such use and purposes and in such quantity and quality of estate or estates as in the judgment of the said party of the third part shall seem meet and proper, in the best interests of all concerned, and upon this further trust, to prosecute, sue for, recover, and collect said estates and claims and any and every part thereof, and to convert the same into money, keeping an exact account of all his transactions and of all moneys recovered by him, which account shall be open and accessible to the inspection of any and all of the parties hereto, their agents or attorneys; and upon this further trust, to account for and pay over unto the said Lorin Blodgett, trustee, party of the second part, all moneys that shall or may come into his hands in the execution of his trust as provided for and intended by the hereinbefore recited deed, agreement, and trust to said party of the second part, for distribution by the said party of the second part according to the provisions of said deed, agreement, and trust." 3. January 22, 1887, Lorin Blodgett executed a power of attorney to the Union Trust Company of Philadelphia, reciting the two foregoing instruments and empowering it to collect and enforce collections of the property under his right as administrator of Samuel Blodgett, Jr., deceased, as trustee, and as "a party in interest therein." 4. On February 8, 1887, agreement was made by and between said Robert Morrison, trustee, and one William F. Boogher, as follows:

"Whereas, Wm. F. Boogher, of Washington City, D. C., has furnished to D. R. Patterson, Esq., of Philadelphia, Penna., share certificates Nos. 51, 52, 53, 54, and 55 each for $1,000, and share certificate No. 56, for $5,000 (the total par thereof being $10,000) of the estate of Samuel Blodgett, Jr., deceased, for sale as instructed and in such quantities as he may be able to dispose of the same, the proceeds derived therefrom to be deposited with the Union Trust Company of Philadelphia, Penna., and to be applied under the direction of said company to the prosecution of certain suits now pending and to be instituted for and about the property and concerns of the said Samuel Blodgett, Jr., deceased, which are solely and only located in the District of Columbia, to wit, only the real estate concerns of said deceased, and in and about which properties the said Boogher has certain rights and interests; and is to provide means wherewith to conduct and prosecute the suits now instituted and to be instituted, and to effect which he has as aforesaid placed the said shares in the hands of said Patterson for negotiation and sale.

"And whereas Robert Morrison of said city of Washington is under and by virtue of a certain deed, dated May 29, 1884, made and executed by the heirs of said Blodgett and also Lorin Blodgett of Philadelphia, Penna., to him the said Morrison and his successors, duly constituted the trustees for said heirs and said Lorin Blodgett and as such trustee holds for said parties the title to said properties located in the District of Columbia, and as such trustee has instituted certain suits and proceedings for and about the said properties in the supreme court for the District of Columbia, looking toward the recovery thereof and enforcing the rights of said heirs thereto, which suits, etc., are now pending, and said trustee is about to bring other actions or proceedings in the same court for the said heirs, and for the same purposes and promises, and agrees to press the rights of said heirs and the said causes to as speedy a determination and settlement as possible and in good faith.

"And whereas the said Lorin Blodgett has on the 22d day of January, 1887, in his own right and also as trustee and attorney in fact for the heirs of said Samuel Blodgett, deceased, and also as administrator for said deceased, appointed the said Union Trust Company his true and lawful attorney to ask, demand, sue for, levy, recover and receive all moneys, debts, rents, goods, wares, dues, accounts, and other demands of every sort, which are or shall be due, owing, payable, and belonging to or detained from him the said Lorin Blodgett, in or by any way, manner, or means on account of his interest under his contract, agreement, and indenture, made with the heirs at law of Samuel Blodgett, deceased, dated June 27, 1873, and under the said deed to said Morrison as trustee, dated May 29, 1884, and also as administrator as aforesaid, and also by said power of attorney dated January 22, 1887, gives to said Union Trust Company full power and authority to collect and enforce the collection of whatever property, effects, and sums of money may be or become due, owing, payable, or deliverable to said Lorin Blodgett, as such administrator, also as trustee for the parties in interest, and also as a party in interest therein, also the said Union Trust Company, under said power of attorney is as such attorney to account to and pay over to the several parties in interest in said estate whether as heirs at law or otherwise, said property, effects, and moneys in such proportions and amounts as shall be designated and awarded by the tribunals or courts having jurisdiction of the accounts of said Lorin Blodgett as administrator and trustee aforesaid, also giving to said Union Trust Company full and entire power in all the said matters, also to sign all receipts, dues, papers, and acquittances necessary for said administrator to do in, to, or about any or all such matters or pertaining thereto in any way, with power to appoint agents or attorneys to carry out the same, and to revoke any such appointments, and ratifying and holding for firm and effect all that the said Union Trust Company may do under and by virtue of said power of attorney, and by special promise and contract making the same irrevocable and taking considerations and services thereunder.

"And whereas it is the desire of each and all the parties hereto to have the purposes and conditions of said arrangement of said Wm. F. Boogher with said Union Trust Company and said D. R. Patterson, as well also as the purposes and conditions of said power of attorney made by said Lorin Blodgett as administrator, trustee, etc., etc., fully, thoroughly, and completely carry out in all parts and intendments of both and all, and also it is the desire and intent to secure the services of the said Union Trust Company, in and about all singular and several matters touching or concerning the said matters involved in or concerning said estate; and matters referred to herein.

"Now, therefore, the said William F. Boogher in consideration of this agreement and its advantages by him recognized, for himself, his heirs and assigns, agrees to and with all the parties hereto and with the said Union Trust Company that the funds and proceeds derived from the sale of the said share certificates shall be deposited with the said Union Trust Company, and from time to time, as occasion may, in the judgment of the Union Trust Company require, be applied to the payment of costs and expenses necessary to the conducting of the several suits and proceedings touching and concerning said matters involved in the matters, concerns, and estate of which said Morrison is trustee as aforesaid. Except that it is understood that out of said proceeds said Boogher is to have for his own use and expense $125 per month. But the expense of pressing said suits is to be first considered, and no allowance to said Boogher is to interfere with the enforcing the rights and claims of said heirs by every legal method and process. And the said Boogher recognizes, consents to, and affirms the said power of attorney made by said Blodgett to said Union Trust Company on January 22, 1887, and accepts for his guidance and governance all the conditions and provisions and intendments thereof, and agrees that he will at all times and places be governed, controlled, and directed in all affairs connected with or about said estate and concerns herein in any way alluded to by the said Union Trust Company and its proper officers and agents.

"And the said Morrison as such trustee, for the consideration aforesaid and the recognized advantages hereof, for his successors and assigns as well as for his heirs, executors, and assigns, agrees that he will faithfully carry out and perform his said trust under the direction of the said Union Trust Company, and also all the parts and conditions of this agreement he will faithfully perform and keep; and further, that the Union Trust Company shall be his successor in the event that any transfer of the trust or powers that he has or may have under said deed from said heirs is made at any time or in case at any time, a succession from any cause is necessary; and that he recognizes, consents to, and affirms the said power of attorney made by said Blodgett to said Union Trust Company on January 22, 1887, and accepts for his guidance and governance all the conditions, provisions, and intendments thereof, and agrees that he will at all times and places be governed, controlled, and directed in all affairs connected with or about said estate and his said trust, in every part and particular, by the said Union Trust Company and its proper officers and agents, and this includes all matters whether of expense or otherwise, and make and render accounts to said company at least monthly, on the first day of each and every month of all his actions, doings, and transactions as such trustee or in any way or manner concerning said trust, with vouchers for all moneys had and expended, if any such at any time there be, and also at any time to employ such attorneys, counsel, or agents in the said matters of his said trust or any of them or concerning the same as the said Union Trust Company or its officers shall request, desire, select, or deem expedient to engage or employ, and which may be deemed necessary by said trustee. And further the said Morrison, as trustee, etc., and for himself, etc., agrees that no property covered by his said deed of trust shall be conveyed by him or any other person by deed or otherwise to any person for any purpose without the written approval and consent of the said Union Trust Company as to the amount of purchase money to be paid and the terms and conditions of such sale, or of any mortgage or encumbrance placed or put upon said property or any thereof to secure purchase money.

"And the said Morrison as such trustee, and for his successors and assigns, and for himself, his heirs and assigns, does empower and appoint the said Union Trust Company his true and lawful attorney to the same extent and as fully as the said Lorin Blodgett has done in and by his power of attorney dated January 22, 1887, reference to which is hereby specially had, to carry out the purposes, uses, and conditions of his said trust as stated and intended by said deed made to said Morrison by said heirs, dated May 29, 1884, and agrees that he will deposit all funds and moneys arising out of and from his said trust with said company, for the use and benefit of the estate of which said Lorin Blodgett is administrator. And for the consideration herein this is made irrevocable.

"And for its trouble and concern, and for full compensation in all these matters, the said Morrison agrees that the said Union Trust Company shall retain to itself a sum of money equal to one half of all the fees, commissions, and allowances made by him as said trustee by any court or tribunal, and he agrees so far as he may that if no allowance is made then the said Union Trust Company may return to itself in and for full compensation a sum of money equal to 2 per cent of the total amounts which may or shall come into the hands of said trust company through or by reason of the said trust or any of the matters concerned therein, provided the court allows said 2 per cent to be taken out of said estate, but in no event is said Morrison to become personally liable to said trust company for said amount."

Indorsed upon this is an acceptance of the "obligations and duties imposed upon said company by the foregoing agreement and letter of attorney," duly signed by the Union Trust Company.

5. An indenture made by and between the said heirs of Samuel Blodgett, deceased, and William F. Boogher, as parties of the first part, and Lorin Blodgett, trustee, and Robert Morrison, trustee, parties of the second part, and John J. Johnson (plaintiff in this suit), party of the third part. This deed recites first the agreement between the heirs and Lorin Blodgett of June 27, 1878, and then says:

"Whereas, it is the desire of the said parties of the first part, as well as the parties of the second part, to make said deed, agreement, and trust to the said Lorin Blodgett operative and effectual to the fullest extent for the purpose therein specified and intended, and to which the said deed, agreement, and trust to said Blodgett is made a part thereof."

Among other recitals occur the following:

"Whereas by a certain trust deed, bearing date in the 29th day of May, 1884, made by the next of kin and heirs at law of Samuel Blodgett, Jr., and also by Lorin Blodgett, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, for himself and as attorney in fact and trustee for the heirs at law and next of kin of Samuel Blodgett, Jr., deceased, to Robert Morrison of the city of Washington, D. C.; the said parties by said deed conveying for a valuable consideration, to said Robert Morrison, all their rights, titles, and interests whatever, in and to the several tracts of land, lots, and property in said deed described. The land and lots in said deed described, being genetically known as "Jamaica tract" and in the said city of Washington, which said deed is executed, witnessed and acknowledged, and recorded.

"Whereas on the 8th day of February, 1887, William F. Boogher, and the said Robert Morrison, for himself and as trustee for the heirs and estate of Samuel Blodgett, Jr., deceased, entered into a certain agreement with the Union Trust Company, a corporation duly organized under the laws of Pennsylvania, and which said agreement is duly recorded and made a part of this conveyance.

"And whereas, the said Robert Morrison has expressed a wish to retire from the trusteeship aforesaid and to relinquish all estate, rights, and authority whatsoever vested in him by virtue of the said deed of trust, dated the 29th day of May, A. D. 1884, unto any new trustee whom all parties desire shall be placed in his stead.

"And whereas the said John J. Johnson, upon the solicitation of all parties in interest, has consented to accept the said trusteeship, upon the retirement of the said Robert Morrison, and carry out the objects, purposes, and conditions of the trust as hereafter declared and provided.

"And whereas it is agreed by the said Morrison, for himself and also in his capacity as trustee for all the parties named in and covered by each and all of the several deeds of trust, conveyances, instruments, decrees, or other things hereinbefore mentioned, or alluded to, and is by him made a part of the consideration, for this deed of conveyance. And further that he will fully carry out the object and purposes of this deed, and to fully convey all his interest in the deed aforesaid as trustee or otherwise, he, the said Morrison, therefore, joins in the deed and executes the same."

Then, upon "a consideration of the premises and the further sum of $10," the parties of the first and second parts convey to the party of the third part (the plaintiff) all the estate, properties, etc., mentioned in the foregoing instruments, with specifications of the character of the same; the boundaries of the land and the immense number of the squares and lots into which it has been divided.

"In and upon these trusts, nevertheless, that is to say in trust for the sole use, benefit, and behoof of the said parties of the first part and the said parties of the second part as declared in the trust to said Lorin Blodgett of record aforesaid, and upon this further trust from time to time, and at all times to dispose of, convey, acquit, and release the same or any part thereof to such person or persons, to such use and purposes and in such quantities and quality of estate or estates, as in the judgment of the said party of the third part shall seem meet and proper in the best interest of all concerned; and upon this further trust to prosecute, sue for, recover, and collect said estate and claims and every part thereof, and to convert the same into money, keeping an exact account of all his transactions and of all moneys recovered by him, which account shall be open and accessible to the inspection of any and all the parties hereto, their agents or attorneys; and upon this further trust to account for and pay over unto the Union Trust Company or its successors, as per their contract with Lorin Blodgett, trustee, bearing date the 22d day of January, A. D. 1887, and duly recorded in the land records of the District of Columbia, which for greater certainty reference is here had and made a part hereof, all moneys that may or shall come into his hands in the execution of his trust as provided for and intended by the hereinbefore-recited deed, agreement, and trust, as soon as the same is received according to the provisions of the said deed, agreement, and trust, which said moneys shall be immediately distributed and paid by said company to the several parties entitled thereto; the heirs receiving one half of the gross amount undiminished by any cost or charge; and upon this further trust if at any time it should become necessary for the proper management of the estate, or in the event of a vacancy in the trust either by death or otherwise, power is hereby given to the judge holding the equity court for the District of Columbia, upon the application or petition of anyone in interest, the trust company herein named concurring therein, or its successors, to appoint a new trustee and the trustee so appointed is to hold under the same trust and power as his predecessor, and none other, and with the like responsibility.

"And the said parties of the first part, and the said Lorin Blodgett, trustee, aforesaid, for themselves and each of them their and each of their heirs, executors, and administrators, do hereby covenant, promise, and agree to and with the said party of the third part, his successors, and assigns that they the said parties of the second part and their and each of their heirs and assigns shall and will warrant and forever defend the said pieces, parcels, lots, squares and tracts of land, claims, rights, and properties and premises and appurtenances, unto the said party of the third part, his heirs and assigns from and against the claims of all persons claiming or to claim the same or any part thereof, by, from, under, or through them or any of them."

The Union Trust Company also indorsed on said deed its approval of the retirement of Morrison and his relinquishment of the trust to plaintiff.

6. On January 10, 1888, an indenture was made and executed between Lorin Blodgett and William F. Boogher as parties of the first part, and John J. Johnson, trustee, as party of the second part as follows:

"Whereas Julia A. Britton and others, heirs at law of Samuel Blodgett, Junior, late of the city of Philadelphia, aforesaid deceased, by agreement bearing date of 27th day of June, A. D. 1873, and recorded at Washington aforesaid, in liber No. 781, folio 448, of land records, constituted and appointed the said Lorin Blodgett their attorney in fact for the prosecution, recovery, and collection of their claims as heirs at law of the said Samuel Blodgett, Jr., deceased, as aforesaid, and did contract and agree that he the said Lorin Blodgett, should be entitled to and have the one half of all the proceeds of all property real and personal, which he, the said Lorin Blodgett, should recover under said agreement. And whereas, the said Lorin Blodgett afterwards made and entered into an agreement with the said William F. Boogher, bearing date on the 23d day of March, A. D. 1882, and recorded at Washington aforesaid in liber No. 1057, folio 453, and in liber No. 1230, folio 153, whereby he contracted and agreed in consideration of the services contemplated by said agreement to be rendered by the said William F. Boogher, in and about the recovery of said claims to pay to him the said William F. Boogher, the one fourth of the amount, which might be collected of said claims, being one half part of his, the said Lorin Blodgett's, half of such collection or collections.

"And whereas, the said heirs at law and parties in interest in the said estate of Samuel Blodgett, Junior, deceased, did by indenture bearing date the 29th day of May, A. D. 1894, duly recorded at Washington aforesaid, in liber No. 1147, folio 295, of land records, grant and convey unto Robert Morrison of the said city of Washington his heirs and assigns all their and each of their right, title, and interest of, in, and to the said estate, real and personal, as therein recited in trust for the purpose of the recovery and collection thereof as therein stated.

"And whereas the said heirs at law and parties in interest in said estate together with the said Robert Morrison, trustee, as aforesaid, afterwards by indenture bearing date the 10th day of June, A. D. 1887, and intended to be forthwith duly recorded at Washington aforesaid, did grant and convey all their said right, title, and interest of, in, and to said estate of the said Samuel Blodgett, Junior, deceased, unto the said John J. Johnson, as trustee, to succeed the said Robert Morrison in said trust as by reference to said indenture will more fully and at large appear.

"And whereas, the said Lorin Blodgett, and William F. Boogher, have executed and issued under even date herewith 240 certificates to represent their joint one half interest in the said estate, real and personal, of the said Samuel Blodgett, Junior, deceased, at an estimated total value of $240,000, for said one-half interest, each certificate being of the par or face value of $1,000, and said certificates being numbered from 1 to 240, both inclusive respectively, and each certificate being in the following form countersigned by the said John J. Johnson, trustee, to wit:

"The payment of which certificates according to their pro rata share in the said one half of the estate, real and personal, of the said Samuel Blodgett, Junior, deceased, is intended to be hereby secured.

"Now this indenture witnesseth, that the said parties, of the first part, in consideration of the premises and of the sum of $1, lawful money of the United States, unto them in hand well and truly paid by the said party of the second part, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, have granted, bargained, sold, conveyed, assigned, transferred, and set over unto him, the said party of the second part, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, all their and each of their right, title, interest, property, claim, and demand, of, in, and to the said estate, real and personal of the said Samuel Blodgett, Junior, deceased, being the one equal moiety or half part thereof as aforesaid, to hold the same to the said party of the second part, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, to and for the only proper use, benefit, and behoof of the said party of the second part, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns forever, in trust nevertheless for the uses and upon the following trusts and conditions, that is to say:

"First. For the uses and purposes set forth in the said deed of conveyance made by the said parties in interest as aforesaid, to the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns bearing date the 10th day of June, 1887, as aforesaid, and

"Second. To hold, distribute, divide, and pay over, or cause to be paid over, the said one half part of said estate, real and personal, and the proceeds thereof from time to time, to and among the respective owners of said 240 certificates pro rata and according to their respective holdings, each share or certificate as aforesaid, representing a one equal 240th part of such divisions and payments.

"And the said party of the second part, for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, does hereby covenant and agree that he will faithfully carry out the provisions of this trust, and pay over, or cause to be paid over, said proceeds of said estate, real and personal, from time to time to the holders for the time being of said 240 certificates according to their respective holdings as aforesaid."

7. September 6, 1888, Lorin Blodgett, Boogher, and Johnson, trustee, entered into another agreement reciting that the terms of the foregoing instrument do not in one respect express the true intention of the parties, and that this is made to correct it. It expressly provides that the $240,000 of certificates shall not be a lien on any of the real estate, but only on the proceeds to be paid to the Union Trust Company for distribution by it to the holders of said certificates. Johnson covenants to pay over all proceeds of sales, settlements, and recoveries to the said trust company. The instrument also provides that "In all other respects the said agreement is reaffirmed"—the reference is to the next preceding one—and that the heirs are to receive "one half of the gross amounts undiminished by any costs or charges."

The plaintiff's deed and accompanying papers having been excluded, he declined to take a nonsuit, and the jury found for the defendant. Motion for new trial was overruled, and judgment entered upon the verdict, from which this appeal has been formally prosecuted.

1. The first question to be considered is: Do the recitals of the deed, contracts, and trusts which make up plaintiff's claim of title, show forth the existence of champerty? "Champerty is the unlawful maintenance of a suit in consideration of some bargain to have a part of the thing in dispute." 1 Hawk. P. C. 545; Co. Litt. 368. It has also been defined to be "a bargain to divide the land or thing in dispute on condition of his carrying it on at his own expense." Stanley v. Jones, 7 Bing. 869. These definitions have been very generally approved. Roberts v. Cooper, 20 How. 467, 15 L. ed. 969; Brown v. Beauchamp, 5 T. B. Mon. 415, 17 Am. Dec. 81.

The offenses of maintenance and champerty, and the doctrine of the invalidity of contracts on account thereof, did not have their origin solely in the statutes of Edward I. and III. which provided special penalties therefor. Lord Ellenborough is authority for saying that maintenance was always considered malum in se. Wallis v. Portland, 8 Ves. Jr. 494. See also Brown v. Beauchamp, 5 T. B. Mon. 415, 17 Am. Dec. 81, cited 2 Inst. 208-212. And it has generally been held that these statutes were declaratory only of the common law. Pechell v. Watson, 8 Mees. & W. 691; 4 Bl. Com. 135; Thurston v. Percival, 1 Pick. 415; Backus v. Byron, 4 Mich. 535; Arden v. Patterson, 5 Johns. Ch. 44; Boardman v. Thompson, 25 Iowa, 487; Thompson v. Reynolds, 73 Ill. 11; Gilbert v. Holmes, 64 Ill. 548; Barker v. Barker, 14 Wis. 142; Wenky v. Hall, 13 Ohio, 167, 42 Am. Dec. 194; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 148.

The same may be said of the statute of 32 Hen. VIII., prohibiting conveyances and agreements with respect to the lands between parties neither of whom have had possession for a limited period, and providing severe penalties therefor, in a further effort to correct the evils of maintenance and champerty. Lord Chancellor Eldon declared this to be the object and effect of that act in his advisory opinion to the House of Lords in the famous case of Cholmondeley v. Clinton, 4 Bligh, 1, in the course of which he quoted with approval this passage from a case reported in 1 Plowd. 88 [Partridge v. Strange]: "This statute was made in affirmance of the common law and not in alteration of it, and all that the statute has done is, it has added a greater penalty to that which was contrary to the common law."

We are of opinion that the contracts and combinations exposed in the recitals of the instruments under consideration are not only clearly within the provisions of those old statutes, but also as clearly within the policy of the older common law, to which they only added sanction with increasing penalties.

The original contractor with the heirs, Lorin Blodgett, whose contract is retained and carefully guarded throughout the whole chain of instruments, not only undertook to secure a one-half interest in the things to be recovered by suit, but also covenanted to institute the necessary suits and to maintain them diligently entirely at his own cost and expense. He then brought in others to assist in his scheme, and later on organized a trust or syndicate or lottery (whichever it may appropriately be called), the sole asset of which consists of his prospective share of the results of the proposed litigation, capitalized in the sum of $240,000, and represented by certificates of the face value of $1,000 each, which are to be issued and disposed of to raise funds for the prosecution. The original contract necessarily implied the institution of the suits in the names of the contracting heirs at law of Samuel Blodgett. But to facilitate the institution and conduct of suits and the management of the business generally, and, no doubt, to guard the interests of each and every one of the shareholders, as well as to provide a speedy, inexpensive, and thorough mode of conversion and distribution of all recoveries, the conveyance to the common trustee was devised. Thus a permanent executive officer was created, to whom all titles were passed, and in whose name all proceedings are to be taken; a permanent and responsible treasurer—the Union Trust Company—was provided for to hold and disburse the moneys received. The corporation idea was completely developed. Lorin Blodgett and the contracting heirs may die or part with their remaining interests, certificate holders may die or assign, but the trust will go on unchanged and unending until the last claim of the estate of Samuel Blodgett shall be reduced, converted into cash, and distributed.

It may now be considered to what extent, if any, the statutes of Edward I. and III. and of 32 Hen. VIII. and the policy of the common law against champerty and maintenance may prevail in this jurisdiction. It may be admitted that all of these statutes became obsolete in Maryland before the cession of the District of Columbia; they certainly had become so later, as was held in Schaferman v. O'Brien, 28 Md. 565, 92 Am. Dec. 708, decided in 1868. That case has been followed by us in one where the naked question was presented whether a deed made by one out of possession, both actual and constructive, is void by reason of the prohibition of the statute of 32 Hen. VIII. Mattheus v. Henner, 2 App. D. C. 349. But Mr. Justice Morris, who delivered the opinion of the court, was careful to limit the decision to the question as presented, and in doing so he took occasion to say: "We do not desire to be understood, however, as holding that champerty and maintenance are no longer reprehensible or criminal under our laws, or, as was intimated in the case of Schaferman v. O'Brien, 28 Md. 565, 92 Am. Dec. 708, that there may not be cases where the purpose of the parties to stir up litigation is so plain that their acts should be regarded as void."

In Stanton v. Haskin, 1 MacArth. 559, 29 Am. Rep. 612, decided in 1874, the general term of the supreme court of the District refused specific performance of a contract between attorney and client for a one third interest in land to be (and which was) recovered in litigation maintained in accordance therewith. The court also expressed the opinion that "with some other modifications, the common law with regard to champerty, which is supposed to be founded on the statute of 28 Edw. I., is generally recognized." This seems to be the only case in which the question has ever been discussed or alluded to in the courts of this District.

It must be admitted, though not to the extent claimed on behalf of appellant, that the conditions prevailing in our country and in our times are so different from those existing in the days when the doctrine of champerty had its origin and was rigidly enforced, that the chief reasons for the existence of the rule have passed away entirely, whilst others have lost or largely spent their force. Modifications and exceptions to the rule were early recognized in England, and have grown and increased there, and generally in greater degree, in this country. Acts of assistance and upholding of litigation were gradually recognized as justifiable when prompted solely by charity to the poor and unfortunate who might else be unable to right a wrong; by the ties and obligations of consanguinity, affinity, or common interest; by the relations of landlord and tenant, master and servant, neighbor and neighbor, and attorney and client. The recognized relations of attorney and client have resulted in the complete recognition of the legality of contingent fees. Wylie v. Cox, 15 How. 415, 14 L. ed. 753; Wright v. Tebbitts, 91 U. S. 252, 23 L. ed. 320; Stanton v. Embrey, 93 U. S. 548, 23 L. ed. 983; Taylor v. Bemiss, 110 U. S. 42, 28 L. ed. 64. We have heard of no case, however, where such contracts have been enforced when they contained a covenant by the attorney to prosecute the cause at his own cost. In the foregoing cases no such covenant appeared, and in no one of them was proof made that they were obtained unfairly or an undue advantage taken of the relation of attorney and client. Notwithstanding the changed conditions that have begotten certain changes in public policy, we (as intimated above) cannot admit that all the reasons which formerly operated against the recognition and toleration of champertous contracts have ceased to exist.

Unnecessary and speculative litigation, the promotion of inexcusable strife, the vexation of landholders, and the laying of embargoes on the free alienation of their holders, are as pernicious now as they ever were, and as needful of redress. Contracts which tend to promote these evils are as much opposed to sound public policy as they ever were, and therefore ought not to be enforced. The distinction between contracts in aid of litigation which ought to be enforced, and those which ought not, is well drawn in the case of Brown v. Bigne, 21 Or. 260, 14 L. R. A. 745. This was a suit on a contract made between Bigne who was engaged in a necessary and meritorious suit, and had no means with which to further prosecute it, and Brown who furnished the necessary funds upon Bigne's agreement to give him one half of the proceeds. The court found that the contract was fairly and freely made, and had been performed by Brown in good faith, and upheld it as untainted by champerty, but at the same time said: "When such contracts are made for the purpose of stirring up strife and litigation, harassing others, inducing suits to be begun which otherwise would not be commenced, or for speculation, they come within the analogy and principles of that doctrine, and should not be enforced." There is a clear analogy between contracts of this nature, and those for the purchase of a naked right to bring an action at law or in equity, which have generally, if not universally, been held void, as against public policy. In the case of De Hoghton v. Money, L. R. 2 Ch. 164, it was held that "such a transaction, if not in strictness amounting to maintenance, savors of it too much for this court to give its aid to enforce the agreement." Traer v. Clews, 115 U. S. 528, 29 L. ed. 467. In this case the court drew the distinction clearly between the assignment of the mere right to file a bill in equity for a fraud that had been committed, which it was declared would be void "as contrary to public policy and savoring of maintenance," and the conveyance of the property itself where "the fact that the grantee may be compelled to bring a suit to enforce his right to the property, does not render his conveyance void."

We would not pursue this discussion further on this line, but for the earnest contention of the appellants that in the absence of an express statute these contracts, or the cause of action based thereon, if really involved, cannot be affected or refused enforcement on grounds of public policy alone. The grounds of this contention are without merit. As we have seen above, champerty was regarded as an offense at common law before the statutes were adopted, and as a thing malum in se. From the earliest times courts have declared contracts void because opposed to public policy. Why should there be exceptions to the rule? "All contracts or agreements which have for their object anything which is repugnant to justice, or against the general policy of the common law, or contrary to the provisions of any statute, are void, and whenever a contract or agreement is entered into with a view to contravene any of those general principles, there is no form of words, however artfully introduced or omitted, which can prevent courts of law and equity from investigating the truth of the transaction; for ex turpi contractu non oritur actio is a rule both in law and equity. Comyn, Contr. p. 30. See Boardman v. Thompson, 25 Iowa, 487; Kennett v. Chambers, 14 How. 38, 14 L. ed. 316." This last case was a suit to enforce a contract for the sale of lands in Texas between Chambers, the owner, who was an officer in the service of the Republic of Texas, and complainants who were citizens of Ohio. The moneys advanced on the contract were to be used in aid of the war for Texan independence. The contract was made and the money paid in Ohio before the independence of Texas was recognized by the government of the United States. The bill was filed in the United States circuit court for the district of Texas some years after the admission of that state into the Union, which dismissed it, and that decree was affirmed on appeal therefrom. The decision was not made to rest upon any statute or treaty of the United States. As said by Chief Justice Taney: "The decision stands on broader and firmer ground, and this agreement cannot be sustained either at law or in equity. The question is not whether the parties to this contract violated the neutrality laws of the United States or subjected themselves to a criminal prosecution, but whether such a contract, made at that time, within the United States, for the purposes stated in the contract and the bill of complaint, was a legal and valid contract and such as to entitle either party to the aid of the courts 41 L. R. A.

of justice of the United States to enforce its execution." See also Oscanyan v. Winchester Repeating Arms Co. 103 U. S. 261, 26 L. ed. 539; Irwin v. Williar, 110 U. S. 499, 28 L. ed. 225.

If this suit were for the express purpose of testing the validity of these contracts and obligations, there could be no doubt of the result. In England the rule denying the enforcement of such contracts has been uniformly adhered to. In Powell v. Knowler, 2 Atk. 224, decided in 1741, enforcement was denied a contract which the court said was evidently artfully drawn to keep it out of the statutes of champerty. In Wood v. Downes, 18 Ves. Jr. 120, a contract with an attorney was set aside on a bill for that purpose. In his opinion therein, Lord Eldon quoted with express approval a declaration of Lord Northington in Strachan v. Brander, 1 Eden, 303, to this effect: "The transaction [by which a fund had been raised to carry on legislation] though not strictly champerty, was so near it that it could not be permitted to prevail; it savors of champerty, and is therefore dangerous to public justice." See also Stevens v. Bagwell, 15 Ves. Jr. 139; De Hoghton v. Money, L. R. 2 Ch. 164; Ram Coomar Coondoo v. Chunder Canto Mookerjee, L. R. 2 App. Cas. 186. This last case was an action for damages and costs incurred in a suit vexatiously carried on against plaintiff through a contract between defendant and another, and came before the house of lords on appeal from India. It was held that the law against maintenance and champerty did not prevail in India wherefore fair agreements to furnish funds to carry on litigation in consideration of a share of the property are not per se void. But it was said in connection therewith (p. 209): "It seems clear . . . that contracts of this character ought, under certain circumstances, to be held invalid, as being against public policy." Stanton v. Hoskin, 1 MacArth. 559, 29 Am. Rep. 612, and some other American cases have been heretofore cited, and others will be referred to later.

Without undertaking to define limits or specify all exceptions that may be recognized, we hold that a purely champertous contract, or one which savors as strongly of champerty and public mischief as the one under consideration, is against sound public policy, and ought not to be enforced in the District of Columbia. Contracts for the prosecution of harassing litigation, which would not otherwise be instituted, and upon speculation in a spirit of gambling, shares in which may be thrown upon the market to be disposed of to chance buyers, like tickets in a lottery, ought to receive the condemnation of the courts of this District when brought to their attention in a proper manner. To encourage the formation of syndicates or trusts for the purpose of maintaining litigation like this—for this is but one of a series that may be instituted at any time for the recovery of lots throughout the boundaries of the old "Jamaica" tract of 494 acres—could have none but a mischievous effect. Once legalize them or give them the slightest approval, and in these times of feverish speculation and marked propensity for gambling enterprises which promise great returns for small investments, we may, not unreasonably, expect to see similar joint-stock associations formed for the express purpose of maintaining lawsuits throughout the land, thereby vexing the people, crippling their enterprises, interfering with the growth and development of country and cities, and producing other and great mischiefs.

It does not follow, however, that every champertous contract, incidentally connected with the title or thing in controversy, can be brought within the grasp of the court therein. There may be other distinct and controlling considerations. It is now generally held that where a party has a right or title he cannot be debarred from its prosecution by reason of an incidental contract concerning the same which may be unlawful or against public policy, because this would be equivalent to a forfeiture of title. The practical effect would be to deplete the title of the true owner and vest it in his disseisor. Brumley v. Whiting, 5 Pick. 342; Robison v. Beall, 26 Ga. 17; Allison v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 42 Iowa, 214; McMullen v. Guest, 6 Tex. 275; Hilton v. Woods, L. R. 4 Eq. 432. It is true that a contrary rule prevails in some states (Barker v. Barker, 14 Wis. 142; Allard v. Lamirande, 29 Wis. 502; Cardwell v. Spriggs, 7 Dana, 36; Harman v. Brewster, 7 Bush. 355); but the question may be regarded as firmly settled as far as we are concerned by the Supreme Court of the United States. Boone v. Childs, 10 Pet. 177, 9 L. ed. 388; Burnes v. Scott, 117 U. S. 582, 29 L. ed. 901.

The difficulty in this case is that it does not present that aspect entirely. The suit is not by and in the names of the heirs of Samuel Blodgett. If this were the case we would be constrained to hold that collateral contracts, though tainted with champerty, could not be brought to the attention of the court by plea or otherwise, so as to bar the right of action.

It becomes necessary now to notice the contention of appellant, that, granting the existence of champerty, the deed to Johnson is good as a conveyance by the heirs of the legal title, notwithstanding all other provisions thereof may be rejected. The proposition is that "when there are several stipulations in a particular agreement, and one is illegal, it does not defeat the others when they are divisible, and the consideration as a whole is not illegal." Without pausing to affirm or deny the soundness of this proposition, quoted from Wharton on Contracts, we deny its application to papers offered in evidence, in this case. The stipulations and provisions of these contracts are not divisible; they are and were clearly meant to be inseparable. The "consideration as a whole" is illegal. It is the maintenance of this and other contemplated suits for the benefit of all, but at the expense and through the efforts exclusively of Lorin Blodgett and his assignees. The recited additional consideration of "ten dollars" is purely nominal, and cannot be regarded as a consideration to support the contract or deed separated from the real and main one. It was not intended to confer a shadow of title upon the grantee save for the purposes of the trust. These are the moving considerations, and it is in their conditions that the illegality lies. They cover in their recitals each and every instrument or contract in the series. They cannot be rejected without destroying the whole scheme, and every purpose of the conveyance, and vesting in Johnson a title which it cannot be pretended was within the contemplation of anyone who executed it or is interested in its operation. The deed must therefore be taken as a whole and in connection with each instrument referred to and made a part of it. The heirs of Samuel Blodgett have mingled and bound up their claim, if a just one, with the interests of Lorin Blodgett and the certificate holders in the champertous trust organized by him. These rights and interests are inseparable in the action as brought. The trustee's recovery inures to the benefit of all alike. If we hold them barred out of their right to recover in this action the heirs of Samuel Blodgett have themselves alone to blame. It may be added also that dismissing this action will not bar any action they may see proper to maintain when they shall have withdrawn from the illegal contract with Lorin Blodgett and his associates. If they suffer it will be the consequence of mingling a just and legal claim with a bad one so that they cannot be separated. This would be in strict accord with the doctrine of Trist v. Child, 21 Wall. 441, 22 L. ed. 623, where a suit was brought upon a claim for legal services mingled with "lobby" services in prosecuting a claim before Congress. In denying a recovery Mr. Justice Swayne said: "We have said that for professional services in this connection a just compensation may be recovered. But where they are blended and confused with those which are forbidden, the whole is a unit and indivisible." That which is bad destroys that which is good, and they perish together."

This suit cannot be maintained without we give our approval to the unlawful contracts which enter into and form a part of the plaintiff's claim of title. These are not collateral matters sought to be forced on our attention by plea or motion or affidavit; they inhere in the title itself, and must be given effect if plaintiff be permitted to recover thereon. While the point is not without grave and serious difficulty in the absence of direct and binding authority, we nevertheless think that upon principle it should be resolved against the appellants, and this conclusion has support in decisions of courts of high authority made in cases which are analogous. Hilton v. Woods, L. R. 4 Eq. 432; Elborough v. Ayres, L. R. 10 Eq. 367; Harrington v. Long, 2 Myl. & K. 590; Bayly v. Tyrrell, 2 Ball & B. 353; Chalmers v. Clinton, 4 Bligh, 1; Saylor v. Stewart, 3 Heisk. 510.

In Hilton v. Woods the plaintiff enjoined defendant from mining coal in land belonging to him, and asked for an account for that which had been before taken out. Plaintiff had been in ignorance of his rights in the premises until informed by a solicitor named Wright. He made a contract with Wright by which the latter guaranteed plaintiff against all costs, and in consideration was to share the proceeds of the recovery. The champertous contract was brought to the attention of the court by affidavit. The vice chancellor held that the champertous contract could not be introduced for the purpose of depriving plaintiff of his action, but said: "I have carefully examined all the authorities which were referred to in support of this argument, and they clearly establish that whenever the right of the plaintiff in respect of which he sues, is derived under a title founded on champerty and maintenance, his suit will on that account necessarily fail. But no authority was cited, nor have I met with any, which goes the length of deciding that where a plaintiff has an original and good title to property he becomes disqualified to sue for it by having entered into an improper bargain with his solicitor as to the mode of remunerating him for his professional services in the suit or otherwise. It is clear that the bargain between plaintiff and Mr. Wright amounted to maintenance, and if the latter had been the plaintiff suing by virtue of a title derived under that contract, it would have been my duty to dismiss his bill." As it was, however, costs were denied plaintiff, because as under the contract they were payable by Wright, recovery thereof would inure to his benefit.

Elborough v. Ayres is not itself in point, but in the opinion, James, V. C., relates a case tried before V. C. Willes, of Etans v. Prothero (not reported), in which the plaintiff suing upon a title acquired through champerty had been turned out of court. In Harrington v. Long, 2 Myl. & K. 590, one Milligan had obtained a decree on a bill filed as a creditor of Long, the deceased testator. A supplemental bill was filed by Harrington and the original plaintiff, Milligan, against Sarah Long, executrix, alleging that she had proved the will of testator since said decree, and asking to set aside a certain deed made to her by the testator five days before his death when in a state of mental incapacity, as fraudulent and void as to creditors. The bill alleges that Milligan after proving his debt before the master, under the decree, had assigned the same to Harrington, with whom he joined as co-plaintiff in the supplemental proceeding. The master of the rolls (Sir John Leach) held that the mere assignment of the debt was not maintenance; but upon inspection of the contract between the parties and discovery that the assignee had given the assignor an indemnity against all costs, for the purpose of prosecuting the suit, he dismissed the bill for the champerty. This decree was affirmed by the Lord Chancellor.

Bayly v. Tyrrell is a case of this kind. Joseph Tyrrell was the owner of an interest in land, the possession of which was withheld from him by his brother William for a claim charged thereon in his favor in partition proceedings, but under no claim of adverse title. In 1790 Joseph executed a lease of the premises to Bayly, who was an attorney. In 1791 he filed a bill against William praying a decree for possession, and, becoming embarrassed, he agreed with Bayly for a material abatement in the rent in consideration of the latter's advance of £50 to bring the case to a hearing. Joseph died pending the suit, and his heir at law refused to continue it. Bayly then filed his bill to recover possession, and for an account for rent from the commencement of his lease. Because the transaction was against public policy the bill was dismissed without prejudice to his right to sue at law for the non-performance of the agreement.

The case of Cholmondeley v. Clinton was very much argued and finally concluded in the House of Lords. The two plaintiffs, Lord Cholmondeley and Mrs. Dames, joined in the bill, though their claims were adverse to each other, for one claimed the whole as heir at law of Horatio, Earl of Oxford, while the other claimed the whole as devisee of the same. The bill contained this recital: "Some questions had arisen between them [plaintiffs] respecting the will and codicil of Horatio, Earl of Oxford, so far as regards the equity of redemption of the said mortgaged hereditaments, and that in order to put an end to such questions, they had agreed to share the same between them." Lord Eldon said: "This agreement was one that a court could not overlook even if the parties so wished." In his opinion to the Lords, Lord Redesdale denounced the agreement, and referring to the inconsistency of the claims of the plaintiffs, said: "To avoid that inconsistency, they state this agreement, which is contrary to law, and which you are bound to destroy." 4 Bligh, 123, 124. Saylor v. Stewart is a case directly in point, though it is evidently based upon a statute of Tennessee, relating to maintenance and champerty, which is not recited in the report of the case. It would not seem, however, to affect the principle. The action to recover land was brought in both the names of the grantor and grantee in a champertous deed. The court said that had the grantor brought the suit alone, or had there been a separate count for recovery in his name alone, the champertous deed to his grantor, being void therefor, could not have been relied on to defeat his recovery. "But seeking in a single count to recover in the joint names of the grantor and grantee, the champertous contract made by one of the parties affects the interest of both, and is fatal to the whole suit."

We are not unmindful of the injury which may be suffered by the heirs of Samuel Blodgett through our judgment, if indeed they have a good title to their lands, which may be affected only by adverse possession. But the injury is the result of their own deliberate conduct. Public policy looks beyond and far higher than the mere interests or inconvenience of parties.

It follows that the judgment must be affirmed; and it is so ordered, with costs to the appellee.

STATE of South Dakota

v.

Joseph THORNTON, Plff. in Err.

(.....S. D.....)

1. Reference by the court to the "crime charged" in its instructions will not be regarded as having misled the jury from the fact that a witness incidentally stated that accused had been arrested upon another charge than that for which he was on trial.
2. The use by the court of the expression "where the state makes out such a case as would sustain a verdict of guilty" will not justify an understanding by the jury that guilt may be found upon a preponderance of evidence, if they are expressly told that to convict they must be satisfied of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

3. The burden of proving an alibi is upon defendant after the state has made out a prima facie case, to the extent, at least of raising a reasonable doubt of guilt.

(Fuller, J., dissents.)

(December 8, 1897.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Miner County to review a judgment convicting defendant of burglary. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr A. E. Chamberlain for plaintiff in error.

Mr. L. J. Martin, for defendant in error:
An alibi is an affirmative or extrinsic de-

NOTE.—Burden and measure of proof of an alibi.

- I. Proof by defendant beyond a reasonable doubt.
- II. Proof by defendant by a preponderance of evidence.
 - a. General rules.
 - b. As affected by reasonable doubt on whole case.
- III. Proof by defendant to raise a reasonable doubt.
- IV. Proof by prosecution beyond a reasonable doubt.
 - a. General rule as to burden of proof.
 - b. Measure of proof.
 - c. Consideration of all the evidence.
 - d. How jury should be instructed.
- V. Time covered by proof.
- I. Proof by defendant beyond a reasonable doubt.

The question as to who is called upon to assume the burden of proof in a criminal prosecution in which an alibi is sought to be established, as well as with reference to the measure of proof by which it is to be established or disestablished, has given rise to a great contrariety of opinion. But while it has been frequently claimed that the accused should be required to establish his alibi by the same measure of proof as that by which the prosecution is required to show guilt, it has been uniformly held, whenever the question has arisen, that the accused need not prove an alibi beyond a reasonable doubt.

This was held in People v. Fong Ah Sing, 64 Cal. 253; Miles v. State, 93 Ga. 117; Harrison v. State, 83 Ga. 129; Landis v. State, 70 Ga. 652, 48 Am. Rep. 588; Ackerson v. People, 124 Ill. 563; Mullins v. People, 110 Ill. 42; State v. Fry, 67 Iowa, 478; State v. Reed, 62 Iowa, 40; State v. Kline, 54 Iowa, 183; State v. Fenlason, 78 Me. 495; People v. Stone, 117 N. Y. 480; State v. Watson, 7 S. C. 63; Chappel v. State, 7 Coldw. 92; Gallaher v. State, 28 Tex. App. 247; State v. Ward, 61 Vt. 163.

And an instruction that the proof necessary to establish an alibi must produce as much certainty as would be required of the state to establish guilt, is erroneous. Chappel v. State, 7 Coldw. 92.

To establish an alibi the jury need not be fully satisfied of its truth. State v. Henry, 48 Iowa, 403.

But an instruction in a criminal prosecution that proof of an alibi must be clear and convincing, and must satisfy the jury by a preponderance of the evidence that the accused was at the time of the killing at the place where the killing is said to have occurred, is not objectionable because of the use of the words "clear" and "convincing,"—especially where the jury were told in that connection, as well as in other portions of the charge, that it was not necessary that the alibi should be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. State v. Jackson, 38 S. C. 487.

- II. Proof by defendant by a preponderance of evidence.

a. General rules.

The doctrine has been adopted to some extent that a plea of alibi in a prosecution for crime is an extrinsic defense not arising out of the res gesta. People v. Lee Sare Bo, 72 Cal. 622; State v. Krewsen, 57 Iowa, 588; State v. Ward, 61 Vt. 163.

Under this theory the burden of proof of an alibi is held to rest with the defendant. Pate v. State, 94 Ala. 14; Pellum v. State, 89 Ala. 28; People v. Lee Sare Bo, 72 Cal. 623; Harrison v. State, 83 Ga. 129; Garrity v. People, 107 Ill. 162; State v. Bensley, 84 Iowa, 83; State v. Maher, 74 Iowa, 77; State v. Rowland, 72 Iowa, 327; State v. Rivers, 68 Iowa, 611; State v. Hamilton, 57 Iowa, 596; State v. Krewsen, 57 Iowa, 588; State v. Red, 53 Iowa, 69; Trujillo v. Territory, 7 N. M. 43; Walker v. State, 37 Tex. 367.

And it must be proved by a preponderance of the evidence. People v. Lee Sare Bo, 72 Cal. 623; State v. Hamilton, 57 Iowa, 596; State v. Rowland, 72 Iowa, 327; State v. Red, 53 Iowa, 69; State v. Reed, 62 Iowa, 40; State v. Kline, 54 Iowa, 183.

Or, as it is put in some cases, to the reasonable satisfaction of the jury. Pate v. State, 94 Ala. 14; Harrison v. State, 83 Ga. 129; Miles v. State, 93 Ga. 117; Trujillo v. Territory, 7 N. M. 43; Walker v. State, 37 Tex. 367.

Or, it must be clearly and satisfactorily established before it can avail, where the evidence otherwise makes out a clear case against the accused. Garrity v. People, 107 Ill. 162.

The defense of alibi in a criminal prosecution rests upon extraneous facts not arising out of the res gesta, and the onus of proving it rests with the respondent who alleges it, and it must be established, not beyond a reasonable doubt, but by evidence which preponderates or outweighs that of the state. State v. Ward, 61 Vt. 163; State v. Krewsen, 57 Iowa, 588; Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 324, 52 Am. Dec. 711.

If the evidence in a criminal prosecution introduced on the part of the state, taken alone, fense. By it the defendant seeks to prove matters which make it utterly impossible that the crime could have been committed by him.

Perry v. Dubuque S. W. R. Co. 36 Iowa, 106; Schloss v. His Creditors, 81 Cal. 208; Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 1824.

There is a long line of cases, commencing with the instructions of Chief Justice Shaw in Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 324, 52 Am. Dec. 711, where the jury are instructed to look with suspicion upon the defense of an alibi, as a defense which is often attempted by contrivance, subornation, and perjury.

Then there is a line of cases which hold that an instruction as follows is correct, to wit: Where defendant sets up an alibi, the burden of proof is upon him to establish that defense by a preponderance of the evidence.

Under the instructions in this case the defendant was not required to introduce evidence which overbalanced the evidence introduced by the state; it was sufficient if he introduced evidence which was equal to that introduced by the state, or if he introduced evidence which raised a reasonable doubt in the minds of the jury as to his guilt.

A verdict of guilty can never be sustained unless there is sufficient evidence introduced by the state to satisfy the jury beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant.

Ackerson v. People, 124 Ill. 563.

Corson, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was tried upon an information, and convicted of the crime of burglary, in the circuit court of Miner county. A writ of error was sued out of this court to that court, and the case is now before us for review. Only three errors assigned need be con-is sufficient to establish the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, it is then incumbent on the defendant to establish an alibi or other defense which may be done by a preponderance of the evidence. State v. Hemrick, 62 Iowa, 414.

A preponderance of the evidence is the lowest degree of proof upon which the issues of fact are determined, and the defendant in a criminal prosecution must therefore prove a defense of alibi by a preponderance of the evidence, even as the basis of a reasonable doubt. State v. Beasley, 84 Iowa, 83.

And a charge in a criminal prosecution, asserting the proposition that the defendant was not required to establish the defense of an alibi to the reasonable satisfaction of the jury, is erroneous, and properly refused. Holley v. State, 105 Ala. 100.

By a preponderance of evidence by which the defendant in a criminal prosecution may establish an alibi is meant, not a greater number of witnesses, but the greater weight of the testimony; and if the circumstances in evidence, taken together, in the judgment of the jury outweigh the testimony of any number of witnesses, they will be authorized to render their verdict accordingly. State v. Kline, 54 Iowa, 183.

And a verdict in a criminal prosecution in which an alibi was sought to be established will not be disturbed on appeal unless it is against the clear weight of the evidence. State v. Beasley, 84 Iowa, 83.

An alibi established by a preponderance of the evidence, however, entitles the accused to an acquittal, and an instruction proceeding upon the theory that an alibi would be a fact to be considered in connection with other facts and circumstances is erroneous as calculated to confuse and mislead. State v. McCracken, 66 Iowa, 569.

And an instruction in a criminal prosecution that the burden of proof rests with the defendant to establish an alibi, and that it must be done to the satisfaction of the jury, is erroneous as requiring too high a degree of proof, reasonable satisfaction being sufficient. Prince v. State, 100 Ala. 144.

To establish an alibi in a criminal prosecution a bare preponderance of the evidence is sufficient, and an instruction that the accused must fully satisfy the jury by a preponderance of the evidence is erroneous. State v. Hardin, 46 Iowa, 623, 26 Am. Rep. 174.

In that case Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 324, 52 Am. Dec. 711, infra, was distinguished upon the ground that the alibi sought to be established in that case was of the person alleged to have been killed, and not of the prisoner.

But an instruction in a criminal prosecution that the defense of an alibi must be established by the accused by a fair preponderance of the evidence to warrant an acquittal is not rendered erroneous by the use of the qualifying word "fair." State v. Johnson, 72 Iowa, 393.

And an instruction that it is the duty of the defendant in proving an alibi to reasonably satisfy the jury that he was elsewhere at the time of the commission of the offense is not subject to objection, on appeal, that the statement tended to mislead the jury in that they might not understand that the words "it is the duty of the defendant," etc., merely impose on him the onus probandi on the issue, where he failed to ask for an explanatory instruction in the court below. Pellum v. State, 89 Ala. 23.

And objection that the court should have instructed the jury that, as the defendant relied upon an alibi, he should establish it by a preponderance of the evidence, cannot be taken by the defendant, where there was nothing in the instructions directing the attention of the jury to the alibi except the general direction that they should consider all the facts in the case in determining the guilt or innocence of the defendant, as the omission so to instruct was favorable, rather than prejudicial, to him. State v. Sutton, 70 Iowa, 268.

So, evidence in a prosecution for murder that the person alleged to have been killed was seen elsewhere after the time he was supposed to have been killed, is similar to a case of alibi, in that it proposes to prove a fact which is repugnant to and inconsistent with the facts constituting the evidence on the other side, so as to control the conclusion, or, at least, render it doubtful, and thus lay a ground for an acquittal; and such evidence is material; and such fact must be made out by satisfactory proof. Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 324, 52 Am. Dec. 711.

And the burden of proof in a prosecution for murder, that the person alleged to have been killed still lives, as well as of an alibi, rests with the accused, and must be sustained by proof sufficient to outweigh the proof tending to establish the contrary hypothesis. State v. Vincent, 24 Iowa, 570, 95 Am. Dec. 753.

And in State v. Cruise, 19 Iowa, 312, the rule of law with reference to an alibi laid down in Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 295, 52 Am. Dec. 711, supra, was approved and adopted.

b. As affected by reasonable doubt on whole case.

The failure of a person accused of crime to sidered. They are, in effect, as follows: (1) The court erred in allowing the state to add to the information the names of witnesses sworn on the part of the state; (2) the court erred in instructing the jury upon the credibility and weight to be given to the evidence of the defendant as a witness in his behalf; (3) that the court erred in instructing the jury as to the question of alibi, upon which defendant introduced evidence.

The question presented by the first assignment of error is ruled by the decision in State v. King, 9 S. D. 628, and need not be further considered.

The question raised by the second assignment of error was substantially disposed of in State v. Smith, 8 S. D. 547. The contention of counsel for the plaintiff in error that the jury might have understood the court, in speaking of the crime charged, as referring to some crime other than that for which he was then being tried, is not tenable. The fact that a witness had incidentally spoken of the defendant as having been arrested upon another charge would hardly be sufficient to warrant us in believing that the jury could have been misled by the charge of the court when speaking of the crime with which the "defendant is charged." We think this court must assume that the jury understood the court as referring to the crime for which defendant was being tried.

prove an alibi does not relieve the prosecution from the duty of proving that he was the perpetrator of the crime. Briceland v. Com. 74 Pa. 463.

And while the burden of proving an alibi in a criminal prosecution rests with the accused, and if he fails to do so to the satisfaction of the jury the alibi as a substantive defense is valueless, an alibi is as much a traverse of the crime charged as any other defense, and the proof tending to establish it, though not clear, may, with other facts of the case, raise a reasonable doubt of his guilt to the benefit of which he is entitled, and therefore it must not be excluded from the cause. Rudy v. Com. 128 Pa. 500; Watson v. Com. 95 Pa. 418; Ledford v. State, 75 Ga. 856; State v. Ward, 61 Vt. 103.

And if, upon the whole evidence, including that in relation to the alibi, there is reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused, he is entitled to an acquittal. State v. Ward, 61 Vt. 103; Ledford v. State, 75 Ga. 856.

A conviction cannot stand where the evidence not only fails to show affirmatively that the accused committed or participated in the crime, but leaves it uncertain by whom it was committed. Ward v. State (Ga.) 28 S. E. 982.

Where a person accused of crime sets up the defense of alibi the burden rests with him to establish it to the satisfaction of the jury; but, though they are not satisfied of the truth of the alibi, they are still required to say whether they are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, from the evidence, that the crime was committed as alleged. State v. Freeman, 100 N. C. 429.

Though the evidence offered to establish an alibi falls short of the weight of moral certainty as to its existence, if it leaves in the minds of the jury such a doubt or uncertainty that, taken by itself, they could not find for or against the alibi, they are bound to carry such doubt into the case of the prosecution, and array it there as an element of the reasonable doubt beyond which the prosecution must establish guilt. People v. Fong Ah Sing, 64 Cal. 253.

While an alibi must be proved to the reasonable satisfaction of the jury, the evidence adduced to support it should be weighed and considered by the jury with the other evidence in the case, and as other facts are weighed and considered; and if, upon the whole evidence, there should be a reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt, he should be acquitted. Pate v. State, 94 Ala. 14; State v. Maher, 74 Iowa, 77.

And before a conviction can be had the jury must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused was there at the time of the commission of the crime. People v. Lee Sare Ro. 72 Cal. 623.

And a charge in a criminal prosecution excluding all the evidence as to an alibi from being weighed by the jury on the subject of reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt on the issue of guilty or not guilty is erroneous. Ledford v. State, 75 Ga. 856.

But whether evidence as to an alibi was sufficient to create a reasonable doubt in the minds of the jury as to the defendant's guilt is a question of fact exclusively for the consideration of the jury, and where there is evidence to sustain a verdict against him it will not be set aside and a new trial ordered on the ground that there was sufficient evidence of an alibi to create a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the defendant. Arnold v. State, 53 Ga. 325.

And an instruction in a criminal prosecution that an alibi relied upon as a defense must be established by a preponderance of the evidence, and another that if upon the whole evidence, including that tending to establish the alibi, the jury entertains a reasonable doubt, they should acquit, are not contradictory and misleading, but harmonize with each other and accord with the law. State v. Maher, 74 Iowa, 77.

And an instruction requiring the jury to give the prisoner the benefit of any and all reasonable doubt upon summing up the entire evidence, including that relating to an alibi, is sufficient. Harrison v. State, 83 Ga. 129.

But the burden of establishing an alibi rests with the accused, and should be made out to the satisfaction of the jury; and an instruction to that effect is not erroneous where the jury were also instructed that if on the whole case they have a reasonable doubt they should acquit. State v. Jennings, 81 Mo. 185, 51 Am. Rep. 236. But see State v. Howell, 100 Mo. 628, supra, III. for present Missouri rule.

And an instruction in a criminal prosecution that the defense of alibi admits all the prosecution alleges to be true will be taken to refer to the defense of alibi alone, and not as a direction that all other facts are to be taken as admitted, and is therefore good, where the jury were also told that the law exacts a conviction whenever there is legal evidence to show the prisoner's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. Fife v. Com. 29 Pa. 429.

So, an instruction in a criminal prosecution in which there is evidence of an alibi, that if the jury believe that the evidence clearly sustained it or raised in their minds a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the defendant they must acquit him, gives him the benefit of all his legal rights. Trujillo v. Territory, 7 N. M. 43.

And an instruction that if there is any reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt of the crime charged against him on the whole evidence he is entitled to an acquittal, where an alibi had

The third assignment of error presents an important question, not heretofore determined by this court. Upon the question of alibi, the court charged the jury as follows: "The defendant claims as one of his defenses what is known in law as an 'alibi,' that is, that, at the time the crime with which he is charged was committed, he was at a different place, so that he could not have participated in its commission. Such a defense is proper and legitimate; and upon this question the court instructs you that where the state makes out such a case as would sustain a verdict of guilty, and the defendant offers evidence, the burden is upon the defendant to make out his defense as to an alibi; and when the proof is all in, both that given for the defendant and for the state, then the primary question is (the whole evidence being considered), Is the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt?—? the law being that if, after you have considered all the evidence, as well that touching the question of alibi as the criminating evidence introduced by the state, you have a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused, you should acquit; if you have not, you should convict."

The contention of the counsel for plaintiff in error is that the court erred in instructing the jury that "where the state makes out such a case as would sustain a verdict of guilty," for the reason that the jury might been claimed, furnishes the accused with no reasonable ground for complaint. State v. Reed, 62 Iowa, 40.

And an instruction in a criminal prosecution that the burden of establishing an alibi rests with the defendant, and the evidence introduced to sustain it should outweigh the proof introduced by the state tending to show the defendant's participation in the crime, but that they are not bound to establish such defense beyond a reasonable doubt; and if, upon the whole case, the testimony raises in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt that the defendants were present at the place where the crime was committed, that would create a reasonable doubt as to guilt and entitle them to an acquittal,—is fully as favorable to the defendants as they have any right to demand. State v. Fry, 67 Iowa, 178.

So, a reversal will not be had in a criminal prosecution in which an alibi is set up on an instruction that it is incumbent on the accused to establish it by a preponderance of the evidence, but not beyond a reasonable doubt, on the ground that it requires the accused to establish the alibi, where it is followed by another instruction that, after consideration of all the evidence in the case, as well that in relation to the alibi as that offered by the prosecution, the jury has reasonable doubt as to whether the accused was at the place where the crime was committed, they should give him the benefit of that doubt, as by this he is relieved from the responsibility of establishing his absence by a preponderance of the evidence. Borrego v. Territory, 8 N. M. 446; People v. Tarm Pol, 86 Cal. 225.

An instruction in a criminal prosecution that the burden of proof is on the defendant to establish his alibi, and that it must be done to the reasonable satisfaction of the jury, however, without any direction for acquittal in case of reasonable doubt as to guilt, upon all the evidence, is incorrect as tending to lead the jury to believe that a defendant relying on an alibi must prove it as a party in a civil case must prove a fact on which he relies, by a preponderance of the evidence, but will not be deemed a ground for reversal unless it is plain that the jury have been misled thereby. Towns v. State, 111 Ala. 1.

And an instruction in a prosecution for larceny that the burden of proof is on the state to show beyond a reasonable doubt that the larceny charged was in fact committed, but if the state has made this proof then the burden is on the defendant to establish by the weight, or preponderance, of the evidence his defense of alibi, but if the entire evidence upon the whole case raises a reasonable doubt as to the defendant's guilt he should be acquitted,—is not subject to the objection that it relieves the state from the burden of proving that the defendant committed the larceny, and made it incumbent on him to prove that he did not do so. State v. Van Winkle, 80 Iowa, 15.

And an instruction in a criminal prosecution that if the alibi was proved the prisoner should be acquitted, is not rendered improper by the failure of the court, on request, to charge that unless the jury found beyond a reasonable doubt that the person was not at the place of the crime at the time in question they should acquit, where the jury were told that to convict the prosecution must establish their whole case beyond a reasonable doubt. State v. Cameron, 40 Vt. 555.

So, an instruction in a criminal prosecution against two persons, that the defense of alibi, to be entitled to consideration, must be such as to show that at the very time of the commission of the crime charged the accused were at another place so far away, or under such circumstances, that they could not, with ordinary exertion, have reached the place where the crime was committed so as to have participated in it, and that if the proof of alibi fails as to either defendant on trial the jury will not consider it as to him, but if it does not fail as to either they are to give it full consideration as to the defendant of whom it was shown,—is not subject to the objection that the jury are thereby directed that they are not to consider the evidence pertaining to the alibi on the question of reasonable doubt of guilt. State v. Maher, 74 Iowa, 77.

III. Proof by defendant to raise a reasonable doubt.

In some of the cases holding the reasonable doubt doctrine, the burden of proof after the establishment of a prima facie case by the prosecution is deemed to shift to the defendant, claiming an alibi, so as to require him to raise a reasonable doubt, either of presence, or of guilt generally. See STATE V. THORNTON.

Thus, where the people in a criminal prosecution have made out a prima facie case, and the defendant relies on the defense of alibi, the burden rests with him to prove it, not beyond a reasonable doubt, nor by a preponderance of the evidence, but by such evidence, and to such a degree of certainty, as will, when the whole evidence is considered, create in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt of his guilt. Ackerson v. People, 124 Ill. 563; Mullins v. People, 110 Ill. 42.

The presence of the accused being necessary to the commission of an offense, the burden of proving presence in the first instance is upon the state, and if it fails to prove presence, or if the evidence as a whole leaves a reasonable doubt in the minds of the jury, it must acquit; but the burden of proving an alibi is upon the have understood by that expression that the evidence should preponderate in favor of the prosecution, and not that the prosecution should prove such a state of facts as would warrant the jury in believing the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. But we think this view cannot be sustained, for the reason that the court, in its charge, had, in at least two instances before it came to this part of the charge, instructed the jury that they could not convict the defendant, unless the evidence satisfied them beyond a reasonable doubt of his guilt. Such being the case, no reasonable jury could have possibly understood that the court was speaking of any other state of facts as sustaining a verdict of guilty.

The statement itself also necessarily implies that the evidence of the prosecution must be such as to satisfy the jury beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant. No other state of facts would sustain a verdict. Hence, in either view, the charge, in the respect mentioned, is not subject to criticism.

Counsel for the plaintiff in error further contends that the court erred in instructing the jury that "the burden was upon him [the defendant] to make out his defense as to an alibi;" and he relies confidently upon this alleged error for a reversal of the judgment. There is in the earlier cases an irreconcilable conflict in the authorities as to the nature and effect of evidence tending to prove an alibi, prisoner, and if the evidence tends to prove the same, and to show that he could not have been guilty of the offense charged because of absence, then it would be proper for the court to instruct the jury that if there was reasonable doubt whether the prisoner was at the place where the offense was committed at the time of its commission they should acquit him. State v. Lowry, 42 W. Va. 205.

A reasonable doubt upon the part of the jury as to the presence of the accused at the time and place of the commission of the offense is the same as a reasonable doubt as to his committing the offense. State v. Lowry, 42 W. Va. 205.

And where the prosecution in a criminal case presents sufficient evidence to secure a verdict of conviction the burden is on the defendant to prove his defense, but when his proof is in, the final question is, Are the essential averments of the indictment proved beyond a reasonable doubt? and among these essential averments is the defendant's participation in the act charged, proof of an alibi being as much of a traverse of the crime charged, as any other defense. State v. Howell, 100 Mo. 628.

In State v. Howell, 100 Mo. 628, supra, State v. Jennings, 81 Mo. 185, 51 Am. Rep. 236, supra II. b, was overruled.

The burden of establishing an alibi in a criminal prosecution rests with the accused, and in order to maintain it he is bound to establish in its support such facts and circumstances as are sufficient, when considered with all the other evidence in the case, to create in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt of the truth of the charge against him. Carlton v. People, 150 Ill. 181; Ackerson v. People, 124 Ill. 563; Ware v. State, 59 Ark. 379.

And when the evidence for the state establishes beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused was present and participated in the commission of the offense, and is guilty as charged, he may rebut the case made by the state by proof of an alibi; but unless he makes such proof, or proves some other matter which will exculpate him or raise in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt of his guilt, his conviction must follow. Gallaher v. State, 28 Tex. App. 247.

A person accused of crime, who attempts to establish an alibi, which, if established, would show the impossibility of his connection with it, takes on himself the affirmative of the proof; but it is not necessary that he should establish his defense by preponderating evidence; it is sufficient if the evidence is such as to raise a reasonable doubt whether he was present at the place where the offense was committed. State v. Waterman, 1 Nev. 543.

And an instruction in a criminal prosecution that if the defendant seeks to establish the fact that he was at a particular place at the time of the alleged commission of the offense, other than the place at which it was committed, the burden of proof rests with him, and that, if the evidence tending to prove an alibi was such that, when taken together with the other evidence, the jury were left in reasonable doubt as to whether he was present at the scene of the crime they should acquit him, is not subject to objection by the accused, as it leaves the evidence tending to prove an alibi, even if it fails to establish it, to have its full effect in bringing into doubt the evidence tending to prove his presence at the scene of the crime. Com. v. Choate, 105 Mass. 451.

And an instruction that, as a matter of law, where the people make out a case which will sustain a verdict of guilty, and the defendant offers evidence, the burden is on him to make out his defense, and as to an alibi and all other like defenses that tend merely to cast a reasonable doubt on the case made by the people, the primary question is whether the defendant is guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, upon a consideration of the whole evidence, the law being that when the jury has considered all the evidence, as well that touching the question of the alibi as the criminalizing evidence introduced by the prosecution, then, if they have any reasonable doubt of guilt they should acquit, is not subject to the objection that it casts discredit on the defense of alibi, and that its effect is to impress the jury that in the opinion of the court the state had made out a case that would sustain a verdict of guilty. Ackerson v. People, 124 Ill. 563.

IV. Proof by prosecution beyond a reasonable doubt.

a. General rule as to burden of proof.

Upon the other hand, the rule is laid down by a large number of cases that an allegation of an alibi is not an affirmative proposition made by the defendant with the burden of proof resting on him. Humphries v. State, 18 Tex. App. 302.

And that alleging an alibi does not throw the burden of proof upon the accused, or admit the truth of the allegations of the prosecution. Fife v. Com. 29 Pa. 429; Toiler v. State, 16 Ohio St. 583; State v. Jaynes, 78 N. C. 504.

And that the rule requiring the defendant to establish an alibi by a preponderance of proof is contrary to the presumption of innocence to which every accused person is entitled, and to the rule requiring the state to establish his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. State v. Taylor, 118 Mo. 153; Schultz v. Territory (Ariz.) 52 Pac. 352.

And that a failure to prove an alibi does not afford any presumption that the accused was and to what extent the defendant must sustain such a defense by his evidence, when the state's evidence prima facie establishes the guilt of the defendant beyond a reasonable doubt; some courts holding that such evidence must be sufficient to prove the defense beyond a reasonable doubt. In others it was held that the evidence to prove the alibi must be such as to preponderate over the evidence of the prosecution. In the later, and we think the better considered, cases, the doctrine seems to prevail that, if the evidence upon the defense of alibi is sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of defendant when considered in connection with all the evidence in the case, he should be acquitted; but that the burden of making such proof is upon the accused seems to be quite generally recognized.

We shall not attempt in this opinion to do more than to call attention to a few of the later cases and text-writers, as the cases seem to be fully collated in 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. under the title Alibi. The learned author of that article, on page 56, states his conclusions as follows: "The true doctrine seems to be that where the state has established a prima facie case, and the defendant relies upon the defense of alibi, the burden is upon him to prove it, not beyond a reasonable doubt, nor by a preponderance of the evidence, but by such evidence, and to such a degree of certainty, as will, when the whole evidence is present at the time and place when the crime was committed, or affect the burden of proof resting with the state to prove him guilty beyond a reasonable doubt otherwise than by disclosing falsehood and fabrication, and thus affording general evidence of guilt. Toler v. State, 16 Ohio St. 583.

Within this rule proof tending to establish an alibi is an attack upon the evidence which tends to prove guilt, disproving, or weakening, or questioning it, and imposing no burden of proof upon the accused. Humphries v. State, 18 Tex. App. 302; Johnson v. State, 21 Tex. App. 368.

And resort to that kind of evidence neither changes the burden of proof on the other questions in the cause, nor in any manner entitles the commonwealth to a verdict against the prisoner without proof of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. Elfe v. Com. 29 Pa. 429.

And the accused in a criminal prosecution is not required to prove an alibi, but is entitled to an acquittal whenever the jury, from a consideration of all the evidence adduced, entertain a reasonable doubt of his presence at the time and place where the crime is shown to have been committed. Casey v. State, 49 Neb. 403; Peyton v. State (Neb.) 74 N. W. 597; McLain v. State, 18 Neb. 154; Schultz v. Territory (Ariz.) 52 Pac. 352.

The burden remains with the state to satisfy the jury, upon the whole evidence, of the guilt of the accused. State v. Jaynes, 78 N. C. 504; Johnson v. State, 21 Tex. App. 368.

In every criminal prosecution the state assumes to show the presence of the defendant at the commission of a crime as an essential element of his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. State v. Taylor, 118 Mo. 153; State v. Tatlow, 136 Mo. 678; Bennett v. State, 30 Tex. App. 341; McLain v. State, 18 Neb. 154.

And an instruction placing the burden upon the accused of establishing an alibi is erroneous. State v. Tatlow, 136 Mo. 678; Bennett v. State, 30 Tex. App. 341.

An alibi is not a defense within any accurate meaning of that word, but a mere fact shown in rebuttal of the state's evidence. State v. Ardoin, 49 La. Ann. 1145.

And an instruction in a criminal prosecution that the burden of proof rests with the accused to establish an alibi by a preponderance of the evidence is erroneous. Beck v. State, 51 Neb. 106; Peyton v. State (Neb.) 74 N. W. 597; State v. Ardoin, 49 La. Ann. 1145.

And so is an instruction that the burden of proving an alibi devolves upon the accused, and it must be clearly and satisfactorily established before it can avail. Hoge v. People, 117 Ill. 35.

And an instruction in a criminal prosecution requiring the accused to establish his defense of alibi by a preponderance of the evidence, 41 I. R. A.

but that he is entitled to an acquittal if the evidence adduced raises a reasonable doubt in the minds of the jury as to his guilt, injuriously affects the rights of the defendant, and may be availed of on motion for new trial, though it was not excepted to. Ayres v. State, 21 Tex. App. 399.

And an instruction in a prosecution for murder, that evidence which tends to establish the defendant's guilt also tends in an equal degree to prove that he was present at the time when and place where the deed was committed, and if he seeks to prove an alibi he must do it by evidence which outweighs that given by the state tending to fix his presence at the time and place of the crime, is erroneous. French v. State, 12 Ind. 670, 74 Am. Dec. 229.

So, an instruction in a criminal prosecution that if the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant was not present at the time and place where the crime was committed they must find him not guilty is erroneous as casting the burden upon the defendant to establish his alibi. State v. Harvey, 131 Mo. 339.

And an instruction that if the jury shall find, and believe from the evidence, that at the time the offense charged was committed the defendant was at a place other than the place where it was committed they will find him not guilty, is erroneous as requiring that the jury shall find as a fact that he was at such other place, when he is entitled to an acquittal in case of reasonable doubt as to his presence. State v. Taylor, 118 Mo. 153.

So, to require the defendant in a prosecution for larceny to satisfactorily explain his recent possession of the stolen property, and to satisfactorily establish an alibi, is error, as the burden rests with the people to establish his guilt; and if, after considering the evidence introduced by him as to either or both of these questions, in connection with all the other evidence in the case, and giving due consideration to the entire evidence, the jury shall have a reasonable doubt of his guilt, he cannot be convicted. Hoge v. People, 117 Ill. 35.

And an instruction in a criminal prosecution with relation to an alibi, that the jury must be satisfied of the defendant's guilt by proof beyond a reasonable doubt, but, as proof of the alibi was in conflict with the direct proof offered by the prosecution, they should weigh it in connection with the other testimony in the case, and consider it as met or explained by that of the defense, and determine whether, in view of all the testimony, the witnesses to the alibi were mistaken, or that they were able to say from the testimony of the prosecution, as explained by that of the defense, that there was no reasonable doubt that he was guilty,—is objectionable on the ground that the jury might have been misled thereby into thinking that the considered, create and leave in the mind of the jury a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused. The distinctions which the courts have attempted to make with reference to the burden of proof are apparently of little practical value, as it is universally held that if the evidence introduced to prove an alibi, when considered by itself, or in connection with all the evidence in the case, raises a reasonable doubt in the minds of the jury as to the guilt of the accused, he must be acquitted." This is substantially the language used by the supreme court of Illinois in Ackerson v. People, 124 Ill. 568. In that case the court says: "The law undoubtedly is, where the people have made a prima facie case, and the defendant relies on the defense of alibi, the burden is upon him to prove it,—not beyond a reasonable doubt, nor by a preponderance of the evidence, but by such evidence, and to such degree of certainty, as will, when the whole evidence is considered, create and leave in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt of his guilt of the crime charged. Hoge v. People, 117 Ill. 44; Hopps v. People, 81 Ill. 892, 88 Am. Dec. 231, and authorities supra." The instruction given by the court below, and sustained by the supreme court, in that case, was as follows: "The court instructs the jury, as a matter of law, that where the people make out such a case as would sustain a verdict of guilty, and the defendant offers evidence, the alibi must be affirmatively shown, and that a reasonable doubt of the person's presence would not warrant his acquittal. People v. Pearsall, 60 Mich. 233.

But an instruction that an alibi is a good defense if proved to the satisfaction of the jury is not objectionable as intimating that the failure of the effort to prove an alibi is to be taken as affirmative evidence tending to show guilt, or that the burden of proving it rested with the accused. State v. Starnes, 94 N. C. 973.

Under this rule, the burden of proof in a criminal case never shifts, but rests with the prosecution throughout the case. Turner v. Com. 86 Pa. 54, 27 Am. Rep. 683; Watson v. Com. 95 Pa. 418; State v. Taylor, 118 Mo. 153; State v. Harvey, 131 Mo. 339; State v. Ardoin, 49 La. Ann. 1145; McLain v. State, 18 Neb. 150; Walters v. State, 39 Ohio St. 215; State v. Chee Gong, 16 Or. 534; Schultz v. Territory (Ariz.) 52 Pac. 352.

And where, upon all the evidence, including that for and against the alibi, there is reasonable doubt of guilt, the accused must be acquitted. McLain v. State, 18 Neb. 159; State v. Ardoin, 49 La. Ann. 1145; Turner v. Com. 86 Pa. 54, 27 Am. Rep. 683.

And if, by reason of the evidence in relation to such alibi, the jury should doubt the defendant's guilt, he would be entitled to an acquittal, though they might not be able to see that the alibi was fully proved. Walters v. State, 39 Ohio St. 215; Schultz v. Territory (Ariz.) 52 Pac. 352; McLain v. State, 18 Neb. 154.

Proof of an alibi is as much a traverse of the crime charged as any other defense, and though not clear it may nevertheless, with other facts of the case, raise doubt enough to produce an acquittal. Turner v. Com. 86 Pa. 54, 27 Am. Rep. 683.

And it devolves upon the state to show beyond a reasonable doubt that the person accused of the crime was present at the time of its commission, and not elsewhere, and the court must so instruct. State v. Harvey, 131 Mo. 339.

The establishment by the prosecution of a prima facie case does not change the burden of proof; that remains with the prosecution to the end, which undertakes to prove the accused guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, not in view alone of the direct testimony adduced by it, but in view of rebutting testimony as well, and the burden of proof of an alibi does not rest with the accused. State v. Chee Gong, 16 Or. 534.

Nor does an offer of evidence of an alibi by the accused change the burden of proof and shift it to the accused, and an instruction that the burden rests with him to show an alibi by a preponderance of the evidence is erroneous, and a ground for reversal, though the court also instructed in the same connection that, all the evidence being considered, as well that with relation to alibi as that with relation to guilt or innocence, if the jury entertain a reasonable doubt of guilt they should acquit. Shoemaker v. Territory, 4 Okla. 118.

And an instruction that the burden of proof to show guilt of the prisoner is upon the state, but when the state has made out a prima facie case, and the prisoner attempts to set up an alibi, the burden of proof is shifted, and if the defense fails to establish the alibi to the satisfaction of the jury they must find the prisoner guilty, is erroneous, as they are bound to acquit where, from the evidence, a reasonable doubt of his presence at the time and place of the crime is raised. State v. Josey, 64 N. C. 56.

And an instruction that the burden of proving that the accused was elsewhere than at the place where the crime was committed, at the time of its commission, is cast upon him, and that to warrant an acquittal he must maintain an alibi to the satisfaction of the jury, is erroneous as treating an alibi as a defense in the nature of a plea of confession and avoidance, whereas it is not a defense at all in any other sense than as rebutting evidence tending to disprove the fact alleged in the indictment, the burden of proving which rests with the state throughout the trial. Walker v. State, 42 Tex. 360.

But though an instruction in a criminal prosecution, to the effect that when an alibi is relied on as a defense the burden of proof to establish it is shifted to the accused, is not sanctioned, it is rendered of no effect, and is not ground for reversal, when followed by an instruction that the state must prove the crime and its perpetration by the accused beyond a reasonable doubt. State v. Freeman, 100 N. C. 420.

And an instruction that the defendant is not required to prove an alibi beyond a reasonable doubt, or even by a preponderance of the testimony, but that the state must prove to the satisfaction of the jury, beyond a reasonable doubt, that he was present and participated in the alleged crime, and unless the state does this the defendant should be acquitted, is not erroneous as implying that the defendant was bound to do something more than stand upon the presumption of innocence throughout the trial. State v. Conway, 56 Kan. 682.

Where the prosecution rests with positive and undoubted proof of the guilt of the accused, it should not be overcome with less than full, clear, and satisfactory evidence of an alleged alibi, but the evidence tending to establish it, though not of itself sufficient to work an acquittal, should not be excluded from the case, as the burden of proof never shifts, but rests with the prosecution throughout upon all the evidence given in the case, taken together burden is on him to make out that defense; and as to an alibi and all other like defenses that tend merely to cast a reasonable doubt on the case made by the people, when the proof is in, then the primary question is (the whole evidence being considered, both that given for the defendant and for the people). Is the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt?—the law being that when the jury have considered all the evidence, as well that touching the question of alibi as the criminating evidence introduced by the prosecution, then, if they have any reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused of the offense with which he stands charged, then they shall acquit; otherwise not." It will be observed that the instructions in the case at bar follow very closely the language of the court in that case. In fact, the instructions as to the case of the prosecution being "such a case as would sustain a verdict of guilty," and as to the burden of proof, are identically the same. This case is cited with approval in Carlton v. People, 150 Ill. 181.

This question was also very fully considered by the supreme court of Missouri in a homicide case (State v. Howell, 100 Mo. 628), and that court quotes with approval Wharton, Crim. Ev. 8th ed. § 383. The part material to the question we are now considering reads as follows: "Undoubtedly, if the prosecution makes out a case sufficient to secure a verdict upon the question of reasonable doubt of guilt. Watson v. Com. 95 Pa. 418.

But see Rudy v. Com. 128 Pa. 500, and other Pennsylvania cases, supra, II. b.

b. Measure of proof.

Under this rule where alibi is set up the accused must be acquitted in case of a reasonable doubt that he was present at the time and place of the crime. People v. Chun Heong, 86 Cal. 329; Adams v. State, 28 Fla. 512; Bacon v. State, 22 Fla. 51; Boothe v. State, 4 Tex. App. 202.

It is only necessary for him to produce such an amount of evidence, whether by testimony tending to show an alibi or otherwise, as to produce in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt of his guilt. State v. Jaynes, 78 N. C. 504; State v. Child, 40 Kan. 482; State v. Waterman, 1 Nev. 543.

His presence at the time and place of the crime must be shown as an essential to its commission. State v. Woolard, 111 Mo. 248.

And evidence of an alibi, given by the accused, need only be of such weight as to produce in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt of the fact affirmed by the state, that the accused was the person who committed the crime. Walker v. State, 42 Tex. 360; Ayres v. State, 21 Tex. App. 399; Howard v. State, 50 Ind. 190.

The commission of a crime implies the presence of defendant at the necessary time and place, and evidence of his absence is always admitted as a defense, and if a reasonable doubt is created by such evidence it is the duty of the jury to acquit. People v. Nelson, 85 Cal. 421.

And wherever the evidence introduced in a criminal prosecution supports the defense of an alibi, and its effect is to create a reasonable doubt in the minds of the jury of the defendant's guilt, he is as much entitled to an acquittal as if the reasonable doubt had been created by any other legitimate evidence. Prince v. State, 100 Ala. 144.

An alibi asserted by way of defense is physically incompatible with guilt of the crime charged, and it is sufficient to warrant an acquittal, if the evidence in support of that fact raises a reasonable doubt of guilt. State v. Waterman, 1 Nev. 543.

In that case Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 324, 52 Am. Dec. 711, supra, II. a, was distinguished upon the ground that the court was not then speaking of the degree of doubt or certainty which was to be produced on the minds of the jury; it was only speaking of the manner in which contradictory evidence should be weighed and balanced in their minds.

The rule in criminal cases, that if the defendant produces evidence which raises a reasonable doubt of the truth of the charge against him he must be acquitted, applies where the defense of an alibi is set up, as a reasonable doubt may arise from the whole evidence in the case. French v. State, 12 Ind. 670, 74 Am. Dec. 229.

In that case Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 320, 52 Am. Dec. 711, supra, II. a, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the effort was not to prove an alibi as to the accused, but to prove that the person who was alleged to have been murdered was still alive.

So, in McCoy v. State, 46 Ark. 141, an instruction that if the proof of alibi raised in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt as to the defendant's presence at the time and place of the commission of the crime it was their duty to acquit, was sustained, but the question considered was with relation to the multiplication of instructions.

The defense of an alibi is not a special one, or in the nature of an independent exculpatory fact, and need not be proved by the accused by a preponderance of the evidence. The state is bound to prove, in making its case, that the defendant was present at the commission of the crime, beyond a reasonable doubt. State v. Child, 40 Kan. 482; Ayres v. State, 21 Tex. App. 399.

Nor need the defense of an alibi be established by the accused to the satisfaction of the jury. Dawson v. State, 62 Miss. 241; State v. Woolard, 111 Mo. 248.

And an instruction which requires him to satisfy the minds of the jury is erroneous. Howard v. State, 50 Ind. 190.

And an instruction in a prosecution for murder, that if the evidence raises in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt of the presence of the accused at the place where the deceased was killed, at the time of such killing, they should find him not guilty, is sufficient on the subject of alibi. Walker v. State, 6 Tex. App. 577; Thornton v. State, 20 Tex. App. 519.

So, where the only defense in a criminal prosecution is an alibi, the defendant ought to be acquitted if the evidence raises a reasonable doubt in the minds of the jury as to whether the accused was present at the doing of the act charged against him as a crime. State v. Kelly, 16 Mo. App. 213.

And an instruction that the burden rests with the accused to prove an alibi, by a preponderance of the evidence,—that is, by the greater and superior evidence,—is erroneous, and a sufficient ground for reversal. Wright v. Territory, 5 Okla. 78.

And so is an instruction that if the jury believe from the evidence that the defendants were at a certain place at the time a witness said he saw them there, they should be acquitted, as they may not have been there at such time, and yet may have been there at such time as to render it altogether improbable that they were at the scene of the crime at the of conviction, then the burden is on the defendant to prove his defense. But, when his proof is in, then the final question is, Are the essential averments of the indictment proved beyond a reasonable doubt? And among these essential averments is the defendant's participation in the act charged." And that court adds that "the supreme courts of Indiana, Iowa, and Texas, in well considered cases, have also approved and announced, in express terms, the same doctrine," citing Howard v. State, 50 Ind. 190; State v. Hardin, 46 Iowa, 623, 26 Am. Rep. 174; Walker v. State, 42 Tex. 360. It will be noticed that Mr. Wharton uses the expression "then the burden is on the defendant to prove his defense."

139, the supreme court of that state, in discussing the question of alibi, uses the following language: "Were our own minds not hedged in by authority, we should be inclined to adopt the view expressed by Judge Thompson (2 Thomp. Trials, § 2436), who, after recognizing that the burden of proof is upon the accused, adds: 'But, upon the most unshaken grounds, this burden is sustained, and an adequate quantum of proof produced by the defendant, when he succeeds in raising a reasonable doubt in the minds of the jurors as to whether or not he was at the place of the crime when it was committed.'" Mark the careful language used, "who, after recognizing that the burden of proof is upon the accused, adds."

time of its commission. Bennett v. State, 30 Tex. App. 341.

Evidence in support of an alibi need not be absolutely clear, and it need not make it absolutely impossible for the accused to have been present at the time of the commission of the criminal act. Adams v. State, 28 Fla. 512.

A reasonable doubt might arise in the minds of the jury, in a criminal prosecution, from evidence tending to prove an alibi, without their minds ever having arrived at a conviction to the degree of a moral certainty as to the truth of the alibi. Ayres v. State, 21 Tex. App. 399; Walker v. State, 42 Tex. 360.

And such evidence is available to rebut the affirmative evidence for the state, though the minds of the jury never arrived at such a conviction as to the truth of the alibi. Walker v. State, 42 Tex. 360.

Where an attempt to prove an alibi fails, the evidence offered in support of it may nevertheless be considered by the jury as otherwise affecting the case in its bearing upon the question of reasonable doubt of guilt. Toler v. State, 16 Ohio St. 583.

The weight of the evidence tending to prove an alibi is to be determined by the jury, and although it falls short of absolute conviction of its truth, if it raises in their minds a reasonable doubt of the defendant's presence at the time of the commission of the crime he is entitled to an acquittal, and it is not material whether this doubt arose from a defect in the evidence of the state or from the evidence of the defendant in rebuttal. State v. Taylor, 118 Mo. 153.

Proof of an alibi is as much a traverse of the crime charged as any other defense, and proof tending to establish it, though not clear, may nevertheless, with the other facts of the case, raise doubt enough to warrant an acquittal. People v. Fong Ah Sing, 64 Cal. 253.

So, a charge upon an alibi is incorrect where it requires the jury to believe the proof of alibi before they can acquit. Bennett v. State, 30 Tex. App. 341.

It is sufficient if it merely raises a reasonable doubt of guilt. Bennett v. State, 30 Tex. App. 341.

And an instruction in a prosecution for murder, which requires the jury to believe from the evidence that the accused was not present at the time and place where the deceased was killed to warrant an alibi, is incorrect and erroneous, and in violation of the rule that if the evidence raises in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt as to the presence of the accused he should be acquitted. Crook v. State, 27 Tex. App. 198.

The doubt which will justify an acquittal in a criminal prosecution, however, must be a 41 L. R. A. reasonable one, and an instruction that if the evidence of the alibi has introduced into the minds of the jury a doubt whether or not the accused was at or about the place where the crime is said to have been committed the jury should acquit him, is erroneous, and is properly refused. Gibbs v. State, 1 Tex. App. 12.

And evidence to make it appear that it was improbable that the deceased was at the place of the crime in question at the time of its commission, without anything to show that he was at a different place, is not sufficient to establish an alibi. State v. Davis (Idaho) 53 Pac. 678.

But a new trial will be granted in a criminal prosecution, on the ground that the verdict was against the evidence, where a credible witness, who was unimpeached, testified that the accused was elsewhere at the time of the commission of the crime, as such evidence at least raises a serious doubt in regard to the guilt. Otmer v. People, 76 Ill. 149.

So, the defense of alibi cannot be established in a case in which the evidence to show it is conflicting and unreliable in many important particulars. Garrity v. People, 107 Ill. 162.

And a verdict against an alibi will be sustained where the whereabouts of the defendant at the time of the crime were not shown, and it was only sought to make it appear improbable that he was at that place, and neither he nor a person who was with him had testified on the trial. State v. Davis (Idaho) 53 Pac. 678.

The rule in South Carolina is that where the state makes a prima facie case in a criminal prosecution, and a special defense, such as an alibi, is interposed, it need be established only by such a preponderance of evidence as will satisfy the jury that the charge in the indictment is not sustained beyond a reasonable doubt, and when such evidence is produced the accused should be acquitted. State v. Paulk, 18 S. C. 515; State v. Nance, 25 S. C. 168.

Evidence relied on to establish an alibi must be sufficiently clear and convincing to satisfy the jury that the preponderance of the evidence was in favor of the alibi, but it need not be sufficient to remove all reasonable doubt of the fact that the accused was not at the place where the crime was committed, at the time of its commission. State v. Jackson, 36 S. C. 487.

c. Consideration of all the evidence.

Under the theory that the state must prove presence, evidence of an alibi in a criminal prosecution should be considered by the jury in connection with the rest of the evidence, as a part of the whole, from which they are to determine their verdict. Bacon v. State, 22 Fla. 51; Prince v. State, 100 Ala. 144.

It is manifest that the term "burden of proof," as used in these decisions, by the text-writers, and in the instructions of the court in the case at bar, does not imply that the defendant must prove his defense by a preponderance of the evidence, or by such evidence as will satisfy a jury that his defense is true, but only that, after the state has made out its case, it devolves upon the accused to introduce evidence, if he has any, to prove his alibi, if he relies upon such a defense. In that sense the burden is upon the accused, and, in order to maintain it, he is bound to establish in its support such facts and circumstances as are sufficient, when considered in connection with all the other evidence in the case, to create in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt of his guilt. Carlton v. People, 150 Ill. 181. Certainly, no fairly intelligent jury could have understood the charge of the court in any other sense, when they were instructed by the court in the same connection "that, when the proof is all in, then the question is (the whole evidence being considered, both that of the defendant and for the state), Is the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt?" We are aware that the expression "the burden of proof" is upon the defendant to make out his defense of an alibi has been criticised by a few courts and by one or more text-writers. 1 Bishop, Crim. Proc. § 1066. But, when these cases and the text of Mr. Bishop are carefully examined, it will be seen that the criticism has no application to the expression as used by the

A reasonable doubt of guilt which will acquit a prisoner, when his defense is an alibi, is a doubt which arises from a consideration by the jury of all the evidence, as well that touching the question of the alibi as the criminating evidence introduced by the prosecution. Carlton v. People, 150 Ill. 181.

And if, upon all the evidence in a criminal prosecution, the jury have a reasonable doubt as to whether the accused was present at the scene of the crime alleged, he is entitled to the benefit of such doubt, and should be acquitted. Adams v. State, 28 Fla. 512; Binns v. State, 46 Ind. 311; Prince v. State, 100 Ala. 144; State v. Waterman, 1 Nev. 543; Gallaher v. State, 25 Tex. App. 247.

And if, upon considering all the testimony, they have a reasonable doubt about the guilt of the accused, arising out of any part of the evidence, they should acquit. Hurd v. State, 94 Ala. 100.

An alibi is sufficiently established if the proof adduced in support of it, used in connection with all the testimony in the case, creates such a probability of its own truth as to engender a reasonable doubt of the truth of the charge upon which the defendant is arraigned. Pollard v. State, 53 Miss. 410, 24 Am. Rep. 703; Blankenship v. State, 55 Ark. 244; Dawson v. State, 62 Miss. 241.

Or, if considered in connection with all the testimony, it raises a reasonable doubt of the presence of the accused at the commission of the crime; and an instruction that it must be such as to satisfy the jury that the crime could not have been committed by him is erroneous. Murphy v. State, 31 Fla. 166.

And if the evidence is sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt, or if the state's evidence is so defective as to leave a reasonable doubt, or if, taking all the evidence on both sides, there is reasonable doubt of his guilt, he is entitled to an acquittal. State v. Woolard, 111 Mo. 248.

The defense of an alibi forms no exception to the general rule that if a doubt of guilt flows from the whole testimony the accused is entitled to its benefit. State v. Watson, 7 S. C. 63.

When the jury in a criminal prosecution have considered all the evidence, as well that touching the question of an alibi as the criminating evidence introduced by the prosecution, then, if they have a reasonable doubt of guilt, they should acquit, otherwise not; and it is not correct to instruct that when the jury have considered all the evidence as to the alibi, if they have a reasonable doubt as to whether the accused was in some other place when the offense was committed, they should acquit. Mullins v. People, 110 Ill. 42.

And an instruction that the defense of alibi does not belong to the doctrine of doubts which entitled the accused to an acquittal, but must be proved by testimony of witnesses worthy of credit, is erroneous. Binns v. State, 46 Ind. 311.

But while an instruction that the defense of alibi tends merely to cast a reasonable doubt on the case of the people, and that when the jury have considered all the evidence, as well that touching the question of alibi as the criminating evidence introduced by the prosecution, if they have any reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused of the offense charged they should acquit, otherwise not, is inaccurate so far as it says that the defense of alibi tends merely to cast a reasonable doubt on the case made by the people, the last part of the instruction places the proof of alibi in such a favorable light for the accused that, considering the whole instruction, it will not be deemed prejudicial to the accused. Sheehan v. People, 131 Ill. 22.

The proper charge in a criminal prosecution, where an alibi is the defense, is that the evidence in support of it should be considered in connection with all the other evidence in the case, and if, on the whole evidence, there is reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt, he should be acquitted. State v. Ardoin, 49 La. Ann. 1145.

d. How jury should be instructed.

The defense of an alibi in a criminal prosecution is ordinarily sufficiently embraced in a general charge that the defendant is by law presumed innocent until his guilt is established by competent evidence beyond a reasonable doubt, and unless requested to do so the trial judge is not required to charge specially with reference thereto. Ayres v. State, 21 Tex. App. 399; Davis v. State, 14 Tex. App. 645; State v. Shroyer, 104 Mo. 448.

And failure to give instructions upon an alibi, considered separately and apart from the main question of guilt or innocence, is not error, though to give specific instructions would be the better practice. State v. Ward, 61 Vt. 163.

An instruction as to a particular fact, that if the jury has a reasonable doubt as to such fact it must acquit, need not be given; all that is required of the court is that it should instruct the jury that if upon the whole case they have a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused, or of his presence or identity, they should acquit him. State v. Crawford, 34 Mo. 200.

Evidence of an alibi is only ordinary evidence in rebuttal, and is to be treated by the court in court in the case at bar. Mr. Bishop seems to be combating the doctrine laid down in some of the older cases, that, when the prosecution has made out a case that would sustain a verdict of guilty, then the burden shifts to the accused to establish his alibi by a preponderance of the evidence, which, in effect, requires the defendant to establish his innocence by a preponderance of the evidence; and he contends, as we hold, that the "question for the jury is whether or not, contemplating the evidence to the alibi, in connection with all the other evidence on both sides, the defendant is guilty beyond a reasonable doubt." He does not question the proposition that the proof of the facts and circumstances tending to establish the alibi must be made by the defendant.

the instructions in the same way as is other like evidence; and an instruction in respect to the alibi, followed by one given as to reasonable doubt, which covers the whole case and in terms applies to all the evidence in it, is sufficient, as it is not necessary to link the idea of reasonable doubt to every atom of evidence in the cause. State v. Rockett, 87 Mo. 668.

And while an instruction in a prosecution for murder, that if from all the evidence there arises in the mind of the jury a reasonable belief that the accused was at his own house at the time the deceased was shot, and was not at that time at the place of the killing, they will find him not guilty, is insufficient with relation to alibi, it would be sufficient when taken in connection with an instruction following it, that if the jury entertain a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant, arising out of the evidence, they should find him not guilty. Boothe v. State, 4 Tex. App. 202.

So, an instruction in a criminal prosecution that unless the jury find, and believe, from all the facts and circumstances given in evidence, the presence of the accused at the time and place of the alleged commission of the crime, and that he is guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, they should acquit, sufficiently covers the defense of alibi, and renders an instruction that they should acquit if they have a reasonable doubt whether he was present or not, unnecessary. State v. Sanders, 106 Mo. 188.

And an instruction that if the jury believe and find from the evidence that the accused was not present at the place and time of the alleged crime, and that at that time he was elsewhere, then they should acquit, is not subject to the objection that it would be likely to convey to their minds the idea that it was a substantive, affirmative defense which must be made out by a preponderance of the evidence where a general instruction was given as to reasonable doubt, which covered the whole case, and in terms applied to all the evidence in it. State v. Johnson, 91 Mo. 439.

Nor is an instruction that the accused could establish any fact essential to his defense by a mere preponderance of the evidence objectionable as requiring the accused to prove an alibi upon which he relied as a defense by a preponderance of the evidence, where the court also charged that he must be acquitted in case of reasonable doubt as to his presence at the time and place of the crime. People v. Chun Heong, 86 Cal. 329.

So, an instruction in a criminal prosecution that the proof offered to sustain an alibi is to be subjected to rigid scrutiny, and is equally available, if satisfactorily established, to avoid the force of positive, as of circumstantial, evidence, is not subject to the objection that it

In fact, all the authorities agree upon this proposition. If this is so, is it not a mere distinction without a difference to contend that a court may say that the proof of such a defense must come from the defendant, but that it would be error for the court to say the burden of proving these facts is upon the defendant? We conclude, therefore, that the court below committed no error in his instructions; and, finding no error in the record, the judgment of the court below is affirmed.

Fuller, J., dissenting:

My views areso at variance with the reasoning by which my associates have reached the foregoing result that I am impelled to characterize as inconsistent, illogical, and dangerous the in-required the defense of alibi to be made out by a preponderance of the evidence,—especially where the charge concludes that it is for the jury to decide where the truth lies, giving the defendant the benefit of every reasonable doubt. People v. Levine, 85 Cal. 41.

And an instruction in a prosecution for burning a sawmill, that if the jury are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused was at a designated place other than the mill they should acquit, is not reversible error where the court immediately afterwards corrected the statement by charging that if they have, after looking over all the evidence, a reasonable doubt whether he was at the place of the fire until after it broke out, they should acquit. People v. Pichette (Mich.) 69 N. W. 739. And see also Towns v. State, 111 Ala. 1; State v. Van Winkle, 80 Iowa, 15, supra, II. b; State v. Freeman, 100 N. C. 429, supra, IV. a; and Sullivan v. People, 31 Mich. 1, infra, V.

Where an alibi is set up in a criminal prosecution as the sole defense, however, it is not only competent, but proper, for the court to explain to the jury its nature and character. Deggs v. State, 7 Tex. App. 359; Granger v. State, 11 Tex. App. 454.

And in such case failure to instruct the jury as to such a defense, except so far as an instruction with reference to reasonable doubt of guilt might embrace it, is reversible error. McGrew v. State, 10 Tex. App. 530.

And where an alibi is the only defense in a criminal prosecution it is error for the court to refuse, upon request, to instruct the jury to acquit if the evidence raises a reasonable doubt in the minds of the jury as to whether the accused was present at the doing of the act charged against him, where they have not been otherwise instructed as to alibi. State v. Kelly, 16 Mo. App. 213; State v. Edwards, 109 Mo. 315; State v. Lewis, 69 Mo. 92.

The refusal to give the instruction is improper as tending to mislead the jury into the belief that the court regarded the defense as frivolous and unfounded. State v. Edwards, 109 Mo. 315.

Especially where, from the instructions given, it could not be seen that there was any question with relation to the identity of the man who committed the deed. State v. Lewis, 69 Mo. 92.

And an instruction in a criminal prosecution to acquit in case of reasonable doubt of guilt from all the evidence, and another requiring the jury to acquit only if they found the defense of alibi to be true, where an alibi was the only defense, are inconsistent and irreconcilable, and furnish ground for a reversal, where the court refused to instruct that if the evidence as to alibi raises a reasonable doubt as to struction which they have commended and approved. By the language used, the jury was required to determine, in the first instance, whether the evidence introduced in support of the charge was sufficient, as a matter of law, to sustain a verdict of guilty, and then to say whether the accused, handicapped by the burden of proof, had made out a defense, or, in other words, proved his innocence. Every student of the law fully understands the exact import of the phrase "burden of proof," and every juror knows that a defendant in a criminal case, upon whom it is imposed, must make out his defense by the introduction of preponderating testimony, not that which balances merely and would suffice in a civil action, but that which outweighs the evidence of guilt, re-enforced by a presumption of guilt arising from a case made out by the state, sufficient to sustain a verdict of guilty.

The presumption being that plaintiff in error was not present, and is therefore innocent of the crime, it was error to charge that "the burden is upon him to make out his defense as to an alibi." Although the charge is sanctioned by some elementary writers, and sustained, perhaps, by the greater number of early cases, its tendency has ever been to devert the accused, at a most critical stage of the proceeding, of that humane and protecting principle, the presumption of innocence, with which, for every purpose of the trial, the law has clothed him; and its influence upon a jury is the same as an instruction that evidence sufficient to guilt they should acquit. State v. Taylor, 118 Mo. 153.

So, it has been held, on the other hand, that a general instruction in a criminal prosecution upon the subject of reasonable doubt as it should affect jurors collectively and individually does not authorize the refusal of a specific instruction with reference to reasonable doubt arising from a consideration of the evidence with relation to alibi. Fleming v. State, 136 Ind. 149.

And that where an appropriate charge upon the subject of alibi has been requested and refused, or an exception has been taken to a charge for omission in this respect, such objection is sufficient ground for reversal, if the facts of the case make such a charge applicable. Ayres v. State, 21 Tex. App. 390.

And in Ninnon v. State, 17 Tex. App. 650, in which the defendant's father and sister and a third party testified as to the defendant's alibi, it was said that the facts of the case demanded a charge upon the law of alibi, but the decision was rendered upon another question. And see also Ayres v. State, 21 Tex. App. 390, supra, III.; Shoemaker v. Territory, 4 Okla. 118, supra, IV. a.

And it has been held that an erroneous instruction in a criminal prosecution requiring the accused to satisfy the minds of the jury on the question of an alibi, instead of raising a reasonable doubt, is not corrected by another instruction which states the law accurately, unless the erroneous instruction is plainly withdrawn. Howard v. State, 50 Ind. 100.

And that error in instructing that the burden of proof rests with the accused to establish an alibi by a preponderance of the evidence is not cured by another instruction that if, from all the evidence, including that relating to the alibi, there is reasonable doubt of guilt, the defendant should be acquitted. Beck v. State, 51 Neb. 106; Henry v. State, 51 Neb. 149.

And that an instruction that the burden of proof of an alibi rests with the defendant to show by a preponderance of the evidence the facts establishing it, and that if he has shown such facts as raise a reasonable doubt as to whether he could have been present at the commission of the offense or not he should be acquitted, is erroneous and a ground for a reversal, as containing propositions which are inconsistent and in direct conflict. Johnson v. State, 21 Tex. App. 368.

But where the court in a criminal prosecution has already charged that if there is reasonable doubt, upon the whole evidence, as to the guilt of the accused, it will be the duty of the jury to acquit, and if there is no reasonable doubt it will be their duty to convict, an instruction that an alibi need not be established beyond a reasonable doubt, but should be established to the satisfaction of the jury, and the reply of the court to a request to charge that if, taking the whole case together, including the evidence for the prosecution and the evidence respecting the alibi, they have reasonable doubt of the guilt of the prisoner, they must acquit him, that it had so charged already, is not reversible error, as such reply is equivalent to saying that the intention of the whole charge was to so instruct the jury. People v. Stone, 117 N. Y. 480.

Evidence as to an alibi in a criminal prosecution requires the trial court, under Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 4208, to instruct the jury on the defense thus raised, and if an erroneous instruction on the question is asked by the defendant, it is the duty of the court to give a correct one. State v. Taylor, 118 Mo. 153.

In that case, State v. Shroyer, 104 Mo. 443, supra, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case no instruction was asked by the defendant on the defense of an alibi. And State v. Sanders, 106 Mo. 188, supra, was distinguished upon the ground that that case simply holds that the instruction given was substantially a correct one on the subject of alibi.

V. Time covered by proof.

The rule has been laid down that where a defense in a criminal prosecution rests on proof of an alibi it must cover the time when the offense is shown to have been committed, so as to preclude the possibility of the accused's presence at that time and place. Briceland v. Com. 74 Pa. 463; Com. v. Seybert, 4 Kulp, 4.

And that, to establish an alibi in a criminal prosecution, the accused must not only show that he was at some other place about the time of the alleged crime, but also that he was there for such a length of time that it was impossible for him to have been at the place where the crime was committed, either before or after the time he was at the other place. Klein v. People, 113 Ill. 596.

And that an alibi is a defense which involves the impossibility of the person's presence at the scene of the offense at the time of its commission and the range of evidence with respect to time and place must be such as reasonably to exclude the possibility of presence. Ware v. State, 67 Ga. 349; Johnson v. State, 59 Ga. 142; Wade v. State, 65 Ga. 756; Jackson v. State, 64 Ga. 344; Simpson v. State, 78 Ga. 91.

And to warrant an acquittal on the ground of an alibi, under the Georgia doctrine, the evidence should satisfy the jury that the defendant was physically present at a locality so far distant from the scene of the crime that he could not have been present at its commission. Goldsamith v. State, 63 Ga. 85; Ware v. State, 67 Ga. 349; Johnson v. State, 59 Ga. 142.

And a charge on the defense of alibi in a sustain a verdict of guilty converts such safeguard into a presumption of guilt, and shifts the burden of proof from the accuser to the accused. The subsequent formal, though wholly inconsistent, expression as to proof beyond a reasonable doubt, is not curative in character, and, as this case stood, might have suggested to the jury that, in the opinion of the court, the entire evidence in the case, viewed in the light of such instruction, was sufficient to justify a conviction, unless the defendant had shown by the greater weight of testimony that, at the time charged, he was absent from the place where the alleged crime was committed, and was in no manner connected therewith. As the state, in order to overcome the presumption of innocence, and justify a conviction, was bound to prove beyond a reasonable doubt, unaided by any presumption of guilt, that plaintiff in error was present at and participated in the commission of the offense, the burden never shifted; and if the testimony offered on behalf of the defendant, when considered with all the other evidence in the case, raised a reasonable doubt, he was entitled to a verdict of not guilty. 1 McClain, Crim. L. 399; Pollard v. State, 53 Miss. 410, 34 Am. Rep. 703; People v. Stone, 117 N. Y. 480; Turner v. Com. 86 Pa. 54, 27

Am. Rep. 688; State v. Child, 40 Kan. 483; French v. State, 12 Ind. 870, 74 Am. Dec. 229; People v. Nelson, 85 Cal. 421; State v. Ches Gong, 16 Or. 534; Howard v. State, 50 Ind. 180; Toler v. State, 16 Ohio St. 583. The phrase "burden of proof" is defined as that "obligation which the law imposes on a party who alleges the existence of a fact or thing necessary, in the prosecution or defense of an action, to establish it prima facie by proof." The burden of proof is fixed at the inception of the trial, and does not change at any later stage of the proceeding. Anderson, Law Dict.; Underhill, Ev. 247; Willett v. Rich, 142 Mass. 356, 56 Am. Rep. 694; Pease v. Cole, 53 Conn. 53, 55 Am. Rep. 53. "In criminal cases the true rule is that the burden of proof never shifts," says Mr. Justice Clifford in Lisenthal's Tobacco v. United States, 97 U. S. 266, 21 L. ed. 905; Tiffany v. Com. 121 Pa. 165; State v. Wingo, 66 Mo. 181, 27 Am. Rep. 329; Phillips v. State, 26 Tex. App. 228; Conyers v. State, 50 Ga. 103, 15 Am. Rep. 686; People v. Elliott, 80 Cal. 290; Com. v. McKie, 1 Gray, 61, 61 Am. Dec. 410.

The doctrine that persons accused of crime who rely upon an alibi are not entitled to any benefit from their evidence, unless it preponderates against that offered by the prosecution criminal prosecution, that if it was shown that the defendant was at a place that rendered it impossible for him to have committed the alleged criminal act, then he could not be found guilty, but this should be shown in order to render this defense complete and perfect, is not erroneous when taken in connection with another charge, that when the testimony relied upon to convict is entirely circumstantial, it should be so strong as to exclude any reasonable hypothesis except that of guilt. Bryan v. State, 74 Ga. 393.

So, it is held in Maine that, to make mere distance a conclusive answer as an alibi, it must be shown to be so great as to render it impossible for the accused to have participated in the criminal act. State v. Fenlason, 78 Me. 495.

And in Massachusetts refusal to instruct on a prosecution for murder, that the accused was not bound to show where he was during the whole time that the murder might have been committed, and that no inference should be drawn from his failure to do so, ruling that the question was for the jury, and instructing that if the accused was shown to be in any connection with the transaction which seemed to them to put into his possession facts which, if innocent, he would use, which he could use without going upon the stand himself, the withholding of such means to explain the circumstances might be considered by the jury, in connection with the other testimony, in determining his responsibility,—is held to furnish the accused with no ground of exception. Com. v. Costley, 118 Mass. 1.

Upon the other hand, the rule has been adopted that to justify an acquittal in a criminal prosecution upon evidence of an alibi, though the witnesses supporting it are believed, it must have been proved that the period during which the accused was shown to have been absent from the scene of the crime covered the time of its commission, or so nearly did so as to raise in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt as to his having passed from one point to the other. Pollard v. State, 53 Miss. 410, 24 Am. Rep. 703.

And that to establish an alibi it is not necessary for the accused to show that he was absent at the very time the offense is shown to have been committed, and his proof need not absolutely preclude the possibility of his being at both places. Stuart v. People, 42 Mich. 265; Henry v. State, 51 Neb. 149.

And that one who interposes the defense of an alibi is not required to reasonably satisfy the jury of his exact whereabouts every moment of the time necessary to cover the period when the offense was committed, but is required, under the one rule, to prove such a state of facts or circumstances as to reasonably satisfy the jury that he was elsewhere than at the place where the offense was committed at the moment of its commission. Pate v. State, 94 Ala. 14.

Or to raise a reasonable doubt as to presence under the other rule. Henry v. State, 51 Neb. 149.

Under this doctrine an instruction in a prosecution for murder, that if the jury find, from all the circumstances, that it was impossible for the accused to have left the place where he was shown to have been by the evidence as to an alibi, and gone to the place where the crime was committed, and committed the act, then the alibi is made out, and is a complete defense; but if they find that it was possible for him to have done so the evidence fails to establish an alibi,—is erroneous, the terms "possible" and "impossible" being too strong. Snell v. State, 50 Ind. 516; West v. State, 48 Ind. 483; Adams v. State, 42 Ind. 373.

And an instruction in a criminal prosecution that it is essential to the proof of an alibi that it should cover and account for the whole of the time of the transaction in question, or at least so much of it as to render it impossible that the accused could have committed the act, is erroneous and reversible error, as not being a correct proposition of law, and as depriving the defendant of the benefit of a reasonable doubt on all the evidence. Beavers v. State, 103 Ala. 36; Peyton v. State (Neb.) 74 N. W. 597.

So, an instruction in a criminal prosecution that an alibi must cover the time in which the on that issue, abrogates the fixed theory as to the presumption of innocence, and does violence to the rule that proof beyond a reasonable doubt is essential to a conviction. Mr. Bishop, in his New Criminal Procedure, has collated numerous recent and well reasoned cases in support of his view that the presumption of innocence and burden of proof in no manner change on account of an alibi, and, with characteristic vigor, exemplifies the wisdom of the doctrine, and declares it to be the law of the books. In dismissing the subject, he observes that "some courts, if we follow their language, seem to look upon the alibi as though it were a special and separate defense under a distinct plea. And they appear to hold that the defendant has the burden to prove it; yet only by a preponderance of the evidence, not beyond a reasonable doubt. On the other hand, as the foregoing elucidations make plain, the true doctrine, supported equally by reason and the majority of the cases, is that the presumptions and burden of proof are not changed by the alibi." From page 53, 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. I quote: "Alibi is regarded by some courts as a special affirmative defense, but the better doctrine seems to be that it is not a 'defense' in the accurate meaning of the term, but a mere fact shown in rebuttal of the state's evidence; and, consequently, the evidence introduced to support it should be left to the jury, uninfluenced by any charge from the court tending to place it upon a different footing from other evidence in the case." The head-note fully accords with the opinion reversing the trial court in Humphries v. State, 18 Tex. App. 302, and is as follows: "In a trial for theft, one of the defenses was alibi; and, on the issue raised thereby, the trial court charged the jury as follows: 'If the jury believe that the alibi which has been set up as a defense in the case has been proved, or if they have a reasonable doubt as to the fact of whether said alibi has been proved, they will give the defendant the benefit of it, and acquit him. When an alibi is relied upon as a defense, it rests on the defendant to prove it to the extent of raising a reasonable doubt as to whether the accused is the person who committed the offense charged.' Held error. In no criminal trial is the burden of proof shifted from the state onto the defendant. Proof of alibi is not an affirmative proposition by the defendant, but is an attack upon the inculpatory evidence of the state. It may be such as affirmatively disproves the case made by the state, or it may only suffice to legitimately raise a reasonable offense is shown to have been committed, so as to preclude the possibility of the person's presence at the place of its commission, and that its value consisted in his showing that he was absent from the place where the deed was done at the very time that the evidence tends to fix its commission upon him, and that it is valueless if it be possible that he could have been at both places,—casts a much heavier burden upon the accused than the law justifies. Stuart v. People, 42 Mich. 255.

Where the jury believes, in a criminal prosecution, from the evidence tending to establish an alibi, that the accused was at a place other than that of the commission of the crime at a time indicated by the evidence, and believes that it is improbable therefore that he was present at the time of the commission of the crime, the defense is for their consideration, as such improbability need not be so great as to amount to impossibility; but if it was so great, taking the evidence all together, as to raise a reasonable doubt of his guilt, he is entitled to the benefit of the doubt, and to an acquittal. West v. State, 48 Ind. 483; Adams v. State, 42 Ind. 373.

An alibi is a legitimate defense, and if the evidence touching it is sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused in the minds of the jury, it should be considered, although it does not cover the whole time during which the crime might have been committed. Kaufman v. State, 49 Ind. 248.

Evidence of an alibi is proper for the jury in a criminal prosecution, whether sufficient to render the guilt of the defendant impossible or only improbable; and he is entitled to the benefit of any reasonable doubt which may be raised in the minds of the jury on this point. Miller v. People, 39 Ill. 457.

And while the value and effectiveness of the proof of an alibi largely depend upon the extent to which it embraces the period of the commission of the crime, and, in order to be conclusive the entire time must necessarily be covered, a charge that requires the defendant to affirmatively prove that it was impossible for him to have been present at the scene of the crime is 41 L. R. A.

reversible error, as it might be sufficient if it reasonably satisfies the minds of the jury that he was elsewhere, or, in connection with the other evidence, generates a reasonable doubt that the accused committed the act. Albritton v. State, 94 Ala. 76.

But a statement in an instruction in a criminal prosecution with reference to an alibi, that there must be no doubt about it, will not be deemed erroneous as requiring too high a degree of proof on the part of the accused, where it was followed by an instruction that if there should be in the minds of the jury a well-founded reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the accused they should give him the benefit of that doubt, the last portion of the charge, if applied to the question of the alibi, correcting the error of the previous statement. Sullivan v. People, 31 Mich. 1.

And an instruction in a criminal prosecution that when an alibi is not complete it cannot avail the defendant where the evidence against him was circumstantial and must have raised a strong presumption of his guilt, as in such case it would behoove him to make proof of his alibi to the full satisfaction of the jury, is not reversible error,—especially where the court qualified the expression by adding: "Whether an alibi is proved, is a question for the jury." State v. Reitz, 83 N. C. 634.

And an instruction that among the defenses interposed is what is known as an alibi,—that is, if the defendant was at the time of the alleged killing at another and different place from that at which such killing was done, and therefore was not, and could not have been the person who did the killing, if it was done; and if the evidence raises in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt as to the presence of the defendant at the place where the deceased was killed at the time of such killing then they should acquit,—is not subject to the objection that it required it to be impossible for the defendant to have committed the murder, and it therefore shifted the burden of proof with reference to the alibi from the state to the defendant. Gallagher v. State, 28 Tex. App. 247.

doubt of the guilt of the accused; and in either case he is entitled to an acquittal." To the same effect, Ayres v. State, 21 Tex. App. 399. In Kansas the following instruction was given below, and on appeal held sufficient to compel a reversal: "The burden is upon these defendants to show, by a preponderance of the evidence, that this 'alibi' is fairly made out; that is to say, that they have fairly satisfied you by a preponderance of the evidence that at the time when this offense was committed, and where this offense was committed, they were at another place at that particular time. But, while this is the law surrounding that particular branch of the case, you must at all times, gentlemen, bear in mind that you must be satisfied from all the evidence in the case, beyond a reasonable doubt, as to the guilt of these defendants, or either of them, before you will be justified in convicting him." In Howard v. State, 50 Ind. 190, this language is used: "An erroneous instruction to the jury in a criminal action is not corrected by another which states the law correctly, unless the erroneous one is plainly withdrawn." And in Cunningham v. State, 56 Miss 269, 31 Am. Rep. 360, it was held that "the giving of conflicting instructions is erroneous."

The judgment of conviction should be reversed, and the case remanded, with the direction that the accused be tried according to law.

The inviolability of a trust estate and its accumulations is respected, even in the case of the author of the trust, where no statutory restriction intervenes.

The Code provisions on the subject of trusts neither divest the trustees of their estate, nor the beneficiaries of their residuary estate in the accumulations of the income.

It is not essential that the instrument creating the trust should in so many words, or in set phrase, say that the equitable estate hereby created shall not be assignable by the beneficiary, and that the same shall not be subject to the claims of creditors; it is enough that the language of the testator shows, in the light of surrounding circumstances, that it was his intention that the estate granted should be inalienable and beyond the reach of creditors.

In eight states (Rhode Island, New York, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Tennessee, and Ohio) there are decisions against the validity of restraints on the alienation of equitable life estates; in four states (New Jersey, Missouri, Arkansas, and Wisconsin) there are dicta to the same effect; in one other state (Connecticut) earlier dicta in favor of the validity are overruled by later dicta of a contrary import; in another state (Kentucky) the one decision in favor of the validity is proceeded and followed by cases the other way; and the dictum in another state (Vermont), sometimes supposed to favor the validity of such restrictions, has, in truth, no meaning. The only cases, therefore, to be found in the state courts in favor of the validity, which carry any weight with them, are in the reports of Pennsylvania and Massachusetts.

Van Fleet, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 1st day of January, 1869, William McAvoy died, leaving surviving him, his widow, the defendant Margaret, and two minor children, the defendants, Emma and Delia. He left a will which was admitted to probate on the 23d day of January, 1869, by the probate court of the city and county of San Francisco, of which the material portions are as follows: "Item. I give, devise, and bequeath all my property, of every name, nature, and kind, to my executors aforesaid, in trust to manage and control the same, and to keep the same invested for the following purposes: (1) To provide out of the income thereof for the comfortable support and maintenance of my beloved wife (it being my desire and wish that she shall convey and release to said executors all her interest in my estate and in the community property, and, upon her doing so, she is to be provided with such support and maintenance) as one half of such income will provide. (2) To provide out of said income for the support and education of my two daughters. . . . (4) To accumulate such income until the death of my beloved wife, or until one or both of my said daughters shall marry. Upon the marriage of either daughter, to make over to her, as her separate estate, one fourth of the estate then in the hands of said trustees: and, upon the marriage of the other daughter, to make over a like proportion; and, upon the death of my beloved wife, to transfer and make over a like residue of the estate to my said daughters, share and share alike, or the children of the one which may die before her said mother's death." On January 11, 1869, the defendant, Margaret, in pursuance of the request expressed in the will, conveyed to the executors all her interest in the property in trust to carry out the provisions of said will. The court found, however, that William McAvoy died seized in fee of the property in question; and it follows that the defendant Margaret had no interest in the property except such, if any, as she may have derived under the will. On July 21, 1876, a decree of final distribution was entered, by which the property was distributed to the trustees named in the will (of whom the defendant Byrne is now the sole survivor), to have, hold, and dispose of in accordance with the terms and provisions of said will. On April 27, 1887, the defendant Delia married; and the trustee thereupon conveyed to her one undivided fourth of said property in accordance with the terms of the will. Both of said daughters were of full age at the time of the recovery of plaintiff's judgment, hereinafter mentioned, and their education had been completed. On September 27, 1893, the plaintiff recovered a judgment against the defendants Margaret and Emma for upward of $3,000 on which an execution was issued and returned wholly unsatisfied. Thereupon the plaintiff brought this action against the trustee and the beneficiaries under the will, to subject the interest of the defendants Margaret and Emma in the trust property to the satisfaction of her judgment. The court found that the sum of $100 per month was sufficient for the support and maintenance of each of the defendants, Margaret and Emma, and gave judgment directing the trustee to pay to each of said defendants, out of three fourths of the net income of the property, the sum of $100 per month, and to pay the whole of the residue of said three fourths to the plaintiff in satisfaction of her judgment. On the trial it was shown that certain third persons were creditors of said defendants Margaret and Emma, and that some of them had reduced their debts to judgment; and the defendant Byrne moved to have said persons brought in as parties to this action, which motion was denied by the court.

1. A judgment creditor, by filing a bill in equity to subject equitable assets to the payment of his judgment, acquires an equitable lien on such assets and a priority over any other creditor who has not already filed such a bill. Other judgment creditors who have not filed such a bill are therefore not necessary parties to the action, and their presence is not necessary for the protection of the defendants. The court therefore did not err in refusing to bring in as parties other judgment creditors who had not themselves commenced any such suit.

2. The only question of importance in the case is whether the defendants Margaret and Emma have any interest in the property or income in question, which can be subjected to the claims of their creditors. We think it clear that they have no such interest. It must be noticed at the outset that the provisions of the Civil Code cannot affect this case. The estate of the trustee and the rights of the beneficiaries vested on the death of the testator in 1869, and the Code is not and could not constitutionally be retroactive, so as to divest any of their rights. As there was not at the testator's death any statute in force in this state on the subject, this case must be decided in accordance with the rules of the common law; and, in ascertaining those rules, we may look as well to the decisions in other states of this Union possessing the common law, as to those of the English courts. Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 384, 385.

By the great weight of authority in America, it is settled that the author of a trust to pay to or apply for the benefit of another the income of property, or a portion of such income, may lawfully provide that the interest of the beneficiary shall not be assignable or shall not be subject to the claims of his creditors. Out of the many decisions to this effect, we may refer to Nichols v. Eaton, 91 U. S. 716, 725, 38 L. ed. 254, 257; Steib v. Whitehead, 111 Ill. 247; Broadway Nat. Bank v. Adams, 133 Mass. 170, 43 Am. Rep. 504; Roberts v. Stevens, 84 Me. 325, 381, 17 L. R. A. 266; Lampart v. Haydel, 96 Mo. 439, 446, 2 L. R. A. 113; Jourolmon v. Massengill, 86 Tenn. 81, 100; Garland v. Garland, 87 Va. 758; Oberman's Appeal, 88 Pa. 278, 284; Maryland Grange Agency v. Lee, 72 Md. 161; Wallace v. Campbell, 53 Tex. 329; Wales v. Bowdish, 61 Vt. 27, 4 L. R. A. 819. It is also well settled in the jurisdictions where this doctrine prevails that such provisions need not be express, but may be implied from the general intention of the donor, to be gathered from the terms of the trust, in the light of all the circumstances, 41 L. R. A.

Baker v. Brown, 146 Mass. 369; Pope v. Elliott, 8 B. Mon. 56, and Roberts v. Stevens, 84 Me. 325, 17 L. R. A. 266, and Wales v. Bowdish, 61 Vt. 27, 4 L. R. A. 819. The decisions in England and in some of the American states limit this doctrine to cases where there is an express provision for a cesser or limitation of the estate upon any alienation, or upon bankruptcy, levy of execution, or the like. But we think that the rule established by the decisions we have cited is more consonant with the rules of law and with the principles of reason. Alienability is not an essential attribute of an equitable life estate in property; and there is nothing in the policy of the law prohibiting a donor from providing that his bounty shall be enjoyed only by those to whom he intends to extend it, and that property devoted by him to a trust otherwise valid shall not be diverted from its appointed destination.

The will in question does not, in terms, provide that the interest of the beneficiaries shall not be subject to the claims of their creditors, but its provisions lead to that result by an implication equally strong. By the legal effect of this instrument the entire property is devised to the executors in trust—First, to provide out of one half of the income thereof for the comfortable support and maintenance of the testator's widow, and to provide out of said income for the support and education of his two daughters; second, to accumulate the surplus of one half of said income after providing for the support and maintenance of the widow until her death, and to accumulate the remaining half thereof after providing for the support and education of the daughters (one half of said half until one of the daughters should marry, and the other half of said half until the other daughter should marry); third, to transfer to each of the daughters, upon her marriage, one fourth of the trust property, with one half of the accumulations of one half of the income; and, fourth, upon the death of the widow to transfer to each of the daughters, or to the children of either of them deceased at that time, one fourth of the trust property, with one half of the accumulations of the other half of the income. Under these provisions the only right of the widow is to have the trustee support her during her life out of one half of the income; and the only right of the defendant Emma, until her marriage, is to have a like support out of one fourth of the income. No sums whatever are directed to be paid to either of them during those periods, but the trustee is himself to expend the money for their support. Of course, therefore, no creditor could take any part of the income so appropriated for their support without entirely defeating the provision for that purpose. It is plain, therefore, that under no circumstances can any creditor of the defendant Margaret take any portion of this property; for she has no interest in it, present or prospective, except the right to be supported during her life, which right could not be reached by a creditor without defeating the trust. Johnston v. Zane, 11 Gratt. 552, 569. Nor does the creditor of defendant Emma stand in any better position. Besides her right to a support, which for the reasons shown, cannot be impaired, the only interests she has are a right to one fourth of the property contingent upon her marriage, and a right to another fourth thereof contingent upon her surviving her mother. Until those events occur the trustee must continue to accumulate the surplus income, for neither of them may ever occur; and if they do not occur, the accumulation as well as the corresponding share of the corpus of the property, will belong to some other person. No part of this surplus can therefore be taken by a creditor without defeating the trust for accumulation. An express provision in the will restraining alienation, voluntary or involuntary, would therefore have been no stronger than the necessary implication derived from the purposes to which the property is directed to be applied.

We have not been referred to any rule of law as it stood before the enactment of the Code which is contravened by any provision in this will, and we cannot see any infirmity in any of those provisions. They would be valid even under the English rule (Chambers v. Smith, L. R. 3 App. Cas. 795); and even if they had been for any reason invalid, such invalidity could not now defeat the will, for the decree of distribution is conclusive of the validity of all of its provisions. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1666, 1904; William Hill Co. v. Lawler, 118 Cal. 359; Greenwood v. Murry, 26 Minn. 259. It follows that the plaintiff is not entitled to subject the property in question to her judgment.

This conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider the other questions argued, and, as the facts appear on the face of the findings, no new trial will be required. The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to set aside its conclusions of law, and to enter judgment upon the findings in favor of the defendants.

We concur: Harrison, J.; Garoutte, J.; McFarland, J.

Temple, J., dissenting:

I dissent. If it be held that the case is not governed by the Code provision, then the rule of the common law must prevail. At common law these so-called "spendthrift trusts" were held invalid; the rule being, as was expressed in Brandon v. Robinson, 18 Ves. Jr. 429: "Certainly no man shall have an estate to live on, but not an estate to pay his debts with. Certainly property available for the purposes of pleasure or profit shall be also amenable to the demands of justice." It is said that the American rule of decision is in favor of the validity of such trusts. I doubt this. Certainly in many states the English rule has been approved. In some the matter is controlled by statute. See 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 10. In Nichol v. Levy, 5 Wall. 441, 18 L. ed. 598, it is said: "It is a settled rule of law that the beneficial interest of the cestui que trust, whatever it may be, is liable for the payment of his debts. It cannot be so fenced about by inhibitions and restrictions as to secure to it the inconsistent characteristics of right and enjoyment to the beneficiary, and immunity from his creditors," etc. Such estates are contrary to the policy of our laws, which provides means of subjecting the property of all to the satisfaction of their obligations. Such trusts enable one by his own act to make property exempt from execution, and violate our ideas of equality and fair play. If there is a conflict in the authorities, and we are free to choose, I think the English rule by far most conformable to justice and good policy. I think, also, that the opinion is at variance with the very recent decision in Re Cavarlay, 119 Cal. 406.

Statement by Johnston, J.:

On December 19, 1891, T. E. B. Mason sold to Alexander McLeod the right to manufacture, sell, and use a patent for an improvement in pruning hooks in the undivided half of the state of Texas. The consideration paid by McLeod was a tract of land in Greenwood county, Kansas, together with money and personal property of the aggregate value of $800, and in addition McLeod gave to Mason his promissory note for the sum of $500. Afterwards, on March 8, 1892, a new agreement was entered into between the parties by which McLeod was to surrender his patent to the Texas territory, and give a note for $235, and Mason was to sell to McLeod a right to the territory of Utah, and the state of South Carolina, together with certain counties in western Kansas, and at the same time he was to surrender to McLeod the note of $500. Under this last agreement McLeod did surrender and deliver up to be canceled the patent deed for the Texas territory, and Mason did convey to McLeod the right to the territory of Utah, the state of South Carolina, and also to certain counties in Western Kansas. When the last agreement was made the $500 note given by McLeod in pursuance of the first agreement was held by the State Bank of Leroy, Kansas, as collateral security, but it was agreed by Mason that he would obtain the note from the bank, and that then McLeod would execute his note for $235, and, in exchange, receive the $500 note. Mason never procured the $500 note and McLeod did not execute his note for $235. It was agreed between T. E. B. Mason and Laura A., his wife, that she should have the proceeds of the sales of the patent for the state of Kansas, and in pursuance of that agreement the real estate of McLeod was conveyed to Laura A. Mason, and the personal property was delivered to her. The agreements mentioned were all made in the county of Woodson, and at the time of making the same, as well as at the time of conveying the territory, Mason had not filed with the clerk of the district court of Woodson county copies of the letters patent, duly authenticated, nor had he made an affidavit before the clerk that the letters patent were genuine, and had not been revoked or annulled nor that he had authority to sell and barter the right to the patent; and, further, the note for $500 given in payment of said patent did not have the words, "Given for a patent right," written or printed therein. No false or fraudulent representations were made by Mason concerning the right to territory in the state of Texas at the time of making the sale, nor concerning the new territory of Utah, South Carolina, and part of Western Kansas. On March 17, 1892, McLeod brought an action against T. E. B. and Laura A. Mason to annul the contract made between them, to set aside the deed to the land in Greenwood county which he had conveyed for the patent right, to cancel the $500 note which was still in the possession of Mason, and to recover the value of the personal property which had been transferred as a part of the consideration for the patent right. The court, after finding the facts substantially as above stated, held that the attempted conveyance of the patent right was illegal, and the patent deeds void, and that McLeod was entitled to a judgment for the reconveyance of the real estate previously transferred, for the surrender of the $500 note, and for the sum of $815, the value of the personal property delivered and the money paid for the illegal patent right. The defendants complain and bring the case here for review.

Messrs. R. P. Kelley and W. S. Marlin, for plaintiffs in error:

The statute, which requires a patentee or his assignee to file an authenticated copy of letters patent and make affidavit that he is the owner, and insert the words, "given for a patent right," in all notes taken for patent rights, is unconstitutional as contravening the provisions of the Federal Constitution.

Congress has provided a record to be kept of all patents issued and assignments thereof. Such record is designed for the protection of all persons dealing in patent rights. Congress is the sole judge of what record is proper and sufficient.

Can a state legislature say whether Congress has made ample provision for the convenience of its citizens to obtain inspection of letters patent?

If a statute should try to exercise police powers over articles of a given kind, but discriminate against patented articles, such a statute would be void.

Re Sheffield, 64 Fed. Rep. 888; Re Schechter, 63 Fed. Rep. 695, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 849.

What greater discrimination can be made than by this statute, which exempts all kinds of property from its operations, save patent rights?

The following decisions sustain the sale:

The statute cannot be justified on ground of police power, for the reason in substance the law is not a police regulation, but a mere arbitrary assertion of power.

Johnston, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

No attempt was made by Mason to comply with the statutory requirements concerning the transfer of patent rights, and for this reason the trial court held the contract to be invalid, and adjudged a rescission. The principal question discussed by counsel relates to the validity of the statute in violation of which the contract was made. Among other things, it provides that it is unlawful for any person to sell a patent right in any county of the state without filing with the clerk of the district court copies of the letters patent, and with it an affidavit that the letters patent are genuine, have not been revoked or annulled, and that he has full authority to sell. It is required that the affidavit shall give the name, age, occupation, and residence of the party proposing to sell, and he is required to exhibit a copy of the affidavit to any person on demand. There is a further provision that any person who takes a written obligation in consideration of a patent right shall insert in the body of it, in writing, or print, the words "Given for a patent right." A failure to comply with these provisions is declared to be a misdemeanor, and the penalty is a fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding six months. Laws 1889, chap. 182 (§§ 4005-4007, Gen. Stat. 1889). In our opinion, these provisions do not trench upon the Federal power, nor interfere with the right secured to a patentee by the Federal law. It is true that no state can interfere with the right of the patentee to sell and assign his patent, nor take away any essential feature of his exclusive right. The provisions in question, however, have no such purpose or effect. They are in the nature of police regulations designed for the protection of the people against imposition and fraud. There is great opportunity for imposition and fraud in the transfer of intangible property such as exists in a patent right, and many states have prescribed regulations for the transfer of such property differing essentially from those which control the transfer of other property. There were some early decisions holding that such regulations trespassed upon the Federal power and the rights of the patentee, but recent authorities hold that reasonable police regulations may be enacted by the state without usurping any of the powers of the Federal government, or infringing upon the exclusive rights of the patentee. Brechbill v. Randall, 102 Ind. 528, 52 Am. Rep. 695; New v. Walker, 108 Ind. 365, 58 Am. Rep. 40; Pape v. Wright, 116 Ind. 503; Sandage v. Studebaker Bros. Mfg. Co. 143 Ind.

148, 84 L. R. A. 363; Tod v. Wick Bros. 86 Ohio St. 870; Herdie v. Roessler, 109 N. Y. 127; Haskell v. Jones, 86 Pa. 178; Patterson v. Kentucky, 97 U. S. 501, 24 L. ed. 1115; Webber v. Virginia, 103 U. S. 844, 26 L. ed. 565. The doctrine of these cases is that the patent laws do not prevent the state from enacting police regulations for the protection and security of its citizens, and that regulations like ours, which are mainly designed to protect the people from imposition by those who have actually no authority to sell patent rights, or own patent rights to sell, should be upheld. We think the statute is valid. The purpose of the statute, as we have seen, was to prevent and punish fraud, and noncompliance with its provisions is declared to be a misdemeanor punishable by fine or imprisonment. The penalty implies a prohibition, and contracts made by a vendor of patent rights, in violation of the act, are void as between the parties. The transfer of Mason being illegal, did not constitute a valid consideration for the money or property obtained from McLeod. New v. Walker, 108 Ind. 865, 58 Am. Rep. 40; Sandage v. Studebaker Bros. Mfg. Co. 142 Ind. 148, 34 L. R. A. 363.

It is contended by plaintiffs in error that if the statute is bad all of the parties are in pari delicto, and all should be left without remedy. It appears that the contract finally made was not in fact closed up and completed. The $500 note previously delivered to Mason for the Texas territory was never delivered to McLeod. He had deposited the note as collateral in a bank at Leroy, and it was not then under the control of himself or his wife. The return of this note, and its exchange for the $235 note, was a part of the consideration of the contract, and until these things were done it was not in fact executed. More than that, the general rule that courts will not enforce contracts prohibited by statute, or allow the recovery of money or property paid or delivered in pursuance of them, does not apply to McLeod. He cannot be held to be in pari delicto. The duties prescribed by the statute are imposed upon the vendor of patent rights, and are provided for the protection of purchasers. The law was not violated by McLeod. It placed no burdens upon him, and, having committed no wrong, he is not precluded from asking and obtaining relief. We think the pleadings are sufficient to warrant the findings that were made, and that the judgment should be affirmed.

All the Justices concur.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

Thomas M. FORD, Appl.,
v.

STATE of Maryland.

(35 Md. 465.)

1. Laws and regulations necessary for the protection of the health, morals, and safety of society are within the legitimate exercise of the police powers of the state, provided they are reasonable.
2. Allegations to show that the accused knew what the articles were that he had in his possession are not necessary in an indictment under Laws 1894, chap. 310, § 178, making it unlawful to have possession of any record of numbers drawn in a lottery or of any lottery ticket or anything in the nature thereof, unless they are held for the purpose of procuring or furnishing evidence of a violation of the law.
3. Ignorance of the fact that the articles which a person has in his possession are policy books and slips which it is an offense for him to have under Laws 1894, chap. 310, § 178, does not constitute any defense.
4. The constitutional right of an individual to hold property is subject to those reasonable regulations which are necessary for the common good and general welfare, especially such as affect the health and morals of the people.
5. A person is not deprived of his liberty without due process of law by a statute making it an offense to have possession of prohibited articles, such as a record of lottery drawings, even if he did not know what the articles that he had were.

6. The constitutional right of trial by jury is not infringed by a statute making the mere possession of prohibited articles, even without knowing what they were, an offense.

7. A person is not deprived of the presumption of innocence by a statute making it an offense to have possession of prohibited articles which are of no lawful use.

(April 1, 1897.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Criminal Court of Baltimore City convicting him of violating the lottery laws. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Thomas C. Ruddell and B. Chambers Wickes for appellant.

Messrs. Harry M. Clabaugh, Attorney General, and Henry Duffy for appellee.

Boyd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant was indicted in the criminal court of Baltimore city for violating the lottery laws of this state. There are five counts in the indictment, to the fourth and fifth of which demurrers were filed which were overruled. The traverser then filed a special plea to the fourth and fifth counts, which was demurred to by the state and the demurrer sustained. The case was then submitted to the court on a plea of not guilty and the traverser was found guilty on the fourth and fifth counts and not guilty on the others. During the progress of the trial, he offered certain evidence which was ruled out and an exception was taken to that ruling. Although the rulings of the court on the several demurrers and on the admissibility of the evidence offered are all before us, the principal questions involved in them are the construction and constitutionality of § 178 of chap. 810 of the Laws of 1894.

The portion of that section with which we are particularly concerned on this appeal is the provision that "if any person shall have in his possession in this state any book, list, slip, or record of the numbers drawn in any lottery, whether in this state or elsewhere, or any book, list, slip, or record of any lottery ticket or anything in the nature thereof, mentioned in this section, or of any money received or to be received from or for the sale of any such lottery ticket, or thing in the nature thereof as aforesaid [he] shall be liable to indictment, and upon conviction shall be, in the discretion of the court, fined any sum not exceeding $1,000, or shall be imprisoned for a period not exceeding one year, or shall be both fined and imprisoned; provided, however, that this section shall not apply to any person who may have possession of any of the articles herein mentioned for the purpose of procuring or furnishing evidence of violations of any of the provisions of the laws relating to lotteries."

An examination of our statutes will show numerous efforts on the part of our legislatures to prevent the lottery business from being carried on in this state. Most of the provisions in our present Code looking to that end were in the Code of 1860, and some of the statutes therein codified had been passed many years before that date. Under that Code it was and still is a violation of law to draw any lottery, to sell lottery tickets, policies, certificates or anything by which the vendor or other person promises or guarantees that any particular number, character, ticket, or certificate shall in any event, or on the happening of any contingency, entitle the purchaser or holder to receive money, property, or evidence of debt.

If any person kept a house, office, or other place for the purpose of selling such tickets, policies, certificates, etc., he was subject to a penalty of $1,000, as was the owner of the house or office who permitted it to be used for such purpose. Then § 178 of article 27 of the Code imposed a like penalty on any person who brought into this state any such lottery tickets, policies, certificates, etc., and other provisions with heavy penalties attached are in the Code looking to the suppression of this great evil, but it still existed. The legislature of 1894 went a step further and added to § 178 the provision above quoted, whereby the mere possession of the articles named therein is made a crime, unless it be for the purpose of procuring or furnishing evidence of violations of any of the provisions of law relating to lotteries.

The language of this section is too plain to admit of any discussion as to its meaning. When considered in connection with the previous legislation on this subject, it is evident that the legislature found that the statutes in force were not sufficient to prevent the lottery business in this state, and it was therefore made a crime for anyone to have any of the articles named in his possession, unless it be for the one purpose provided for by the statute—procuring or furnishing evidence of violations of the law. It will be necessary, then, for us to determine whether such legislation is a valid exercise of the powers vested in the state. It cannot now be denied that laws and regulations necessary for the protection of the health, morals, and safety of society are strictly within the legitimate exercise of the police powers of the state, provided, of course, that such regulations be reasonable. Such laws are not prohibited, either by the Federal Constitution or that of this state. The cases of Singer v. State, 72 Md. 464, 8 L. R. A. 551; McAllister v. State, 72 Md. 390; Long v. State, 74 Md. 565, 13 L. R. A. 425; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, and Powell v. Pennsylvania, 137 U. S. 678, 32 L. ed. 253, will illustrate the application of the doctrine without encumbering this opinion with the citation of the numerous other decisions on the subject.

If it be necessary to refer to any authority to show that the laws for the suppression of lotteries are regarded by the courts to be in the interest of the morals and welfare of the people, the cases of Ballock v. State, 73 Md. 1, 8 L. R. A. 671, and Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. S. 814, 25 L. ed. 1079, will suffice to give the views of the Supreme Court of the United States and of this court on that subject. There probably never was a time in the history of this state when it was more necessary than the present to use all legitimate means to stamp out this and kindred evils which are demoralizing so many who might otherwise be useful and honest citizens. The man that is always looking for greater returns than his investment or efforts justify, is generally a useless, if not a dangerous member of society, and a lottery is said to be "a game in which small sums are ventured for the chance of obtaining a larger value." It is not difficult to see why one given up to that sort of business soon becomes worse than useless to his community. The tendency is to make him idle, and idleness easily begets crime. Families are deprived of the comforts and sometimes necessities of life, which are due them because those who should provide them either squander their means in pursuit of such gains, or have had their powers of earning paralyzed, by the pernicious habit of this form of gambling.

In view of the disastrous effect on those dealing with lottery tickets, and upon the community where such business is conducted, there can be no doubt about the right of the legislature to prohibit anyone from having them in his possession if that be reasonably necessary for the suppression of the evil. As the statute makes it a crime to have them in possession, the purpose for which the traverser had them is wholly immaterial, and inasmuch as the legislature did not make the crime dependent upon the knowledge of the party as to what the articles were, it was unnecessary to allege in the indictment that the traverser had them in his possession knowingly, wilfully, or in any other words that would impute knowledge of the fact that they were some of the articles prohibited by the law. The allegations in the indictment were clearly sufficient.

But it is contended that if that be conceded, the effect of the statute was simply to shift the burden to the traverser and he could still prove that he did not have knowledge of what the articles were, and hence was not guilty of a violation of law, and that if the statute must be so construed as to deprive him of that right then it is in conflict with the Constitution of the United States and of this state. This question was intended to be raised by the special plea filed and the offer of testimony stated in the bill of exceptions. The plea alleges that the defendant "was in possession of policy books and slips as stated in said indictment, but also says that he is in no way engaged in the policy business, and that he was not aware that the papers, books, and other articles which were found in his possession were policy or lottery slips; that the said articles were given to him to carry to a certain place and that he was then taking them to that place without knowing what said articles were." The proffer of evidence as stated in the bill of exceptions was "that said articles were given to him by a man who asked him to deliver them to another man; and that he did not know what said articles were, and had no knowledge that they were policy books or anything connected with said business."

It would, of course, be no excuse if the traverser did not know that the law prohibited the possession of these articles. He is, on the contrary, presumed to know that it did. Would, then, his ignorance of the fact that what he had in his possession were policy books and slips excuse him? It is argued that to hold it would not might result in the conviction and punishment of innocent people—that someone might find on the street a book or list of lottery tickets and not know what it was, but be convicted simply because he had it in his possession. We are not informed by the record how the books, lists, slips, and records named in the indictment are made and what they embrace, but in the supplemental brief the learned counsel for the traverser have undertaken to explain them, and we cannot imagine how anyone finding either of them on the street would be induced to take it into his possession unless he knew what it was, for it seems to be merely a collection of figures and letters so arranged as to be utterly unintelligible to anyone not learned in the business, and to an innocent person would certainly not be suggestive of any value. If anyone be so unfortunate as to find one, and while satisfying his curiosity as to what it is a police officer overtakes him, it will be time enough to determine whether he had it in his possession within the meaning of the statute. But if after a person has undoubtedly gotten into his possession one of the prohibited articles he is to be permitted, notwithstanding the language of the statute, to prove that he found it, or did not know what it was, it will make the statute practically useless, for if he swears that such was the case it will generally be impossible for the state to prove the contrary, and will be a great temptation to perjury, not only to the accused, but to others who might come to his assistance.

If a reputable person satisfies the prosecuting officer that he came into possession of it in an innocent way, it is not likely the prosecution would be continued, or if the court be informed of such facts it could take it into consideration in imposing the penalty, and could fine him 15 cents or less, which would relieve him of the cos's. Courts can and frequently do consider facts in imposing penalties that would not bar a prosecution. If, for example, the court is satisfied that the accused was ignorant of the statute under which he was arrested, and if prior to the passage of the statute what is therein prohibited was not unlawful, the court might take the fact that he was ignorant of it into consideration in passing sentence, but still he could be lawfully convicted. So far as the justice of the case is concerned, it would not be more inequitable to punish one for having in his possession what is prohibited, when he did not know that he had it, than to punish him when he did not know it was prohibited, although he knew he had it. But he is presumed to know the law and is therefore punished for its violation, although only unlawful because the statute says so, and why should he not be presumed to know that he had what the law prohibited from being in his possession.

In State v. Baltimore & S. Steam Co. 13 Md. 181, the statute under consideration provided "that it shall not be lawful for any slave to be transported on any railroad, or any steamboat, etc., without a permission in writing from the owner of such slave." The defense was that the company or its agents had no knowledge that the negro was on board and had no intention to violate the law, but the court held that the liability could be enforced without reference to such circumstances. Tuck, J., in delivering the opinion of the court said, "If the legislature deemed it expedient, in view of the grievance complained of, to hold persons responsible for transporting negroes, whether they were instigated by a criminal intent or not, they had the power to do so. Such acts may produce mischief in individual cases, but the inconvenience and injury would be much more general if in every case of this kind the party charged could defend himself by offering evidence that he did not know the negro was on board of the boat, and that reasonable diligence had been used to prevent such persons from coming on board. The law would scarcely afford any protection to slave owners." In Carroll v. State, 63 Md. 551, this court said: "As ignorance of the existence of such law will not excuse, so also ignorance of a fact necessary to be known to avoid a violation of law will not excuse."

In that case there are quotations from 3 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 21, that "where a statute commands that an act be done or omitted, which, in the absence of such statute, might have been done or omitted without culpability, ignorance of the fact or state of things contemplated by the statute, it seems, will not excuse its violation." Again, "such is the case in regard to fiscal and police regulations, for the violation of which, irrespective of the motives or knowledge of the party, certain penalties are enacted; for the law, in those cases, seems to bind the party to know the facts and to obey the law at his peril." The court refers to a note in Greenleaf, where the rule "is said to apply to the sale of any articles, the sale of which is prohibited, and it has been held to be no excuse that the vendor did not know it was the prohibited article." Some of the cases cited in that opinion are very applicable to this case.

Laws of this character have been sustained in numerous decisions, some of which were much more likely to work hardship in individual cases than this statute. In Ex parte Hotcomb, 2 Dill. 392; the defendant was held liable for having in his possession miniature photographs of the United States Treasury notes. Laws prohibiting persons from having game in their possession during specified periods have generally been upheld, although the decisions have differed as to whether the statutes applied to game received from beyond the state, prohibiting the possession. Dickhaut v. State, 85 Md. 451, 38 L. R. A. 765, decided by this court at the present term; Phelps v. Racey, 60 N. Y. 12, 19 Am. Rep. 140; State v. Randolph, 1 Mo. App. 15; Roth v. State, 51 Ohio St. 209; Magner v. People, 97 Ill. 820, and other cases cited in Dickhaut v. State, 85 Md. 451, 38 L. R. A. 765.

Some of the cases construing statutes against carrying concealed weapons, regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors, oleomargarine, milk, etc., might be cited as tending to sustain the position taken by the state in this case, but it is unnecessary, as many of them can be found in the note to § 21, 15th ed. of 8 Greenleaf on Evidence.

It is proper to say, however, that such statutes are dealing with articles that may, under certain circumstances and conditions, be lawfully used; yet the Supreme Court of the United States and other courts in numerous cases have held that the articles could be seized and destroyed by the proper authorities on the principle that the constitutional right of the individual to hold property is subject to those reasonable regulations which are necessary for the common good and general welfare—especially such as affect the health and morals of the people. The policy books and slips found in the possession of the traverser could only be put to one legitimate use in this state—procuring or furnishing evidence of the violations of the lottery law, and it is not contended he had them for this purpose.

But it is contended that the statute deprives the accused of the right of trial by jury and of his constitutional guaranty that he be not deprived of his liberty without due process of law. But the fallacy of the argument is in assuming that it does interfere with those rights. He had the perfect right to prove either that the articles charged in the indictment were not found in his possession, or that those found were not such as the law prohibited him from having. That is the issue made by the statute. It does not deprive him of the presumption of innocence to which he is entitled, but it does make it a crime for him to have in his possession that which is of no lawful use in this state and which injuriously affects the morals and interferes with the welfare of the people. And it is evident that the statute has made the mere possession of the articles a crime because that is the most effectual way to break up the lottery business. The importance of placing the construction we do on the law could not be better illustrated than by what we find in this case and that of McNeal v. State, which were argued together.

The pleas and the evidence offered in the two cases are identical. It may be possible, even if not very probable, that both received the forbidden articles under exactly similar circumstances, but if that be so, it looks as if those engaged in the business have for the purpose of shielding themselves and avoiding detection in the delivery of them, resorted to this method of doing so. If the police authorities ascertain who the agent for selling the tickets is he might be detected in delivering them, so he would call someone to his assistance, and according to the contention of the appellant, if the latter does not know what they are, but they are simply "given to him by a man who asked him to deliver them to another man," then he cannot be convicted, although he have his pockets full of some of the articles prohibited by law from being in the possession of anyone. Such a construction of the law would render its enforcement very difficult, if not impossible. It is safer to give the language of the legislature its ordinary meaning and construe it to mean what it says. We do not fear that the innocent will thereby suffer, but if there be any such danger it is for the legislature, and not for the judicial branch of the government, to correct any defect that may be found, from experience, to exist in the statute, and we find no such objection to it as would give the court the right to declare it invalid.

The judgment must be affirmed.

The implied duty of the owner to use reasonable care in inspecting and repairing a grate in a sidewalk in front of his premises does not cease by leasing a part only of the structure on the abutting land, and its occupation by a tenant, although that part includes, by implication, the exclusive right of the tenant to use the grate as a beneficial appurtenance.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of a General Term of the Supreme Court, Fifth Department, affirming a judgment of the Ontario County Circuit in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to compel defendant to pay the damages which had been recovered against plaintiff for a defect in a sidewalk. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William F. Cogswell, John Gillette, and C. A. Richardson, for appellant.

If premises are in good repair when demised, but afterwards become ruinous or dangerous, the landlord is not responsible therefor, either to the occupant or to the public during the continuance of his lease, unless he has expressly agreed to repair them.

Vann, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By this action the plaintiffs sought to recover the damages which they had been compelled to pay on account of personal injuries sustained by one McSherry, through an accident caused by a defective grate in the sidewalk in front of defendant's premises. For many years prior to 1889 the defendant owned certain land on the northwest corner of Main and Bristol streets, in the village of Canandaigua, bounded on the east and south by the outer line of said streets, and extending 96 feet on Bristol, and 40 feet on Main. A brick block, consisting of several stores, three stories high, substantially covered the lot. In 1872 the grate in question, with several others, was constructed by the defendant along the north line of Bristol street, to enable him and his tenants to convey coal to the cellars under said block; and they remained there without complaint on the part of the public authorities until March 4, 1889, when said McSherry stepped on one of the grates that was out of repair, and was injured. This grate was in the sidewalk in front of a "store" in said block that was leased to one Parsons for a term, which had not expired when said accident happened. The lease gave the defendant no right of access to the premises for any purpose during the term, and imposed upon him no obligation to make repairs. The tenant covenanted to surrender the premises at the end of the term in as good condition as they were at the date of the lease, necessary wear and damage by the elements excepted. The description of the demised premises included the "store," with the privileges and appurtenances, but did not specifically describe or include the use of the sidewalk or the grate, which was in good order when Mr. Parsons took possession. The two stories over the store were retained by defendant or leased to other tenants who could not use the grate, as it was connected only with the premises leased to Parsons. After the commencement of said term, the defendant repaired the grate once, but there was evidence tending to show that it had been out of repair for a number of weeks prior to the accident. When the plaintiffs were sued by McSherry, they notified the defendant to defend, and he aided in the defense; but the action resulted in a judgment against the village for $1,608.29, which, after affirmance both by the general term and the court of appeals, was paid by the plaintiffs. 59 Hun, 616, mem., 35 N. Y. S. R. 432, and 129 N. Y. 612. The recovery in that case was upon the ground that the grating in the sidewalk was out of repair, and that the village authorities knew, or should have known, of the fact.

Upon the trial of the action now before us, the court charged the jury that if they found the grate was not properly reconstructed when repaired in 1888, and that was the cause of the accident, the defendant was liable to the plaintiffs, but, if they found "that it was not a faulty construction, he is not liable, as far as that question goes." No fault is found by the appellant with this part of the charge. The court further charged that, "upon all this evidence, it is for you to say whether or not this defendant, acting with due care and reasonable diligence in the protection of the public against injury, ought to have known the condition in which that grate was. If he ought to have known it, he is in the same position, legally, as if he had actually known it; and, if he had actually known it, the duty rested upon him with diligence to put the walk into condition so it would be reasonably safe for public use. If you find that the defendant did not use reasonable care to ascertain whether or not the grate was in reasonably proper condition for public use, you will find a verdict for the plaintiff." To this the defendant excepted. The court also charged "that Mr. Foster owed no duty to repair the sidewalk generally which can be used as a basis for any recovery here, but he did owe the duty to keep in repair the particular place we are talking about." To this the defendant also excepted. These exceptions present the only question argued before us.

From the length of time the grate was permitted by the representatives of the village to remain in the sidewalk without objection, the presumption arises that it was placed there with their consent. Babbage v. Powers, 130 N. Y. 41 L. R. A.

281, 14 L. R. A. 398; Jorgensen v. Squires, 144 N. Y. 290. The defendant alleged in his answer that the grate was constructed with the consent of the plaintiffs, and therefore, after the lapse of seventeen years, he cannot be held liable as a trespasser, but only, if at all, upon the ground of negligence. Irvine v. Wood, 51 N. Y. 224, 228, 10 Am. Rep. 603. It was his duty, however, as long as he owned and was in full possession of the premises, to use reasonable diligence to keep the grate in repair, so that it would be as safe as any other part of the sidewalk. Congreve v. Morgan, 18 N. Y. 84, 72 Am. Dec. 495; McGuire v. Spence, 91 N. Y. 303, 43 Am. Rep. 668, 2 Shearn & Redf. Neg. 5th ed. § 703. It was built for his accommodation, and was a benefit to his property only; and the law placed upon him the obligation of using due care to keep it in a suitable and safe condition for the public to walk over as a part of the sidewalk. Proper construction, in the first place, was not enough to relieve him from liability; but the duty of inspection and repair continued while he owned and was in the exclusive possession of the premises. The duty ran with the land as long as the grate was maintained for the benefit of the land. As was said as early as Heacock v. Sherman, 14 Wend. 58, 60, the owner "is bound to repair . . . in consideration of private advantage." The doctrine of implied duty, which is well established by the authorities, requires the person who, even with due permission, constructs a scuttle hole in the sidewalk in front of his premises, to use reasonable care for the safety of the public, as long as it remains there and is subject to his control. Babbage v. Powers, 130 N. Y. 281, 14 L. R. A. 398; Wolf v. Kilpatrick, 101 N. Y. 146, 54 Am. Rep. 672; Jennings v. Van Schaick, 103 N. Y. 530; Port Jervis v. First Nat. Bank, 98 N. Y. 550; Davenport v. Ruckman, 37 N. Y. 568; Swords v. Edgar, 59 N. Y. 28, 17 Am. Rep. 295; Briggs v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co 30 Hun, 291; Heacock v. Sherman, 14 Wend. 58; Seneca Falls v. Zalinski, 8 Hun, 571; Whalen v. Gloucester, 4 Hun, 24; Matthews v. De Groff, 13 App. Div. 356; Elliott, Roads & Streets, p. 541; Thomas, Neg. 1145. If, however, the grate is properly constructed in the first place, and is kept in proper repair afterwards, the owner is not liable for the carelessness of a tenant or third parties in using the grate, as by leaving the hole unguarded when in use, or uncovered when not in use. Jennings v. Van Schaick, 103 N. Y. 530.

The precise question now presented is whether an implied duty rests upon the owner to use reasonable care in inspecting and repairing a grate in a sidewalk in front of his premises, when a part only of the structure on the abutting land is leased to and occupied by a tenant, but that part includes, by implication, the exclusive right to use the grate as a beneficial appurtenance. It must be conceded that, as between the defendant and his tenant, there was no obligation on the part of the former to repair, because he had entered into no covenant to that effect, and the duty of a landlord to make repairs rests solely on express contract, so far as his tenant is concerned. Witty v. Matthews, 52 N. Y. 512; Clancy v. Byrne, 56 N. Y. 129, 15 Am. Rep. 391. It must be further conceded that, if the store was in proper condition at the beginning of the term, the owner was not bound to repair it for the protection of those who, upon the express or implied invitation of the tenant, might enter it for the transaction of business or any other purpose. Ahern v. Steele, 115 N. Y. 208, 5 L. R. A. 449. The question before us did not arise between the owner and his tenant, or the patrons of the tenant, but between the owner and the plaintiffs, as representatives of the general public entitled to free and safe passage over the sidewalk as a part of the highway. While the owner cannot be held liable in this action for failing to repair the entire sidewalk in front of his premises, was he properly held liable for failing to keep in repair the grate itself, which was his own structure? This depends upon the duty that he assumed when he cut a hole in the sidewalk, and covered it with the grate. That duty included proper construction in the first place, and reasonable care on the part of the owner to keep the grate in repair thereafter, as long as he continued in possession. The duty sprang from the necessity of having safe sidewalks, and as the necessity is continuous, so is the duty. Upon no other ground can the construction of a grate in a sidewalk, which is an interference with a public highway, be justified, even when permission is duly granted. Upon the transfer of the entire interest and possession to another, as the duty runs with the land, it would be cast upon the grantee. So, a lease of the entire premises, and possession thereof by the tenant, would doubtless throw the burden upon the latter. 2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 5th ed. §§ 710, 718. The conveyance of an undivided interest, however, would not have that effect, and the demise of a part of the premises should not. The obligation goes with the land, and cannot be discharged by a partial alienation of the land, at least unless the alienation, if for a fixed term, carries with it the exclusive possession of the premises for that term. Entire possession by a tenant from foundation to roof doubtless involves the duty of keeping a grate in front of the premises in repair, which otherwise rests on the owner of the fee. But whoever, even by due permission, cuts a hole in the sidewalk for the benefit of his adjoining property, must use reasonable care to protect the public from danger on account thereof. Reasonable care requires that he should provide a proper covering, inspect it from time to time, and repair it when necessary, as otherwise passers-by, for whose benefit the sidewalk is maintained, may be injured. If he parts with the premises, or parts with the possession thereof for a period, the burden falls on his successor in title or possession. If he transfers either title or possession in part only, he does not escape the burden. The implied duty assumed when the hole was cut and the grate placed over it requires reasonable precaution on the part of the owner to protect the public as long as he remains the owner and is in possession of any part of the building on the abutting land. He cannot cast the burden of maintenance on the public any more than he could have cast upon them the burden of original construction, for the grate is wholly for the benefit of his property. Nor can he relieve himself of the duty without parting with the entire possession of the property benefited, for the safety of the public requires that the owner, as long as he is in possession of any part of the property, should be compelled to keep his structure in the sidewalk in suitable condition for use as a part of the sidewalk. As the duty is imposed by law for the public safety, its extent is measured by whatever public safety requires. Anything less than the alienation of the entire property, either permanently, as by deed, or temporarily, as by lease, would leave the public without adequate protection. A person injured by a defective grate should not be subject to the hazard of ascertaining the precise relation existing between the owner and one of his tenants with reference to the control of the grate; but a simple rule, resting upon ownership and possession, in whole or in part, of the adjacent structure, is required by sound public policy.

The argument that the defendant had no right of access to repair the grate, except by consent of the tenant, is without force, for the law imposing the duty was a part of the lease, and impliedly excepted from its provisions such necessary access at reasonable times as would enable the owner to discharge that duty. The lease covered the grate, by implication only, the same as it embraced the rights of the owner in the entire sidewalk in front of his premises. That would not prevent him from rebuilding or repairing the sidewalk proper, when required by municipal ordinance, nor does it prevent him from rebuilding or repairing the grate when required by the common law.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment should therefore be affirmed.

TRAVELERS' INSURANCE COMPANY
of Hartford, Appt.,

v.

William A. FRICKE, Resp't.

1. The license of a foreign insurance company for the current year may be revoked by the insurance commissioner, under Rev. Stat. § 1955, on account of its failure to pay the full license fees required by § 1220 for past years during which it has done business within the state, as its failure to comply with the law is a present, existing failure.

NOTE.—For restrictions on business of foreign insurance company, see note to State, Richards v. Ackerman (Ohio) 24 L. R. A. 298; also People, Stephens, v. Fidelity & C. Co. (Ill.) 26 L. R. A. 296. 41 L. R. A.

2. The state is not estopped from insisting upon the condition prescribed for the business of a foreign corporation by failure of officials to require compliance with the law at the proper time.

3. A foreign corporation having its residence in another state is not entitled to the benefit of the statute of limitations.
4. An action in equity to prevent the revocation of the license of a foreign insurance company for failure to pay license fees cannot be based on the ground that the statute of limitations would prevent an action to collect the fees.
5. Unpaid license fees of a foreign corporation bear legal interest from the date upon which they ought by law to have been paid.

(March 1, 1898.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Dane County in favor of defendant in a suit brought to enjoin the revocation of a license permitting plaintiff to do business in the state. Affirmed.

Statement by Winslow, J.:

This is an action in equity, brought to enjoin the defendant, who is the insurance commissioner of the state of Wisconsin, from revoking a license issued by said commissioner to the plaintiff March 1, 1896. The facts in the case are not materially in dispute, and are as follows: Since the enactment of the Revised Statutes of 1878, up to the time of the commencement of this action, the plaintiff has done both a life and accident insurance business within this state, under licenses issued annually by the various insurance commissioners. During that time the plaintiff has paid, as a license fee for each year, only the sum of $300 up to the year 1895, since which time it has also paid 2 per cent upon its gross accident business within the state, pursuant to the decision of this court in a previous case between the same parties, reported in 94 Wis. 258. In December, 1896, the insurance commissioner demanded of the plaintiff, in substance, that it should pay an additional $300 license fee for the transaction of its accident business for each year since 1880; also the 2 per cent tax for each year since 1880, with legal interest on such sums from the 1st of March in each year, and threatened to revoke the license issued March 1, 1896, in default of such payment. The total amount of the sum so demanded, with interest, is $85,297.74. The plaintiff declined to pay this sum, and immediately brought this action in equity to enjoin the commissioner from revoking its license. The circuit court held, upon these facts, that the insurance commissioner was authorized to revoke its license, and dismissed the complaint, and from this judgment the plaintiff appeals.

Messrs. Winkler, Flanders, Smith, Bottum, & Vilas, for appellant:

Chapter 105 of 1880 declares that the license fee and tax upon the business of accident insurance shall thereafter be the same as those paid by foreign insurance companies. That does not mean the same plus $300.

When chapter 105 of 1880 was enacted, § 1220 was amended according to the terms of that act.

It required of such business the payment of the same fees as a fire insurance company. To 41 L. R. A.

that extent it operated as a repeal, by implication, of so much of § 1220, Rev. Stat., as would make the fees anything other than the same fees paid by foreign fire insurance companies.

Lewis v. Stout, 22 Wis. 234; Burlander v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 26 Wis. 76; Simmons v. Bradley, 27 Wis. 689; Oleson v. Green Bay & L. P. R. Co. 36 Wis. 383; State v. Campbell, 44 Wis. 529; Fire Department of Onkosh v. Tuttle, 48 Wis. 91; Schneider v. Staples, 66 Wis. 167.

The license fees imposed upon these companies, both by § 1220, and chapter 105 of 1880, contain all the characteristics of a tax.

A tax is not a debt.

The license fee is a tax.

It is an involuntary burden laid upon the business itself, and, like all other taxes, is not the subject of contract, but its levy and collection is a proceeding in invitum.

That this license fee is exacted for the purposes of revenue and taxation is demonstrated by the fact that the cost of regulation is provided for by other statutes and paid thereunder by the insurance companies.

The exaction of a sum for a license in excess of what is necessary to cover public expenses, and graduated by the amount of business done, is a tax upon the business, upon its face.

The good faith of the state ought, upon the strongest considerations of fair dealing and honorable conduct, to intervene between this company and the enforcement of an unconscionable claim.

The appellant has been induced by the tender of certain conditions to continue in business from year to year, and to accept from the state a license to conduct such business.

The appellant was asked to pay a certain sum after 1890, which it thought in excess of the legal fee. It asserted its belief in good faith and its contention was assented to for years. Had it paid the additional fee, even under protest, and it had afterwards proved to be more than the state or commissioner could legally have exacted, appellant could not recover back the excess, for, under all the authorities, the payment would be deemed voluntary.

Can a party who has paid all that under the law he conceives that he ought to pay, and all that the official of the state, who is charged with the duty of assessing and collecting the impost, conceives that he ought to pay, be assumed to promise that he will pay more.

The contemplation clearly is that the party has paid all that is due and that nothing more is to be demanded of him.

If the commissioner has erred as to the law, the transaction, so far as it remains executory, can be annulled. When he discovers his own error he can annul the license, or he may cause an action to be brought to annul it.

Although the statute does not expressly provide that an action may be brought, nevertheless an action in the nature of debt or assumpsit will lie for the collection of the fees, and the mere fact that the former commissioners of insurance might have insisted upon the payment of such fees prior to the issuing of the license in no way affects the right to bring such action.

The fact that there has been delay in the collection of these fees is no bar to the right of the state now to insist upon their payment.

United States v. Kirkpatrick, 9 Wheat. 720, 6 L. ed. 199.

Winslow, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the former action in equity brought by this same company, and reported in 94 Wis. 258, the question presented and decided was whether the insurance commissioner had power to revoke the license of the plaintiff to do an insurance business in this state on account of failure to pay the license fees required by law for the year for which the license was issued. In the present suit the question presented is whether the insurance commissioner has power to revoke the defendant's license for the current year, on account of its failure to pay the full license fees accruing for past years, during which it has done business in this state under license. We have no intention of reviewing again the questions discussed and decided in the previous action. The statutes were then deliberately considered and construed, and the conclusions then reached are entirely satisfactory; and, so far as applicable, they will be applied to the present case. It was then held, in effect, that the annual license fees required to be paid by foreign insurance companies desiring to do business in this state were levied upon the business transacted, and not upon the company transacting the business; that chapter 105 of the Laws of 1880 (Sanborn & B. Anno. Stat. § 1953a), was an amendment simply to § 1220, Rev. Stat., and that it added to the fees previously required the payment of 2 per cent upon the gross income received upon accident business during the preceding year; that the doctrine of practical construction had no application, because the statute was plain, and not doubtful; and that the commissioner had a right to revoke the license for the current year on account of failure to pay the 2 per cent upon the previous year's business. The question of the power of the commissioner to revoke the current license on account of past defaults in payment of license fees was expressly reserved for future consideration, and that is the question now to be decided. When it was held that the license fees were fees levied upon the business, and not upon the company transacting the business, it necessarily followed under the provisions of § 1220, Rev. Stat., that a foreign company which transacted both life and accident business in this state was required to pay two fees of $300 each, and, in addition, was required to pay 2 per cent upon its previous year's income arising from the accident business. The plaintiff company has been such a company ever since the enactment of the Revised Statutes, and it has paid but one fee of $300 during each year, although doing both kinds of business; and hence it has failed to comply with the law in this respect, as well as in omitting to pay the 2 per cent additional required by chapter 105 of the Laws of 1880.

The default of the plaintiff company being established, the vital question for consideration is as to the power of the commissioner to revoke an existing license on account of such default. It is not, and cannot now be, denied that the plaintiff company could only transact business in this state by permission of the state, and under such conditions as the state might impose. This principle has been laid down again and again in no uncertain terms. Ryan, Ch. J., in State, Drake, v. Doyle, 40 Wis. 175, 22 Am. Rep. 692, says: "Save by voluntary license of the state, the insurance company has no right to carry on its business within the state. . . . Authorizing such license, out of its mere discretion it was competent for the legislature to impose any conditions, reasonable or unreasonable, and to provide for revocation, upon any cause or no cause, in any manner it might see fit." See also Fire Department of Milwaukee v. Helfenstein, 16 Wis. 186; Lewis v. American Sav. & L. Assn. (Wis.; present term), 89 L. R. A. 559. These propositions being impregnable, we may at once proceed to consider what power of revocation the legislature has given to the commissioner of insurance. Sanborn & B. Anno. Stat. § 1935, provides as follows: "If any such corporation [referring to foreign insurance corporations] shall violate or fail to comply with any provision of law applicable thereto, or in case its capital shall be impaired and shall not be made good, within such time as the commissioner of insurance shall require according to § 1964, it shall be the imperative duty of said commissioner to revoke any and every authority, license, or certificate granted to such corporation or any agent thereof to transact business in this state." etc. It is argued that the power here granted to the commissioner is "not a power of revision of the past, but of provision for the future;" that the language is prospective and not retrospective; and that, for defaults occurring during the existence of previous annual license, there can be no revocation of an existing license the fees for which have been fully paid. Carried to its legitimate result, this argument would produce this result: that, when a license was once issued by the commissioner, all past matters, even in connection with the issuance of the license itself, would become a sealed book. It might have been obtained without compliance with the necessary provisions, and yet it could not be revoked, because the power of revocation is only given to be exercised upon violations occurring after the issuance of the license. We do not say that this was the argument made by the appellant, but that such is the ultimate effect of the argument. It is manifest, of course, that such could not have been the intent of the legislature; and it was substantially admitted on the argument that, in case of the failure to comply with any of the provisions which are a prerequisite to the issuance of a given license, that license might be revoked; but it was argued that this was the extent of the power of revocation, and that for the defaults occurring during the existence of previous licenses there could be no revocation. Certainly, this position seems reasonable, as applied to defaults which might be called "temporary," as distinguished from "contin-ing" defaults. For instance, in case the company had failed during some previous year to file a copy of its charter or appoint its resident attorney, but had supplied the omission before the issuance of the current license, it would seem that there could scarcely be a revocation of the existing license on account of such default. But can such an argument be applied to a failure to pay the lawful license fee? Is not this a continuing failure to comply with the law, and just as much a present failure as it was during the year when it occurred? Certainly, it was a legal duty then to pay the required fee. Did the duty cease at the end of the year? Has the lapse of time made it any the less a duty? Has the offense been condoned by the issuance of new licenses, decorated with gilt seals? So long as the fee remains unpaid, is it not a present failure to comply with the law, just as much as it was in the year when it occurred? We are unable by any chain of logical reasoning to say that this failure to comply with the law is a failure which is past and closed, and that it is not an existing failure as well. If it be a present existing failure, then the present existing license may be revoked because of such failure, under the strictest construction that can be given to the law.

It avails nothing to say that this license fee is essentially a tax, and that no action lies to recover a tax unless it be given by express statutory enactment. Concede for the moment that this be so, the failure to pay the lawful license was none the less a failure to comply with the provisions of the law when it occurred, and none the less a continuing failure up to the present time. Is it a hardship? No more a hardship now than it would have been if the annual amounts had been paid at the times required by the law. If a hardship at all, it is a hardship imposed by the law itself, and the legislature had full power to impose the hardship, if such in fact it be. But, whatever the rule be in other jurisdictions, it is not a tax under the decisions of this court. It was distinctly held by this court more than thirty years ago that substantially such a requirement as the one before us was not an exercise of the power of taxation. In Fire Department of Milwaukee v. Helfenstein, 16 Wis. 186, this court had before it a law requiring the agents of foreign insurance companies to pay to the fire department of the city of Milwaukee annually 2 per cent of the premiums collected by them in such business, and the law was attacked as an unconstitutional exercise of the taxing power, in that it violated the rule of uniformity in taxation. In passing upon this contention, it was said that this requirement was not an exercise of the power of taxation, "but only a proper exercise of the police power inherent in the sovereignty of the state." The same general principle was afterwards approved and applied to laws requiring the payment of dog licenses and licenses for the sale of liquors (Tenney v. Lenz, 16 Wis. 566; State, Henshall, v. Ludington, 33 Wis. 107); and it must be considered as the settled law of this state. The principle is not infringed upon by the decisions holding that the license fees required of railroad companies for operating their roads and cars within this state are, in substance, taxes. These license fees are imposed upon an inherently lawful business, in lieu of taxes, the property of the company being entirely exempted from ordinary taxation, and are necessarily construed to be in the nature of taxation, and not as an exercise of police power; but in none of these cases are the principles laid down in Fire Department of Milwaukee v. Helfenstein, 16 Wis. 186, in any respect overruled. Being a mere condition imposed as the price of a privilege, which might be refused entirely, it logically follows that, when the privilege is requested, obtained, and used, the corporation obtaining the privilege impliedly agrees to the conditions which go with it and upon which alone it can be obtained. Fire Department of Oshkosh v. Tuttle, 48 Wis. 91, 50 Wis. 552.

By accepting the license and doing business under it, the company undoubtedly bound itself to comply with the law governing the issuance of the license. Lewis v. American Sav. & Loan Assn. (Wis.) 89 L. R. A. 559. Nor, upon familiar principles, is the state estopped from now insisting upon the condition on account of the failure of its officers to require compliance with the law at the proper time. The law was plain, and, as before stated, there was no room for the application of the doctrine of practical construction. Nor does the statute of limitations apply, for two reasons: (1) the plaintiff was a foreign corporation all of the time, and had its residence in another state. Larson v. Aultman & T. Co. 86 Wis. 281. (2) This is not an action to collect the unpaid fees, but simply an action in equity, to prevent the commissioner from revoking the license.

We perceive no error in adjudging that the unpaid license fees bear legal interest from the various dates upon which they ought by law to have been paid. The plaintiff has not only had all the benefit of its license, but has also had the use of the license moneys during all the time, and presumably has obtained legal interest thereon. During that time, also, the state has been deprived of the use of the money which it was entitled to have in its treasury. If, as held in this opinion, there was an implied agreement by the company when it obtained a license, and did business thereunder, that it would perform all the requirements of the law, including the payment of the fees required at the proper time, no reason appears why the unpaid fees should not bear interest. In connection with the entire matter, it should be remembered that this is an action in equity, and not a mere action at law. Even supposing that the propositions here decided were doubtful, it would not necessarily follow that the plaintiff, standing confessedly in arrears to the state in sums aggregating many thousands of dollars, could invoke the aid of equity to stay the hand of the commissioner in an apparent effort to carry out the plain will of the law-making power. The judgment of the circuit court was, in our opinion, right.

Judgment affirmed.

Cassoday, Ch. J., dissenting:

All agree that during the years in question the state had the absolute power to exclude foreign insurance companies from doing any business in this state, and that such plenary power included the authority to prescribe the conditions upon which such companies might be allowed to do business within the state. Of course, each company was at liberty to accept or reject such conditions. Without attempting any argument or to give any reasons therefor, I am forced to dissent from the conclusions reached by my brethren, on the ground that the statute which makes it the imperative duty of the commissioner to revoke any license granted to such corporation for any violation or failure "to comply with any provision of law applicable thereto" (Sanborn & B. Anno. Stat. § 1955) is not, in my judgment, broad enough to cover and include failures to pay license fees which might properly have been exacted by the commissioner for licenses which expired before the license here sought to be revoked was issued, but which was never before exacted. By granting such expired license, without exacting the full amount which might have been exacted for the same, and then, after the expiration of such license, to exact and enforce payment of the balance, would, necessarily, deprive the company of the legal right which it clearly possessed, of rejecting the conditions which are for the first time exacted. In other words, by paying all that was exacted for such expired license at the time it was granted, the state is in no position, after such license has expired, to claim an implied obligation to pay an additional sum, which the company had the legal right to reject had it been made when that license was issued, or at any time during the existence of such license. These views have some support in the construction which this court has heretofore given to this and other sections of the statute applicable. State v. United States Mut. Acci. Assn. 69 Wis. 76. True, such exaction was not a tax, within the meaning of the provision of our state Constitution which requires the rule of taxation to be uniform. Nor was it a direct tax in any sense, since it was not imposed specifically upon any particular property, person, or corporation. Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 157 U. S. 429, 39 L. ed. 759, 158 U. S. 601, 39 L. ed. 1108. But it was, nevertheless, an indirect tax in the same sense that an impost, duty, or excise is a tax; and that they are species of taxes is elementary. 1 Story, Const. Law, § 950; State, Sanderson, v. Mann, 76 Wis. 475 and 480.

In my judgment, such exaction which the state might have made, and which, if made, the company was at liberty to reject, but which was never, in fact, made and insisted upon, cannot properly be regarded as an obligation implied by law upon contract or otherwise, even if such obligation might be implied from the imposition of a direct tax. The company was only obliged to perform such conditions as it voluntarily accepted and agreed to perform; and the one now sought to be enforced is a condition which it expressly repudiated, and never agreed to perform.

(.....Wis.....)

1. Taking the testimony of the plaintiff at her own house, to which the presiding judge and the jurors go for that purpose, against the defendant's objection, although it cannot be regarded as done in open court, does not deprive the court of jurisdiction or nullify the judgment, but is at most an irregularity.
2. Allowing the plaintiff in an action for personal injuries to exhibit her actual condition to the jury by lying on a lounge with her physician attending her when her testimony is taken, and allowing her daughter to weep, are not ground of reversal.
3. The fact that hypothetical questions to a physician are based in part upon his personal examination and knowledge does not make them objectionable.
4. Mistakes or errors of a physician or surgeon who was employed in the exercise of ordinary care will not preclude the recovery of all the damages sustained from personal injuries.

And a constitutional guaranty that every person accused of crime shall have a public impartial trial, and that the accused shall have the right to appear and defend in person and by counsel, implies that the trial shall be conducted in open court and under protection of the court. O'Brien v. People, 17 Colo. 561.

Nor is a trial conducted in part away from the place appointed for the holding of the court, in the absence of the judge and of the accused, that trial to which every man accused is entitled within the meaning of the constitutional right guaranteed to every person charged with a crime to be confronted with the witnesses against him. Foster v. State, 70 Miss. 755.

And a hearing of testimony in a prosecution for felony, by the jury at a place other than that at which the court was being held and in the absence of the trial judge, constitutes error for which the judgment must be reversed. O'Brien v. People, 17 Colo. 561.

So, the trial of a case cannot be removed from the place appointed for the trial of cases, and be allowed to proceed in the streets of a city or on a line of a railroad by the running of trains for the observation of the jury, taken while in a position analogous to that of the person in whose behalf the action is brought. Moore v. Chicago, St. P. & K. C. R. Co. 98 Iowa, 484.

And it cannot be claimed in an action against a railroad company for a personal injury that the question of the removal of the jury to the street is not involved in an appeal because the court directed a verdict for the defendant on the evidence introduced by the plaintiff, without any consideration of that part of the trial which occurred in the 41 L. R. A.

The testimony of witnesses too ill to go to the court-house has been taken at their homes before the court and jury in some of the most important criminal trials ever had in the state. It is right in principle and upon precedent.

streets where the order directing the verdict was authorized. Moore v. Chicago, St. P. & K. C. R. Co. 93 Iowa, 484.

And in a county where there is a regular court-house provided and used for the holding of courts the court has no authority, unless by consent of the parties, to adjourn to a private house for the purpose of taking the testimony of a sick witness who is unable to attend at the court-house, and if done the court so sitting is without jurisdiction under Iowa Code, § 173, providing that courts must be held at the place provided by law, except for the determination of actions, special proceedings, and other matters not requiring a jury, when they may by consent of the parties therein be held at some other place. Funk v. Carroll County, 98 Iowa, 158.

So, in Cooper v. American Central Ins. Co. 8 Colo. 318, involving the validity of a judgment rendered by the judge who tried the case after the term of court at which the trial was had, had expired, it was said that a judgment is the sentence of the law resulting from proceedings instituted, and is a judicial act which must be pronounced by the court at a time and place appointed by law.

Where from special emergency steps are taken in a cause before a special judge while another cause is on trial rendering it necessary to occupy a room in the court-house other than the court room, however, error is not available, if it exists, when it is manifest that no substantial injury has been done. Reed v. State, 147 Ind. 41.

And the act of probate justices in probating a will at a place other than the county seat, where they were required by law to do all official business at the county seat, is erroneous merely, and not absolutely void. Le Grange v. Ward, 11 Ohio, 237.

And the probate of a will may be taken within the county at a place other than the county seat by probate justices whose jurisdiction is limited only by the county lines, and such probate is evidence to establish the will. Le Grange v. Ward, 11 Ohio, 237.

So, the adjournment of the court in an action on Kellogg v. Janesville, 84 Minn. 132.

Cassoday, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by reason of an alan account by the presiding judge to the house of an assistant judge who was ill and unable to leave his residence which was situated in the same village with the court-house, and the rendition of judgment at that place, are within the power of the court under Vt. Comp. Stat. chap. 44, § 5, providing that the county court for that county shall be held in such village, and Vt. Rev. Laws, § 804, providing that the supreme and county courts when the state of business requires it may adjourn their respective courts within the county in which they are usually held to any day previous to the next stated term. Bates v. Sabin, 64 Vt. 511.

And the proceedings of the court in an action in which the judge directed the jury, officers, parties, and witnesses to repair to a neighboring law office while arguments in a preceding trial were being made, where such judge called and swore the jury and swore the witnesses and heard the testimony and received the verdict and discharged the jury and delivered the proceedings to the clerk, after which he returned to the bench and conducted the business of the court as usual, though irregular, do not render the judgment therein void, or authorize its reversal, when the complaining party took part in all the proceedings, and there was nothing to show that he did not have a fair trial, or that a different judgment should have been rendered. Mohon v. Harkreader, 18 Kan. 888.

When a case is finally submitted to the jury, and they retire for deliberation, the place of trial is unchanged, and there is simply a temporary removal of the jury, whether they retire to the next room leged defective sidewalk on the westerly side of South River street, in Janesville, about 1 o'clock in the afternoon of October 18, 1893. Issue being joined and trial had, the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and assessed her damage at $5,000. From the judgment entered thereon the defendant brings this appeal.

It appears from the record that after the cause came on for trial, May 17, 1897, and the jury had been sworn, the plaintiff's counsel stated to the court, in substance, that the plaintiff, who resided near Evansville, was unable to attend the trial at the court house, and asked leave to take her testimony, and requested that the presiding judge and the jury be present at her home at the taking of her testimony; that the defendant objected to such request, and to having any part of the cause tried away from the court house, and then offered to waive any objection as to notice, and to consent to take her deposition in the ordinary way, and allow it to be read on the trial. The court, however, granted the plaintiff's request, to which the defendant excepted; and thereupon the presiding judge and the jurors sworn in the case were taken to the plaintiff's home, near Evansville, in charge of the sheriff; and the plaintiff was carried into their presence upon a lounge, and was sworn and testified as a witness in her own behalf while so lying upon the lounge, and being administered to by her physician. Error is assigned because such testimony of the plaintiff was so taken at her home, in the presence of the jurors and the presiding judge, instead of being taken in the court-house in Janesville. The statute provides that "each county shall at its own expense provide at the county seat, a court-house . . . and keep the same in good repair. . . . Until such court-house be provided or when the court house shall from or are taken to a building many blocks away. State v. Adams, 20 Kan. 311, dictum.

And the sentencing of a person tried and convicted on a criminal accusation is not a part of the trial so as to invalidate the action of the court in pronouncing the sentence in a room other than the usual public court room within the meaning of § 13 of the Indiana Bill of Rights, which secures to an accused the right of a public trial. Reed v. State, 147 Ind. 41.

It is to be observed, with reference to the cases above set forth which appear to conflict with the doctrine of the principal case, that the constitutional provisions held to be violated by a trial held in part away from the place appointed for the holding of the court apply to criminal cases only, and in each case the absence of the judge was also an element of the decision; and that in Moore v. Chicago, St. P. & K. C. R. Co. 93 Iowa, 484, supra, which was a view case, the point of the controversy was the propriety of permitting experiments before the jury on a view, and that in Funk v. Carroll County, 96 Iowa, 158, supra, the decision turned upon the construction of the language of a particular statute, and that in Cooper v. American Central Ins. Co. 8 Colo. 818, supra, the question was with relation to the time of the rendition of the judgment,—the rendition after the term of court,—rather than with relation to the place of its rendition.

As to views by the jury regarded in some courts as proceedings in the cause, see note to People v. Thora, — L. R. A. —.

any cause become unsafe, inconvenient, or unfit for holding court, the county board shall appoint some other convenient building at the county seat, for that purpose temporarily; and such building shall then be deemed the courthouse for the time being for all purposes." Sanb. & B. Anno. Stat. § 656. The statute also provides that "whenever it shall be deemed unsafe or inexpedient by reason of [certain calamities, therein mentioned], to hold any court at the time and place appointed therefor, the justices or judges of the court may, [by an order in writing], appoint any other place within the same county, and any other time for holding the same; and the said adjourned session shall be taken as part and continuance of said term, and all proceedings in the said court may be continued at said adjourned times and places and be of the same force and effect as if said court had continued its sessions at the place it was holden before such adjournment." Id. § 2574. This court has held "that a county can only have one county seat, and that the court house must be at the county seat, except in the special cases prescribed, when from necessity courts may be temporarily held elsewhere." Pepin County v. Prindle, 61 Wis. 307. To the same effect, White County Comrs. v. Guin, 136 Ind. 562, 22 L. R. A. 402. It will be observed that our statute does not expressly require the circuit court to be held at the county seat, as in some of the states (Funk v. Carroll County, 96 Iowa, 158), nor as required of the county courts in this state (Rev. Stat. § 2440). Nevertheless it would certainly be error to hold a circuit court at a place other than the county seat, except in cases prescribed by statute. We cannot regard the proceeding at the home of the plaintiff as being taken in open court, although it must be regarded as a proceeding in the action. The important question is whether the irregularity in the manner of taking the plaintiff's testimony was such as should work a reversal. There is no pretense that she was not regularly sworn before giving her testimony, nor that any of the jurors or the presiding judge was absent during any portion of the time her testimony was being taken, nor that the defendant's counsel did not have and exercise the full opportunity to cross-examine her at length. The proceeding was somewhat similar to a view of "the premises or place in question, or any property, matter, or thing, relating to the controversy between the parties," by the presiding judge and jury, which a trial court, in a proper case, is expressly authorized by statute to order. Rev. Stat. § 2852. While we may not be willing to go to the extent of some courts in upholding trials and adjudications had outside of the courthouse, yet the authorities are ample to support the proposition that the taking of the plaintiff's testimony in the manner indicated did not deprive the court of jurisdiction, nor nullify the judgment, but was at most an irregularity. Le Grange v. Ward, 11 Ohio, 257; Molon v. Harkreader, 18 Kan. 383; State v. Peyton, 33 Mo. App. 522; Bates v. Sabin, 64 Vt. 511; Reed v. State, 147 Ind. 41. Being a mere irregularity, the question recurs whether it is such an error as should work a reversal. The statute expressly requires this court to disregard any error in the proceedings which does not affect the substantial rights of the adverse party, and declares that no judgment shall be reversed or affected by reason of such error. Rev. Stat. § 2829. This court has applied that statute in cases too numerous to mention. In our judgment, the substantial rights of the defendant were not prejudiced or affected by the taking of the plaintiff's testimony in the manner indicated. The theory of counsel seems to be that the plaintiff's appearance upon the lounge, with her attending physician, may have created sympathy on the part of the jury; but that is just as likely to occur in any case where the injured party appears in court as a witness upon the trial. If the condition and appearances of such party are genuine, then there is no good reason for concealing them. If, on the contrary, they are feigned, then the jury are quite likely to detect the pretension; and so the influence is liable to operate against the party, as well as in his favor, according to the facts. We must hold that the taking of the plaintiff's testimony in the manner indicated, although irregular, is not reversible error. We perceive no error in allowing the plaintiff to exhibit her actual condition to the jury, nor in allowing her daughter to weep.

Error is assigned by reason of exceptions taken to certain hypothetical questions put to the physicians. These questions are lengthy. It is enough to say that they appear to contain nothing but what is supported by evidence. Upon objection being made, counsel were informed that if there was anything as to the plaintiff's condition not embraced in the question and the defendant's counsel would point it out, then it might be added, but nothing additional was suggested. The criticism that the question was indefinite, is without foundation. The mere fact that the questions were in part based upon the personal examination and knowledge of such physicians did not make them objectionable. The rules of law applicable to such questions have frequently been stated by this court in cases cited by the respective counsel, and need not be restated here. Quinn v. Higgins, 63 Wis. 864, 58 Am. Rep. 805; Kreuziger v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 73 Wis. 158; Smalley v. Appleton, 75 Wis. 18; Vodbury v. Putney, 80 Wis. 523, 14 L. R. A. 226; Zoldoske v. State, 83 Wis. 580; Louisville, N. A. & O. R. Co. v. Wood, 118 Ind. 544; Louisville, N. A. & O. R. Co. v. Fulvey, 104 Ind. 409.

Error is assigned because the court charged the jury that "the plaintiff is not held responsible for the errors or mistakes of a physician or surgeon in treating an injury received by a defect in the street or sidewalk, providing she exercises ordinary care in procuring the services of such physician. Where one is injured by the negligence of another, or by negligence of a town or city, if her damages have not been increased by her own subsequent want of ordinary care she will be entitled to recover in consequence of the wrong done, and the full extent of damage, although the physician that she employed omitted to employ the remedies most approved in similar cases, and by reason thereof the damage to the injured party was not diminished as much as it otherwise should have been. Such charge is certainly supported by authority as well as reason. Loesser v. Humphrey, 41 Ohio St. 378; Louisville, N. A. & O. R. Co. v. Fulvey, 104 Ind. 411, 424; Reed v. Detroit, 103 Mich. 224; Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Blum, 109 Ill. 20, 50 Am. Rep. 601; Rice v. Des Moines, 40 Iowa, 638; Stover v. Bluehill, 51 Me. 439; Tuttle v. Farmington, 58 N. H. 18; Boynnton v. Somersworth, 58 N. H. 821; Lyons v. Erie R. Co. 57 N. Y. 489; Baradwell v. Jamaica, 15 Vt. 438.

The wrongdoer may well anticipate that the person injured will employ a physician or surgeon, and in doing so will exercise ordinary care in making the selection; but, where that is done, such person cannot be expected to assume the responsibility of the very highest degree of skill. This court has gone so far as to hold that, "where personal injuries result proximately from negligence or other tort, the wrongdoer is liable for the damages actually sustained, although they are increased by a tendency to disease on the part of the person injured." McNamara v. Clintonville, 62 Wis. 207, 51 Am. Rep. 732.

This disposes of the principal errors assigned. Others are mentioned, but they are not such as require particular consideration. They must be regarded as overruled. Certainly there is evidence sufficient to sustain the verdict.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

Bardeen, J., dissenting (filed July 7, 1898):

The record in this case shows that, after the trial had commenced, at the request of plaintiff's counsel, the judge, the attorneys on both sides, the reporter, together with the jury and the sheriff, left the court-house, in the city of Janesville, and proceeded to Evansville, some 15 miles away, and continued court proceedings at the home of the plaintiff, by taking her testimony in the same manner as though present in court. This was done against the protest of defendant's counsel, and in the face of an offer by them to go and take the deposition, waiving any objection to its use at the trial. The majority opinion virtually concedes that court proceedings can only be lawfully had at the place duly appointed for holding such court. While there is no express statutory provision saying that the courts shall be held at the county seat, the fact that they have been so held since the state was organized, and the further fact that authority is given by law to the judge to appoint some other place to hold court than the place usually designated therefor, implies that it cannot be changed except for the causes stated in the statute. Rev. Stat. § 2574. The implication thus arising is as potent and binding as though there had been an express prohibition in the statute against the itinerancy of the court. The mischiefs that might arise from permitting a court to assume a vagrant character, and to travel from place to place, are so manifold that it requires no argument for their demonstration. It needs but the suggestion of the fact to bring to the mind a panorama of trouble that might follow, fatal alike to the rights of parties and to the dignity of the court. So far as I can discover, courts have uniformly held that the acts and proceedings of a court outside of the place appointed by law for holding the same are void. The law is so stated in White County Comrs. v. Gwin, 136 Ind. 562, 23 L. R. A. 402, and this conclusion is in harmony with good sense and sound reason. See also Williams v. Reutezel, 60 Ark. 155; Funk v. Carroll County, 96 Iowa, 158. I desire to emphasize the fact that such proceedings are void, as distinguished from irregularities, because, as I view it, this court has mistakenly treated the procedure of the trial court in this case as a mere irregularity. The theory upon which this branch of the case was disposed of is that the proceeding of the trial court amounted simply to the taking of the deposition of plaintiff,—an irregularity or error in discretion, cured by the beneficent provisions of § 2829, Rev. Stat. This conclusion is not in harmony with the record. The testimony of plaintiff was taken the same as if she were in open court, at the proper place, but in fact at a farm house more than 15 miles distant from the county seat. There is no pretense of its having been offered as a deposition. The proceeding was nothing, if not a proceeding in court. If a deposition, it was contrary to every rule of procedure, and inadmissible against defendant's objection. It was a proceeding contrary to every rule of correct practice, prejudicial to defendant's rights, and derogatory to the dignity of the court. It was a complete departure from the ordinary course of legal procedure, and without right or authority. If the proceeding was void, it cannot be cured by resort to the statute. It tinctured the whole case with error so plain and palpable as to render the judgment utterly void. Because of its flagrancy, and lest it become a precedent for future departures from correct practice by trial courts, I desire to here enter my protest against glossing it over or excusing it as an irregularity.

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Orange County Court made during the trial of an action brought to recover for the destruction by defendant's trustees of plaintiff's property to prevent injury to a highway which resulted in a verdict in defendant's favor. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John H. Watson, for plaintiff:

The trustees being public officers, the presumption of law is that they acted in the premises in good faith; and if said property could have been taken by them under the right of eminent domain, for public use, it follows that they were acting within the scope of their authority. But, if this was a taking of private property for public use, within the meaning of the law, the plaintiff was entitled to compensation therefor from the defendant, and to thus take his property without such compensation renders the defendant liable in this action.

The act being done by direction of the trustees of defendant, acting in good faith, the defendant is liable.

If it was an interference with the flow of a natural stream of water whereby plaintiff was injured, defendant is liable.

Lewis, Em. Dom. §§ 61, 66, 104.

The trustees are made the servants or agents of the corporation for the purposes named. The corporation thereby undertakes to perform those duties by means of its agents or servants whom it can direct, and not because imposed upon it by law.

Under such circumstances, a municipal corporation is responsible for a tort committed by such agents.

Deane v. Randolph, 132 Mass. 475; Hawks v. Charlemont, 107 Mass. 414; Sullivan v. Holyoke, 135 Mass. 278.

Messrs. Smith & Sloane, for defendant:

The trustees were not acting, and could not act, as the servants of the village, which is a municipal corporation.

Clark v. Easton, 146 Mass. 48.

The action of the trustees, if necessary to prevent the destruction of other property, was justifiable on precisely the same principle that 41 L. R. A.

a building is razed to prevent the spread of a conflagration.

In such cases, in the absence of a statute giving compensation, there is no redress against anyone, for salus populi suprema est lex.

See 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 955, and note 1; Bowditch v. Boston, 101 U. S. 16, 25 L. ed. 980, and note; American Print Works v. Lawrence, 28 N. J. L. 590, 57 Am. Dec. 420.

The trustees were either acting as public officers in the discharge of a public duty, or else they were acting as private individuals, and, in either event, they were not acting as servants of the village, therefore the doctrine of respondet superior has no application.

2 Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 974-979; Welsh v. Rutland, 56 Vt. 238, 48 Am. Rep. 762; Weller v. Burlington, 60 Vt. 28.

The corporation cannot be made liable for the malfeasance of such officers, outside the scope of the power conferred by the charter.

2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 970, and note 8; Cavanagh v. Boston, 139 Mass. 426, 52 Am. Rep. 716.

There is no power given in the charter to either the corporation or its trustees to destroy property in a case like the present one, therefore such an attempted exercise of power would be wholly ultra vires; but if it should be held that the corporation is given implied power to destroy property in order to protect highways, the legislature did not provide for compensation for such destruction, and in the absence of a statute there is no liability of the corporation, for this was not a mere ministerial act, but the performance of a public duty, if it was a duty at all.

McCarthy v. Boston, 135 Mass. 197; 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 999, and note; Field v. Des Moines, 39 Iowa, 575, 18 Am. Rep. 46; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 956, 957; Tiedeman, Mun. Corp. § 338; Clark v. Easton, 146 Mass. 43; Russell v. New York, 2 Denio, 461; Hill v. Boston, 122 Mass. 344, 23 Am. Rep. 332.

Such destruction is not a taking of private property for public use for which compensation must be made.

Tiedeman, Mun. Corp. § 335; American Print Works v. Lawrence, 28 N. J. L. 590, 57 Am. Dec. 420.

Rowell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant is an incorporated village, and constitutes a highway district of the town. All the highway taxes assessed by the selectmen on the polls and ratable estate of the village are collected like other village taxes, and two thirds thereof paid to the village treasurer; and the trustees of the village are to expend the same in building and maintaining highways and bridges, and they are authorized to lay out, alter, maintain, and discontinue highways, and to appraise and settle the damages therefor; and the village can lay a tax for any of those purposes. The by laws of the village authorize the trustees to draw orders on the village treasurer for the payment of any sums assessed as damages for land or other property taken or improved for a highway or other public use, and provide that the trustees may remove nuisances, and direct the cleaning, repairing, and improvement of streets, commons, lanes, walks, and bridges. The charter authorizes the village to make by-laws for protecting its highways from injury, but it does not appear that any have been made. Before and at the time in question the plaintiff owned a mill in said village, and a dam across Wells river; and on the mill side of the river was a highway, also in the village. At said time, because of rains or otherwise, the water of the river was very high, and carried away part of plaintiff's dam, and cut a channel around the mill, and between it and the highway, which was badly washing out; and to change the current away from the highway, to prevent further damage to it and to other property, the trustees burned the mill and its contents, and blew up and destroyed the dam; and the question is whether the village is liable for their action.

The plaintiff contends that this was a taking of his property for public use by an exercise of the right of eminent domain; that the trustees had a right, in the circumstances, to take it as they did, and therein were acting within the scope of their authority; that therefore he is entitled, under the Constitution, to compensation from the village, and, as the taking was without compensation, that the village is liable in this action. But this proposition cannot be maintained, for this was not a taking of the plaintiff's property for a public use, in the sense contended for, but a destruction of it to avert an imminent public injury, which is a different thing from taking by the right of eminent domain, and in no legal sense an exercise of that right, but stands on entirely different ground, namely, on the ground of necessity, or, more properly speaking, on the ground of the police power of the state, whereas the right of eminent domain stands on constitutional grounds. In Field v. Des Moines, 39 Iowa, 576, 18 Am. Rep. 46, it is said that the great weight of judicial authority holds that the destruction of property under authority conferred by law upon officers of municipal corporations is not an exercise of the right of eminent domain, but a regulation of the right that individuals have to destroy private property, in cases of inevitable necessity, to prevent the spreading of fire, or other great calamity. In Keller v. Corpus Christi, 50 Tex. 614, 32 Am. Rep. 618, the distinction between an exercise of the right of eminent domain and a police regulation to meet an impending peril by the destruction of property is sharply drawn. It is said that one can wait the forms and delay of the law, but that the other is governed by necessity, which knows no law; and reference is made to the unwise delay of the lord mayor of London to destroy some wooden buildings, which caused half that city to be burned in the great conflagration of 1666. In Russell v. New York, 2 Denio, 461,—a case that grew out of the great fire of 1835,—it is said that authority conferred by statute upon the mayor to order the destruction of buildings to prevent the spreading of a fire is not a grant of a right of eminent domain, and therefore not within the constitutional provision requiring compensation for property taken for public use, but that it is a regulation of the right that individuals possess to destroy private property to avert a public calamity. But in 41 L. R. A.

Hale v. Lawrence, 31 N. J. L. 714, 47 Am. Dec. 190, a case growing out of the same fire,—the court of errors and appeals of New Jersey held that said statute granted power not before existing, and that, therefore, it was the grant of a right of eminent domain. That case was again before the court, with the American Print Works against the same defendant, in 23 N. J. L. 590, 57 Am. Dec. 420; when the distinction above stated was clearly made. The distinction is well stated by Senator Verplanck in Stone v. New York, 25 Wend. 157, 173, which also grew out of that fire. See also Randolph, Em. Dom. §§ 8, 9; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 141. The plaintiff cites Bishop v. Macon, 7 Ga. 200, in which it was held that the owners of property destroyed to stay a conflagration were entitled, under the Constitution, to compensation, and that the city was liable on the ground of an implied assumpsit, for which proposition New York v. Lord, 17 Wend. 285, and 18 Wend. 126, is referred to as authority. But in that case liability was imposed by statute, without which it was expressly said that no liability would exist. It is said in Field v. Des Moines, above cited, that Bishop v. Macon, stands alone, and that, in the language of the supreme court of California in Dunbar v. The Alcalde & Ayuntamiento, 1 Cal. 858, without some charter or other statutory enactment imposing liability the decision cannot be sustained. It is decisive of this question that if the act complained of can be justified on the ground of public necessity, as it must be if justified at all, the plaintiff's loss is a damage without legal injury.

The plaintiff further contends that the by-law that authorizes the trustees to remove nuisances, and to direct the cleaning, repairing, and improvement of streets, commons, lanes, walks, and bridges, makes them the servants and agents of the village, and that thereby the village undertakes to perform those duties by its servants and agents whom it may control, and not because the duty is imposed upon it by law, and that, therefore, the village is liable on the principle of respondet superior. But this contention cannot be maintained. There is no statute, nor provision in its charter, nor by-law, that makes the village liable; and assuming, without deciding, that the by-law referred to authorized the act complained of, and that the village had power to authorize it, yet the by-law did not make the trustees the servants and agents of the village so that the principle of respondet superior applies. The city council of Charleston, South Carolina, acting under the general municipal powers of the city, without any statute creating liability, adopted an ordinance authorizing the intendant, among other officers, in time of fire, to demolish such buildings as might be judged necessary by him to prevent the further spread of a fire; thereby investing this officer with power to judge whether the necessity existed. A fire being in progress, the plaintiff's house was blown up by order of the intendant, and the fire was subsequently extinguished before it reached his premises. He brought an action of trespass against the city; claiming that the property was destroyed without necessity, and that the ordinance authorizing the intendant to destroy the property for the benefit of the city was sufficient to charge the city in case he proved that the destruction was unnecessary, and that the intendant had abused his discretion. But the court gave judgment against the plaintiff on the ground that the city, being a municipal corporation, was not liable to an action, unless given by statute. White v. Charleston, 2 Hill, L. 571. Judge Dillon says the result of this case was right, but that, assuming the power to pass the ordinance, the decision should have been put upon the ground that the intendant was discharging a public, as distinguished from a municipal or corporate, duty, and was not in that matter to be regarded as the agent of the city, and that, therefore, the city was not, on the principle of respondent superior, responsible for his acts. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 975, note 1. In McDonald v. Red Wing, 18 Minn. 88 (Gil. 25), it was held that a city is not liable for the destruction of a building torn down to arrest the progress of a fire, unless such liability is created by statute, and that it makes no difference whether the building is torn down by direction of the city officers, assuming to act in their official capacity, or by citizens and bystanders on their own motion. Field v. Des Moines, above cited, was an action to recover the value of buildings destroyed by order of the mayor to prevent the spread of a fire. It was contended that as the city, by its ordinance, had authorized the mayor to judge of the emergency, and to direct the destruction of the buildings, it thereby made his acts the acts of the city. The court said it would not stop to inquire whether the statute authorized the city to pass the ordinance under which the mayor acted; for if it did, and the ordinance was valid, and authorized the mayor to judge of the emergency, yet the city was not liable for his acts, in the absence of a statute creating such liability. There are numerous other cases to the same effect, but it is not necessary to refer to them.

The case at bar falls clearly within that class of cases in which the municipality is exempt from liability, in the absence of a statute imposing it, on the ground that the act complained of is not its act, but the act of persons who are deemed to be public officers, and who, though appointed and paid by the municipality, and though its agents, perhaps, for other purposes, yet are held not to sustain that relation to it in respect of the particular act in question. This is upon the ground that the municipality acts in the matter in a governmental capacity, and, as it were, for and on behalf of the state, and therefore, in the absence of a statute making it otherwise, enjoys the same immunity from liability for the acts of its officers that the state itself would have enjoyed had it done the same thing by its own officers. Freel v. Crawfordville School City, 142 Ind. 27, 37 L. R. A. 801. This doctrine is held and applied in Welsh v. Rutland, 56 Vt. 228, 48 Am. Rep. 762, and Weller v. Burlington, 60 Vt. 28. Nor is Whipple v. Fair Haven, 63 Vt. 221, in conflict with it. That case was not put on the ground of respondent superior, but on the ground that the village owed the orators, not a general duty as a part of the public, but a special duty as individuals, not to discharge water upon their land, and that the injury complained of was imputable to a neglect of that duty by the village itself, and not to the wrongful act of its trustees, and that the orators' land could not thus be subjected to servitude for the benefit of the public.

Judgment affirmed.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

J. H. ELLERBEE, Appt.,

v.

STATE of Mississippi.

(.....Miss.....)

1. The temporary relinquishment by a judge of the control of proceedings in a trial for felony by going 250 or 300 yards from the court room, leaving a member of the bar presiding in his absence, and being gone about twenty minutes, during which the trial goes on,

NOTE.—Temporary absence of judge, when fatal to trial.

- I. Scope of note.
- II. When court consists of single judge.
- III. When court composed of more than one judge.

I. Scope of note.

This note is only intended to cover absence of the judge which leaves the court without anyone to preside, and does not include questions with relation to a change of judges during a trial or during the different stages of a proceeding, or with relation to motions for new trial or other motions or proceedings in the action before some judge other than the trial judge.

Some of the cases deny the right of a judge to amounts to a dissolution of the court which makes the trial void.

2. A judge cannot delegate his judicial authority to another, and his attempt to do so, even with the consent of the parties, cannot bind the defendant on a prosecution for felony.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Lauderdale County convicting him of murder. Reversed.
The facts are stated in the opinion.

act as a witness in a trial had before him, on the ground that this constitutes an absence of the judge, and breaks up the court. But the question of the competency of the judge as a witness in a case on trial before him is fully treated in a note to Rogers v. State (Ark.) 31 L. R. A. 466, and such cases are therefore omitted from this note.

II. When court consists of single judge.

In a legal sense the judge of a court is the court, and there can be no court without a judge. Pressley v. Lamb, 105 Ind. 171, dictum; State v. Beuerman (Kan.) 53 Pac. 874.

And in felony cases the presence of the judge is essential to the organization of the court. O'Brien v. People, 17 Colo. 561.

Messrs. McIntosh & McIntosh, F. V. Brahan, and Ethridge & McBeath, for appellant:

This cause should be reversed because the judge absented himself from the bench during the argument of counsel.

Turbeville v. State, 56 Miss. 798; Davis v. Wilson, 65 Ill. 525; Brownlee v. Hewitt, 1 Mo. App. 860; State, Gehring, v. Claudius, 1 Mo. App. 551.

Messrs. Walker & Amis also for appellant.

Messrs. Wiley N. Nash, Attorney General, and Fewell & Son, for appellee:

The judge was absent with the consent of the accused, and the absence of the judge was a matter about which consent can be given.

A prisoner even is only required to be present during the more important steps.

Rolls v. State, 53 Miss. 891.

We do not consider that there was an absolute relinquishment by the judge of his seat on the bench. The point is. Was the judge beyond recall? No. Was he not within the call of the court? He certainly was.

Everything stated outside the facts of the case in Turbeville v. State, 56 Miss.

798, were obiter dicta and of no authority.

Methodist Episcopal Church v. Jacques, 3 Johns. Ch. 95; Johnson v. Cooper, 56 Miss. 617; Pave v. McRae, 36 Miss. 148; State v. Williams, 49 Miss. 664.

Whitfield, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant was tried for murder, convicted, and sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary for life. During the trial, while one of the counsel for the appellant was making his argument to the jury, the circuit judge left the bench, calling Mr. Bozeman, a member of the bar, to preside in his absence, with the consent of part of the counsel for the state and the defendant, and then left the courthouse. During his absence a heated, excited altercation occurred between one of the counsel for the state, Judge Fewell, and one of the counsel for the defendant, Mr. Ethridge, then addressing the jury. What occurred, as developed by the testimony on the motion for a new trial, was this: Says one of the witnesses: "Mr. Ethridge said in his argument that Mr. Hoffer had stated to W. W. Henry, a member Evidence can only be delivered to the jury in a criminal case in open court, and unless there is a judge or judges present there can be no court. Shular v. State, 105 Ind. 299, 55 Am. Rep. 211, dictum.

It is the duty of the presiding judge at criminal trials, and especially where life is involved, to be visibly present every moment of their actual progress so that he can always see and hear all that is being done. State v. Smith, 49 Conn. 378; State v. Beuerman (Kan.) 53 Pac. 874.

The judge cannot, even temporarily, relinquish control of the court or the conduct of the trial. It is necessary that he should hear all that transpires in order that he may intelligently review the proceedings upon motion for a new trial. State v. Beuerman (Kan.) 53 Pac. 874.

And the absence of the judge against the objections of the defendant, in a trial of a felony case, while a certain witness was examined and while material evidence was taken, is error for which a new trial should be granted. O'Brien v. People, 17 Colo. 561.

The judge, as well as the jury, must be present in every criminal trial to superintend the proceedings, uphold the majesty of the law, and thus give protection and security to all parties interested or concerned in the result of the trial. O'Brien v. People, 17 Colo. 561; Hayes v. State, 58 Ga. 35.

And when, during the trial of a capital case, the judge leaves the bench and withdraws beyond the bar, he should order a suspension of business until his return,—especially while a witness for the state is under examination. Hayes v. State, 58 Ga. 35.

And a prisoner is entitled to a new trial where the judge left the bench and withdrew beyond the bar in the progress of the trial without requiring the examination to cease during his absence. Hayes v. State, 58 Ga. 35.

A trial conducted in part in the absence of the judge and of the accused is not that trial to which every man accused of crime is entitled within the meaning of the constitutional provision guaranteeing to every person charged with crime the right to be confronted with the witnesses against him. Foster v. State, 70 Miss. 756.

And no substantial part of a trial for felony can properly be carried on in the absence of the presiding judge, even with the consent of the defendant. O'Brien v. People, 17 Colo. 561.

Neither the accused nor his counsel in a criminal prosecution can consent to the departure of the judge during the progress of the trial, and his engaging in his official duties elsewhere. Meredeth v. People, 84 Ill. 479.

So, the general rule is that judicial office must be exercised in person, and that a judge cannot delegate his authority to another. State, Hovey, v. Noble, 118 Ind. 380, 4 L. R. A. 101, dictum.

Judicial functions cannot be delegated to be exercised by agent or deputy, and it is error for a circuit judge to call an attorney to occupy the bench in a civil cause before it is determined, without the consent of the parties appearing of record. Davis v. Wilson, 65 Ill. 525; ELLERBEE v. STATE.

The validity of proceedings in a circuit court depends upon the presence of the judge, and he cannot authorize any ministerial officer of the court to exercise his judicial powers; and where the court meets on the first day of a regular term, and adjourns to the next day, when the judge leaves, directing the sheriff and clerk to meet and open and adjourn court from day to day, which they do for a week, and then enters an order declaring court adjourned until the next regular term, the court must be deemed to have been adjourned after the first day for want of a judge. Wight v. Wallbaum, 39 Ill. 554.

And under Cal. act 1853, § 95, providing that if no judge attends on the day appointed for holding a court before noon the sheriff or clerk shall adjourn the court until the next day, and so on from day to day for a week if no judge attends, where the sheriff and clerk adjourn court on Monday and so on until Saturday, when they adjourn it for the term, the last adjournment is a nullity, and a judgment entered by the court thereafter is valid notwithstanding such adjournment of the term. Thomas v. Fogarty, 19 Cal. 644.

As to absence during trial which proceeds, see ELLERBEE v. STATE.

So, the reception of a verdict is a judicial act which cannot be delegated, and where after a cause has been given to the jury the judge, desiring to go home, designates an attorney of the court to receive the verdict, which is done, the verdict is a nullity, and the fact that the defendant assented thereto does not give it validity. McClure v. State, 77 Ind. 287.

of this bar, that he (Hoffer) was a witness to the tragedy. He then discussed the failure of the state to introduce Mr. Henry, and he further discussed or criticized the state for objecting to the introduction of Mr. Henry as a witness on the part of the defense. At this point he was interrupted by Judge Fewell, of counsel for the state, who denounced Mr. Ethridge's argument as being outrageous. There was a clash of words between Mr. Ethridge and Mr. Fewell. But finally Mr. Ethridge said, 'I will take it back,'—all, or a part of it, I am not sure which; I am not sure what he said. Capt. Fewell, however, tried to invoke a ruling from Mr. Bozeman, who at that time was occupying the chair of the judge. Mr. Bozeman said he was not sufficiently advised as to what was the testimony in the case to rule on it. But he thought the matter had been settled by the withdrawal of the language objected to. Judge Fewell, however, insisted that the matter was not settled, and that he wanted a ruling, but at about this juncture one of the jurors retired from the box, and before Mr. Ethridge resumed his argument in the case, and before the juror returned to his seat in the box, Judge Huddleston—presiding judge in the case—had returned to the court room from a temporary absence." Another witness testifies that when Mr. Ethridge "retracted the language" "Capt. Fewell then said, 'No, sir, you shant do it,' and, looking up to the bench, called for the court, and appealed to Mr. Bozeman, saying, 'You, sir, are a lawyer, and ought to know better.' I don't know how that was expressed,—don't remember exactly how that was. Mr. Bozeman then remarked that the judge would be back in a little while, and that was the end of the matter." This witness also testified that Henry's testimony had been excluded by the court, in the absence of the jury, who never heard it. He also testifies that Judge Huddleston had gone to Walker and Hall's building to see Mr. Schamberger, whom he said was sick, and that that building was between 250 and 300 yards from the court-house. Judge Huddleston testified that he went to see a sick friend, Mr. Schamberger, to get him to go up to his house, he being dangerously sick. He saw him; talked, in the Higgins building, with him, trying to get him to go to his house, which he declined to do. He then went into Mr. Amis's office, in an adjoining room, and sat down to smoke a cigar. That he smoked nearly half

And the jury cannot be authorized to render their verdict to the clerk in the absence of the judge, and be discharged by consent of the parties, and a verdict thus rendered is invalid. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Polly, 14 Gratt. 447.

And it is the duty of the judge to be personally present in court, and to find judicially the facts upon which his conclusion to discharge the jury is based, and where, in a criminal prosecution, he leaves upon the going out of the jury, and goes to his home in another county, and upon being informed by the clerk several days after that the jury could not agree, he instructs him by telegraph to discharge the jury and remand the prisoner, which the clerk does, the prisoner is entitled to a discharge. State v. Jefferson, 66 N. C. 309.

Nor does the fact that the judge who conducted a trial was weary authorize him to appoint someone else to take his place; and where the jury retired to deliberate in the afternoon, and subsequently the judge asked an attorney to receive the verdict, and left the court room, and did not return until the next morning, during which time the jury came in and the verdict was taken by such attorney and the jury discharged, the verdict is invalid and a new trial should be granted, and the fact that the attorneys for the parties were present and did not object does not make the appointment effective. Britton v. Fox, 39 Ind. 309.

So, the appellate court will not presume on appeal that the judgment appealed from was rendered upon a proper trial of the issue, where the record shows that during the trial the judge of the court below left the bench and his place was assumed by a member of the bar who was not a judge but who tried the cause. It will treat the proceedings as exram non judice, and the judgment as void. Van Slyke v. Trempealeau County Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co., 39 Wis. 300, 20 Am. Rep. 50.

And a referee decides both the law and the fact, and where a cause is referred to three referees that full number must be present, free from all bias and competent to decide every question presented, and one of the three cannot be called from the bench and sworn and examined as a witness on the trial, as that would disorganize the court. Morse v. Morse, 11 Barb. 510.

So, there can be no court without a judge, and his presence as the presiding genius of the trial is as necessary during the argument as at any other time. Turbeville v. State, 56 Miss. 733.

The arguments of counsel, as well as the taking of the evidence, are a part of a trial, and the judge cannot properly absent himself while such proceedings are being carried on. It is his duty to be present and see to it that counsel do not travel outside the record, or transcend the limits of legitimate discussion. O'Brien v. People, 17 Colo. 561; State v. Beuerman (Kan.) 53 Pac. 374; Brownlee v. Hewitt, 1 Mo. App. 360.

And where the presiding judge in a criminal prosecution left the bench during the final argument of the cause, and retired from the court room, and permitted the argument to continue while he was absent, this is reversible error. Palin v. State, 38 Neb. 387.

And where in a criminal prosecution the jury is sent out of the court room with counsel for the purpose of hearing the argument to save the time of the court, and the closing address of counsel to the jury is not made in the presence of the court, in consequence of which remarks are made by one of the counsel which would not have been permitted in the presence of the court, a new trial should be granted. Brownlee v. Hewitt, 1 Mo. App. 360.

And judgment in a criminal prosecution will be reversed where the jury and counsel were sent out of the court room for the purpose of arguing the cause, and counsel, having the closing speech, states as evidence to influence the action of the jurors, matters which were not in evidence, and which, though perfectly true, should not have been permitted to be stated or made known to them. State, Gehring v. Claudius, 1 Mo. App. 551.

The law requires a presiding judge to sit during each and every stage of a proceeding before him, whether it be a jury trial or some other proceeding in court, and his presence cannot be dispensed with, and a judgment rendered by him will be reversed, where, during the argument of the case before the jury, he left the court room and remained out during the entire closing argument of the state's attorney, though he was in a private room adjoining the court room preparing instructions to be given the jury. Thompson v. People, 144 Ill. 373.

And the absence of the judge from the court room, engaged in other judicial labors for a period of two days, in the trial of a criminal proeeof it up, walked down the stairway, and started in the direction of the court-house, and met a party who advised him there was an altercation between counsel in the court room. He states further that he observed the time when he left the bench, and when he got back to the foot of the stairway leading up to the court room, and noted that up to that time he had been absent from the bench eighteen minutes. We have thus the case of a circuit judge leaving the court room in the progress of a trial for murder, going to a building some 250 or 800 yards away, leaving the court in charge of a member of the bar called to the bench to preside in his absence, and being gone about twenty minutes, a heated altercation occurring meantime between counsel, in the hearing and presence of the jury. It is not the case of a circuit judge being absent a few moments, from necessity, suspending, as he should, all proceedings in his absence, but a clear and manifest case of temporary relinquishment of the control of proceedings which were not suspended, but going forward with a member of the bar presiding as judge, in the way above shown. In Turbeville v. State, 56 Miss. 798, 799, the circuit judge merely retired from the bench to a room immediately adjoining, and in the rear of the bench, and separated from it only by the thickness of the wall, through which a door was opened. He placed a member of the bar on the bench, with instructions to call or notify him, if needed. He remained in this room, thus absent from the bench, and distant from it 5 or 6 feet only, during the greater part of the argument to the jury. The court says: "If we could consider this statement of the facts as showing such absence from the room on the part of the judge as constituted even a temporary relinquishment of great magnitude, is error and fatal to a conviction, though he was in another part of the same building. Meredeth v. People, 84 Ill. 473.

And the fact that during the argument in behalf of the defendant in a prosecution for murder the judge left the bench and passed into an adjoining room, closing the door behind him and remaining there about ten minutes, during which time he appears to have been out of sight and hearing of the jury and counsel, and where he could not hear the argument or exercise control over the proceedings in the court room, is sufficient ground for a new trial. State v. Beuerman (Kan.) 53 Pac. 874.

Nor does failure of counsel to object to the sending out of the court room of the jury with counsel for the purpose of hearing the argument which was made without the presence of the court, constitute a waiver of the right to have the argument conducted in the presence of the court, since such consent is extorted, counsel not being in a position where they could well refuse it. Brownlee v. Hewitt, 1 Mo. App. 380; State, Gehring, v. Claudius, 1 Mo. App. 551.

And such omission to object will not prejudice him or affect his right to raise the objection on appeal. State, Gehring, v. Claudius, 1 Mo. App. 551.

The fact that the judge may not see or hear everything occurring in the court room, however, or that he may step into an adjoining room but not out of hearing of the proceedings, is not necessarily prejudicial to the interests of the defendant in every case. State v. Beuerman (Kan.) 53 Pac. 874.

And a judge is not precluded from changing his seat to any portion of the room he may prefer, or from temporarily engaging in conversation or reading or writing during a trial, but he must remain within the hearing of counsel so as to be able to assert his authority if required by anything that may occur. Turbeville v. State, 56 Miss. 793.

And the fact that while the attorney for the state in a criminal prosecution was making his opening argument the judge withdrew to the judge's ante-room for a few moments, but was all the time within hearing of the proceedings in court, and it did not appear that he could not and did not see as well as hear everything pertaining to the trial, does not invalidate the proceedings and require that a new trial be ordered. State v. Smith, 49 Conn. 878.

And that the judge in a criminal prosecution left the bench and stepped into a room immediately adjoining and in the rear of the bench separated from it only by a wall, through which a door opened, and placed a member of the bar on the bench with instructions to call him if needed, remaining there the greater portion of the time consumed by the address of counsel to the jury, where it does not appear whether the door was opened or closed, is not such a relinquishment of control of the court and of the conduct of the trial as will require a reversal of the judgment. Turbeville v. State, 56 Miss. 793.

In a civil action the adjournment of court on Saturday night, after a case had been submitted to the jury but while they were still unable to agree, until the succeeding Tuesday, during which time the judge intended to be absent from the county, and the discharge of the jury until Sunday morning with admonition to them and directions to the bailiff to keep them in his custody, except that he may allow them to separate at night and for meals, is irregular but not a ground for reversal, where on Tuesday morning the court convened and the jury returned their verdict, and it does not appear that they were not in fact kept together from the moment they convened on Sunday morning until the court met on Tuesday, and the proceedings do not appear to have wrought any prejudice to the substantial rights of the parties. Morrow v. Saline County Comrs. 21 Kan. 484.

Where it is alleged in a criminal prosecution that the jury have received evidence in the absence of the judge and of the prisoner it is for the court before which the trial takes place to investigate the facts and ascertain whether the alleged irregularity has occurred, and in the absence of such examination it is impossible for the court on appeal to reverse the conviction on a mere statement of what the judge below was informed, which might be a mere rumor. Queen v. Martin, L. R. 1 Q. C. 378.

And complaint that a jury was sent into another room to hear the arguments of counsel while the court proceeded with other business in the court room cannot be first made upon appeal where no objection was offered at the time and it does not appear that any unfairness resulted. Burns v. Wilson, 1 Mo. App. 129.

III. When court composed of more than one judge.

The rules above laid down apply, also, when the court is composed of more than one judge, to any absence of any of them which for the time being disorganizes the court.

Thus, under the Constitution of the state of New York providing that the county judges with two justices of the peace to be designated according to law may hold courts of session, the two justices are indispensable to constitute a legally organized court; and where during the trial of a case in that court one of the justices of the peace thus designated abandons the trial and goes home, the court is disorganized so far as the trial is concerned so that the judgment is invalid, though the county ment of the control of the court and of the conduct of the trial, we should unhesitatingly reverse the judgment. There can be no court without a judge, and his presence, as the presiding genius of the trial, is as essential during the argument as at any other time. We do not mean to say that he must actually listen to every word that falls from the lips of counsel while they are addressing the jury, for this might impose a burden too heavy to be borne, but we do mean that the conduct and control of the argument within legitimate limits is confided to him as a judicial duty, and cannot be by him devolved upon another. While he will not be precluded from changing his seat to any portion of the room he may prefer, or from temporarily engaging in conversation, or reading, or writing, he must remain within hearing of counsel, so as to be able instantly to assert his authority, if demanded by anything that may occur. While it will rarely be necessary or proper from him to interfere with counsel, instances may arise that will require it; and, moreover, the conduct of the jurors, spectators, or officers of court may be such as to demand the instant interposition of his authority. In civil cases or prosecutions for misdemeanors he may give place to another by consent, and if he does so without objection in advance, consent will, perhaps, be presumed; but in prosecutions for felonies no consent can be given, and, if given, it will not be binding on the accused." These words could not be more apt if this court had been considering this case. Here it is idle to say that the circuit judge remained "within the hearing of counsel, so as to be able instantly to assert his authority." Beyond all cavil, he had abandoned the "control of the court, and the conduct of the trial" "temporarily" to Mr.

Judge appointed another justice of the peace to fill the vacancy. Blend v. People, 41 N. Y. 604.

In this case it is said that when the Constitution requires a court to be constituted of a certain number of members the court on appeal is not at liberty to determine judicially that two members of such court are so far useless appendages that they may be changed during a trial to suit their convenience, and others substituted in their place.

And a conviction and sentence in a prosecution for larceny is invalid and will be set aside where, after the charge by the court and the retirement of the jury, the presiding judge commenced the trial of a civil cause, and the justices of the sessions, who were members of the court during the trial, left the court room, one of them going to the lower hall and the other into the street, and the jury came in during their absence, and the county judge received the verdict. Hinman v. People, 13 Hun, 266.

In this case Tuttle v. People, 36 N. Y. 431, and People v. Reagle, 60 Barb. 527, infra, were distinguished upon the ground that in the case at bar the justices of sessions left, not the court room only, but one of them left the court-house, and when the verdict was received the court was held by the county judge only.

So, under the New York judiciary act prescribing that courts of oyer and terminer shall be composed of a justice of the supreme court, who shall preside, the county judge and the justices of the peace designated as members of the court of sessions, and that the presiding justice and any two of the others shall have power to hold said court, a trial before a court consisting at the beginning of a justice of the supreme court and county judge and two session justices, during which one of the session justices absented himself for an entire day after the trial had progressed several days while the trial proceeded, when he returned again and took part in the subsequent proceedings, and the county judge left and did not return after the charge had been delivered and before the rendition of the verdict, is improper, and a new trial should be granted, as the justice of sessions disqualified himself from further sitting as a member of the court by leaving, and after the county judge left the only competent members of the court remaining were the presiding justice and the other justice of sessions. People v. Shaw, 83 N. Y. 36.

And the presiding justice at a court of oyer and terminer in New York has no authority to discharge a jury upon its failure to agree in the absence of his associate, the presence of whom is necessary to constitute a court of oyer and terminer. People v. Reagle, 60 Barb. 527.

And the failure of the defendant in a criminal prosecution to object at the time is not a waiver of 41 L. R. A.

the right to insist upon the defective organization of the court when a verdict is received by the presiding judge in the absence of the sessions justices. Hinman v. People, 13 Hun, 266.

When a court of sessions is in progress with a quorum in actual attendance, however, the casual and temporary absence of one of the judges from the seat assigned him neither breaks up the court nor impairs the validity of its proceedings. Tuttle v. People, 36 N. Y. 431.

And the fact that one of the session justices in a prosecution for perjury had occasion to leave the bench for a few minutes to hand a paper to a person who is waiting in court to receive it, and who was some 20 feet from the presiding judge when an objection to the admission of a deed in evidence was overruled, does not vitiate the proceedings. Tuttle v. People, 36 N. Y. 431.

And that one of the three members of the court of sessions was not in the place in the room which it was customary for one holding his office to occupy during a trial, does not disorganize or disrupt the court so that it will lose jurisdiction where all and each were ready and able to perform each and every duty incumbent upon them. People v. Dohring, 59 N. Y. 374, 17 Am. Rep. 849.

In this case Blend v. People, 41 N. Y. 604, supra, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case one of the justices of sessions absented himself from the place where the court was held, and did not reappear, and another justice was called to the vacant place, while in this case the justice of the sessions, who was sworn as a witness, did not leave the court room while the trial was progressing, and merely left the bench for a space intending soon to return to it and soon returning.

So, a trial in the oyer and terminer of New York, at the commencement of which the circuit judge, the associate judge, and two aldermen presided, after which during the progress of the trial the circuit judge retired from the bench and did not again return, is regular, and a conviction and sentence therein will not be reversed on account of such departure, as the associate judge and the two aldermen associated with him had authority to hold a court of oyer and terminer without the circuit judge. People v. White, 22 Wend. 167.

And where two judges hear a demurrer to a plea in abatement in a criminal prosecution, and the opinion sustaining the demurrer is drawn up by one of them and assented to by the other, and delivered by the one drawing it up, sitting alone, and both judges subsequently sit at the trial of the indictment, there is no irregularity for which a new trial will be ordered under a statute providing that two judges shall be a quorum and that the court shall always be open. State v. Congdon, 14 R. I. 458.

Bozeman. And here a signal illustration of the wisdom of the rule announced in Turbeville's Case is furnished. We have given this proposition the most anxious consideration. We have failed, after exhaustive search, to find a single authority that would support us in disallowing this assignment of error, and neither the attorney general nor the exceptionally able and learned counsel representing the state in conjunction with the attorney general refers us to a single authority which opposes the rule in Turbeville v. State, in harmony with which also is Peter v. State, 6 How. (Miss.) 826. On the contrary, the authorities elsewhere uniformly sustain that rule. In People v. Dohring, 59 N. Y. 874, reported in 17 Am. Rep. 349, at page 353 (bottom of the page), the supreme court of New York expressly affirms the rule in the Turbeville Case that the judge must be where it is "physically possible for him at any moment, on the arising of a question" calling for his decision, to be present, and make it. In Merredeth v. People, 84 Ill. 479, the judge of the court was in the court-house, but in a different court room, trying another case, after having heard all the evidence in a murder case, and then having called two members of the bar in succession, to the bench, to preside in the murder case during the argument of counsel, himself having gone back several times to the court room where the murder case was being tried. The court said (p. 482): "It is no less error than if he had been in another county. . . . The argument of a cause is as much a part of the trial as the hearing of evidence. It is a right in his defense, secured by the law of the land, of which a citizen cannot be deprived. . . . The decision is not affected by the consideration the judge was present a part of the time during the argument of the case. If he could be absent during any part of the trial, and his official duties could, during such time, be performed by a member of the bar, on the same principle, his absence during the entire trial could be justified." Mr. Works, in his "Courts and Their Jurisdiction," says (p. 87): "When the court is once opened, the presence of the judge is necessary at all times when judicial business is being transacted." The following authorities clearly support all three of the propositions laid down in the Turbeville Case, to wit, that in the trial of a felony the judge must always be where he can immediately respond to any call for the exercise of his authority in controlling the court and the conduct of the trial, his relinquishment, though even temporary, of such control of the court and conduct of the trial, working, as to that case, a dissolution of the court; that the judge cannot delegate his judicial authority to another; and that his doing so, even with the consent of the parties, cannot bind the defendant. Cases cited in note to Roy v. Horsley (Or.) 25 Am. Rep. 540, 541; 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 11, note 5, with authorities; Shaw v. People, 8 Hun. 272, opinion by Hardin, J., at page 279, 68 N. Y., at pages 38, 39; People v. White, 24 Wend. 528, bottom page 545, opinion of Walworth, Ch., also opinions of other judges at pages 546, 549, 555, 556, 563; Blend v. People, 41 N. Y. 606; Hoagland v. Creed, 81 Ill. 506; Van Slyke v. Trempealeau County Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 39 Wis. 390, 20 Am. Rep. 50. Section 165 of the Constitution has no application to the case made by the record. If this error were merely a technical one, not vital in its nature, we would not, for that alone, reverse the judgment. But the error here is of the gravest character. It goes to the very organization and constitution of the court trying the appellant on a charge of murder. So far as the lawful power of this court can be exerted, in affirming convictions for violations of the law of the land, it shall be exerted. And mere technical errors, without intrinsic merit, when we can, after a careful and thorough examination of the whole case, confidently say that the right result has been reached, that substantial justice has been done, and that, on a new trial, no other result could reasonably be arrived at, will not avail here for reversal, in civil or criminal cases. But when the defendant has been, as here, denied a right secured to him by the Constitution and the laws of the land, in a matter going to the very constitution of the court trying him, we are compelled to reverse the case. In such cases the interests of society, the stability of the laws, the due administration of justice, demand a reversal. Disregard of fundamental right in the case of the guiltiest defendant, his conviction in violation of settled constitutional and legal safeguards, intended for the protection of all, are not things which affect the particular defendant in a given case alone, but, in their disastrous and far-reaching consequences, involve, in future trials, the innocent and guilty alike, subvert justice, and disorganize society. Guilt should be punished certainly, and condignly, most assuredly; but guilt must be manifested in accordance with the law of the land. Else some day the innocent, who are sometimes called to answer at the bar of their country, may come to find themselves involved in a common ruin, deprived of the legal trial necessary to the vindication of their innocence.

Reversed, new trial awarded, and cause remanded.

MILWAUKEE ELECTRIC RAILWAY & LIGHT COMPANY, Appt.,

Charles ROBRAN, Resp't.,

SAME, Appt.

(.....Wis.....)

An electric passenger railroad on a country highway constitutes an additional burden, and cannot be built without the consent of the abutting owner and payment of compensation.

(March 22, 1898.)

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the Superior Court for Milwaukee County refusing to vacate certain temporary restraining orders enjoining defendants from changing the grade of a street in front of plaintiff's property. Affirmed.

Statement by Winslow, J.:

These are two actions in equity brought to permanently enjoin the defendant railway company from grading down the highway in front of the residences of the plaintiffs, and from laying an electric street railway thereon. The cases are identical in their facts, and but one statement will be necessary. The facts appearing by the complaint and the affidavits used upon the motion to dissolve the preliminary injunction were substantially as follows: Oakland avenue is a highway 60 feet in width, and running north and south in the city of Milwaukee, and extends northward into the town of Milwaukee, and reaches the village of White Fish Bay, which is an incorporated village of 400 or 500 inhabitants whose southern boundary is about $1\frac{1}{4}$ miles north from the northern boundary of the city of Milwaukee. The plaintiffs own, respectively, two small lots, on which they reside, fronting on the east side of this highway, about $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile north of the city limits of Milwaukee. This highway has existed and been traveled by ordinary travel for many years, during all of which time there has been a grade in front of plaintiff's lots, ascending to the north about 1 foot in 21, and the plaintiffs' lots are now 4 or 5 feet above the grade. This grade extends for a distance of 800 feet along the highway, and for an additional 300 feet there is a grade of 1 foot in 80 feet. Most of the property on the highway from the city limits north past the plaintiffs' lots has been platted into city lots, and many of the lots have been sold; but the greater part of them are held by nonresident owners for sale, and are not occupied or improved. There are about twenty-five actual residents upon the road from the limits of the city to the limits of White Fish Bay. The village of White Fish Bay is composed largely of people doing business in Milwaukee. The defendant owns and operates substantially the entire electric street-railway system of the city of Milwaukee, and carries passengers only. In the summer of 1897 many of the inhabitants of White Fish Bay desired an extension of the defendant's electric street railway on Oakland avenue to the village of White Fish Bay; and the defendant was desirous of making that extension, but it declined to build the line unless the steep grade above mentioned was considerably reduced, and, after negotiations with the town board of the town of Milwaukee, a written agreement was made between the defendant and the town board, August 17, 1897, by which the defendant was allowed to build its electric road for passenger service upon Oakland avenue, past the plaintiffs' premises, and to operate it under certain conditions for fifty years, provided that it would grade the highway at its own expense, and save the town harmless from all damages by reason of the change of grade, such new grade being made according to a profile attached to the agreement. By this agreement and profile the highway was to be cut down in front of the plaintiffs' lots, and for a long distance on either side of them, and was to be filled in at other places so as to reduce the grade. The depth of the cut in front of the plaintiffs' premises was about 8 feet, and the width of the cut at the bottom 36 feet, with the sides sloping back on each side to the street line. Afterwards, on October 16 following, the town board made an order fixing the grade of the street as indicated in the profile. A large proportion of the property owners on the highway along the line of the proposed change consented, in writing, to the change; but others, including the plaintiffs, did not consent. By the change proposed, the lots of the plaintiffs were to be left from 12 to 14 feet above the roadbed, and access to them by team will be either entirely cut off or made very difficult. A temporary restraining order was obtained upon the complaint, and accompanying affidavits in each case at the commencement of the actions. Afterwards the defendant appeared, and, upon affidavits, moved in each case to vacate the order, which motions were denied, and the defendant appeals in both cases.

Any damage caused the plaintiff by the change of the grade of the street in front of his premises is damnum absque injuria.

For such line in country road, see also Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Montgomery County Pass. R. Co. (Pa.) 27 L. R. A. 768.

Oakland avenue is not an ordinary country road.

Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Milwaukee R. & K. Electric R. Co. 95 Wis. 561, 87 L. R. A. 856.

An electric street railroad upon a country road is not an additional burden.

When it appropriates the land of an individual for a highway the public pays full value and can use such land without paying additional compensation for any public purpose not inconsistent with its use as a street and which does not impair the abutter's right of access to his property.

Norton v. Peck, 3 Wis. 714.

Just compensation for the taking of land for a highway is its full value, the same as when taken for a railroad.

Sanborn & Berryman, Wis. Anno. Stat. § 1848, and note.

When land is taken for a railroad a proper deduction in the absence of a statute is made from the damages for the benefits.

Washburn v. Milwaukee & L. W. R. Co. 59 Wis. 364; Milwaukee & M. R. Co. v. Eble, 3 Pinney, 334; Chapman v. Oshkosh & M. River R. Co. 33 Wis. 629.

So when land is taken by the public for a highway the fee remains in the abutter but the land taken can be used for all public purposes.

Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Milwaukee R. & K. Electric R. Co. 95 Wis. 567, 37 L. R. A. 856.

A street railroad in a street is not an additional burden, because not inconsistent with the use of a street as a street, and the abutter is "not entitled to a compensation therefor, except where some private right of such an owner (as his free access to his own land or buildings) has been materially impaired thereby."

Hobart v. Milwaukee City R. Co. 27 Wis. 194, 9 Am. Rep. 461; Huston v. Fort Atkinson, 56 Wis. 350; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 656, 675; Paine Lumber Co. v. Oshkosh, 89 Wis. 480; Huston v. Fort Atkinson, 56 Wis. 350; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Milwaukee R. & K. Electric R. Co. 95 Wis. 567, 37 L. R. A. 856.

Authorities differ as to how land taken for a street may be used without paying additional compensation to the abutter. The courts of Massachusetts and New York have adopted different views. The courts of Wisconsin have followed Massachusetts.

Where, under the authority of the legislature in virtue of the sovereign power of eminent domain, private property has been taken for a public use, and full compensation for a perpetual easement in land has been paid to the owner therefor, and afterward the land is appropriated to a public use of a like kind, no new claim for compensation can be sustained by the owner of the land over which it passes.

Chase v. Sutton Mfg. Co. 4 Cusb. 152; Pierce v. Drew, 136 Mass. 80, 49 Am. Rep. 7; Boston v. Richardson, 13 Allen, 146; Com. v. Temple, 14 Gray, 69; Com. v. Lovell Gas Light Co. 12 Allen, 75; Atty. Gen. v. Metropolitan R. Co. 125 Mass. 515, 28 Am. Rep. 264; Lincoln v. Com. 164 Mass. 9.

In New York it is held that the appropriation of land for the use of a highway is for a specific purpose, and the public thereby acquire a mere right of passage, with the powers and privileges which are incident to such a right.

Bloomfield & R. Natural Gas Light Co. v. Calkins, 63 N. Y. 886.

The New York courts have held the following uses of a street to be additional burdens for which additional compensation must be paid:

(1) A street railroad.

Craig v. Rochester City & B. R. Co. 39 N. Y. 404.

(2) Gas pipe in a country road.

Bloomfield & R. Natural Gas Light Co. v. Calkins, 62 N. Y. 888.

(3) City sewer in a country road.

Van Brunt v. Flatbush, 128 N. Y. 55.

(4) Telephone poles in a country road.

Eels v. American Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 143 N. Y. 133, 25 L. R. A. 640.

The supreme court of Wisconsin has followed the Massachusetts decisions and adopted its view as to what uses a street can be put to without paying additional compensation to the abutter.

Hobart v. Milwaukee City R. Co. 27 Wis. 194; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Milwaukee R. & K. Electric R. Co. 95 Wis. 568, 37 L. R. A. 856; Huston v. Fort Atkinson, 56 Wis. 350.

The Massachusetts doctrine has also been adopted by the weight of authority in other states.

Booth, Street Railways, par. 82; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Milwaukee R. & K. Electric R. Co. 95 Wis. 567, 37 L. R. A. 856; Hewett v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 4 Mackey, 424; Irwin v. Great Southern Teleph. Co. 37 La. Ann. 63; Pierce v. Drew, 136 Mass. 75, 49 Am. Rep. 7; Cater v. Northwestern Teleph. Exch. Co. 60 Minn. 539, 28 L. R. A. 310; *Reversing Willis v. The New York doctrine is fallacious which holds certain uses of a country highway are an additional burden when the same uses would not constitute an additional burden upon a city street.

This New York view is repudiated by Massachusetts and Minnesota.

Pierce v. Drew, 136 Mass. 80, 49 Am. Rep. 7; Lincoln v. Com. 164 Mass. 9.

The supreme court of Minnesota also repudiates the New York doctrine.

Cater v. Northwestern Teleph. Exch. Co. 60 Minn. 548, 28 L. R. A. 310.

Street railroads can be constructed upon country roads without paying additional compensation.

The supreme court of Wisconsin has held that an electric street railroad outside of the city limits but in a suburb is not an additional burden, but it is if it be a commercial electric railroad.

Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Milwaukee R. &

K. Electric R.R. Co. 95 Wis. 567, 87 L. R. A. 856.

Messrs. O'Connor, Hammel, & Schmitz, for respondent:

The town board of supervisors had no authority to grant the street-railway company a franchise to grade and use the street in front of plaintiff's premises, without compensation, and especially where private property rights are affected.

The owners of lands bounded by a public street acquire an easement in the street for ingress and egress to and from their premises, sometimes called "the easement of access," and the taking of which is the taking of private property for public use, entitling such abutting owner to compensation.

If the street is laid out or widened or altered colorably for the use of the town, but really for the benefit of the individual, such proceeding is void.

The construction and operation of a horse railway in the public streets of a city, by authority from the city government, is not a new burden imposed upon the owners of the fee of the land, and they are not entitled to compensation therefor, except where some private right of an abutting owner, as his free access to his own land or buildings, has been materially impaired thereby.

There is a distinction between a city street and a country road—an urban and a rural servitude—the city street being subject to uses growing out of the needs of an urban community—uses which do not bear the same relation to the welfare of a rural community. The construction of a street railway upon a country highway imposes a new burden and an additional servitude on the land entitling the abutting landowner to compensation.

Wisconsin has accepted the middle doctrine, and has not followed the Massachusetts decisions.

Any kind of a street railway may be an additional burden, if it is so constructed as to deprive the abutter of his easement, and entitles such abutting landowner to compensation.

Lahr v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 104 N. Y. 268; Fobes v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 121 N. Y. 505, 8 L. R. A. 453; Detroit City R. Co. v. Mills, 85 Mich. 634; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Finley, 86 Ky. 294.

Winslow, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant proposes to construct and operate an electric street railway for the carriage of passengers upon a highway in a country town outside of the city limits of Milwaukee, and, for that purpose and by permission of the town authorities, to cut down the highway about 8 feet, so that an abutting owner's right of access to his property will be seriously impaired; and the question is whether this can be done without the consent of the abutting owner, and without the payment of compensation to such owner. The question is a new one in this court, and one the importance of which, in view of the rapid development of electric power as a means of carriage for long distances, can hardly be overestimated. If the highway in question in this case can be so used, the question at once arises whether every country highway may not be used in the same way. If it be said that the highway before us in this case is in effect a city street because of its close proximity to the city, and because the adjoining lands are platted, and because it connects a suburban village with the city, and that a clear distinction ought to be drawn between such a highway and the ordinary country road in farming districts, the inquiry will then be: Can such a distinction be practically drawn, and can it be satisfactorily applied, and upon what solid grounds will it rest? A distinction so important must in reason be one which can be drawn with some reasonable degree of certainty in every case, and must be capable of practical application. Is the line to be drawn according to density of population, and, if so, what degree of density is to be the test? Is it to depend upon the activity and hopefulness of adjoining landowners in platting their land into building lots, or upon the question whether a neighboring village or town can properly be called a suburb of the principal city? Or is it to depend upon a judicious consideration of all fully, we are unwilling to subscribe to the doctrine that the mere consent of the town authorities will free the railway company from liability to the adjoining property owner whose property will be rendered practically inaccessible. We regard it as clear that the abutters' right of access has been cut off by the building of the road and the necessary acts connected therewith, and not by the merely nominal act of the town board in attempting to fix the grade at the request and for the sole benefit of the street-railway company.

There is, however, another question in the present case, which is much broader in its scope, and which is becoming a more pressing question every day; and that is the question whether passenger railroads operated by mechanical power can be laid over country highways without consent of, or compensation paid to, the adjoining landowner; or, in other words, are they additional burdens to the fee? The development of electric railways and motors is so rapid that this question should, if possible, be settled, as the day is evidently not far distant when such passenger railways running from city to city will be numerous, and extend to all parts of the state. It is well settled that a horse railroad upon a city street, built upon grade, and for the carriage of passengers only, is not an additional burden. The drift and weight of authority in other states seem to be also that the operation of the road by electricity or other mechanical power does not change the nature of the road in this respect, although it is also held by some other courts that, if permanent erections in the street interfering with the right of access are necessary for the operation of the road, these may constitute an additional burden. This court, however, has not passed upon these questions; and, however they may be decided, the result would not necessarily determine the status of a country road in these respects.

That there are many and marked differences between the uses to which a city street is put and the uses to which a country highway is put cannot be denied; nor can it be denied that the uses contemplated when the land is taken vary widely, except that both are intended for purposes of travel. The street railway in its inception is a purely urban institution. It is intended to facilitate travel in and about the city, from one part of the municipality to another, and thus relieve the sidewalks of foot passengers and the roadway of vehicles. It is thus an aid to the exercise of the easement of passage; strictly, a city convenience, for use in the city, by people living or stopping therein, and fully under the control of municipal authorities, who have been endowed with ample power for that purpose. This strictly urban character of the street railways remained practically unchanged for many years, and during these years the long line of decisions grew up recognizing the street railway as merely an improved method of using the street, and rather as a help to the street than a burden thereon. Time, however, has made changes in conditions. New motive power has been discovered and it is found that by its use an enlarged city street car may profitably run long distances, and compete to some extent with the steam railway. It is proposed to convert the city railways into lines of passenger transportation, covering long distances, and connecting widely separated cities and villages, by using the country highways, and operating long and heavy coaches, sometimes made up into trains of several cars. Thus, the urban railway has developed into the interurban railway, and threatens soon to develop into the interstate railway. The small car which took up passengers at one corner, and dropped them at another, has become a large coach, approximating the ordinary railway coach in size, and has become a part, perhaps, of a train which sweeps across the country from one city to another, bearing its load of passengers ticketed through, with an occasional local passenger picked up on the highway. The purely city purpose which the urban railway subserved has developed into or been supplanted by an entirely different purpose, namely, the transportation of passengers from city to city over long stretches of intervening country. When this train or car, with its load of through passengers, is passing through a country town, it is clearly serving no township purpose, save in the most limited sense. It is very difficult to say that this use of a country highway is not an additional burden. It is built and operated mainly to obtain the through travel from city to city, and only incidentally to take up a passenger in the country town. This through travel is unquestionably composed of people who otherwise would travel on the ordinary steam railroad, and would not use the highway at all. Thus, the operation of this newly-developed street railway (so called) upon the country road is precisely opposite to the operation of the urban railway upon the city street. It burdens the road with travel which would otherwise not be there, instead of relieving it by the substitution of one vehicle for many. However we regard this development of the urban into the interurban railway, it seems utterly impossible and illogical to say that it is essentially the same in its purpose or effects as the mere street railway, which was held in the Hobart Case not to be an additional burden on the fee. The reasons given for that holding in that case either do not apply at all, or only in a very limited degree, to the interurban railway. The difference is not so much in the change of motive power, but in the entirely different character of the use. Suppose a steam railway corporation were organized to carry passengers only from city to city, and should attempt to lay its track upon the country roads without compensation; is there any doubt but that it would be held that it could not do so? We think not. Our conclusion is that an interurban electric railway, running upon the highways through country towns, is an additional burden upon the highway. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Montgomery County Pass. R. Co. 167 Pa. 62, 27 L. R. A. 766.

But it is said that a distinction should be drawn between a highway in close proximity to a city, or running between the city and a neighboring suburb, and the ordinary country road through a farming district. The suggestion is not without weight. There is much difference between the practical uses to which the two highways are generally put. The suburban highway very frequently approximates closely to the city street. But, as indicated at the outset of this opinion, the difficulty in drawing any clear line of demarcation between the two is very great. If a line be drawn in one case upon the facts in that case, depending upon mere proximity, or upon the manner of use, or the density of population, or the prospect of rapid settlement, or upon all of these circumstances together, it cannot apply to any other case; and the question will always be one of doubt and embarrassment, leading to different conclusions in different courts. Such a condition of the law is to the last degree undesirable. The legislature, by chapter 175 of the Laws of 1897, has provided that such corporations may condemn lands necessary for their use, but has further provided that the act should not apply to streets in an incorporated city. In thus clothing street-railway companies with the power to condemn as to all property except streets within city limits, the legislature seems to have indicated its conclusion that the city line was the proper line of demarcation, and that within that line at least, condemnation of a street was unnecessary. While this legislative idea has no binding force in determining the question of additional burden, it may justly be considered by the court which is called upon to pass upon a question beset with so much difficulty. If the line be fixed at the limits of the corporation, it will at least have the great merit of certainty, and be capable of unerring application. Presumably the city limits include the entire urban area, and we feel, under all the circumstances, that it is the true and proper line.

We are not unmindful of the fact that the questions discussed in this opinion are vexed questions, upon which there has been much contrariety of opinion in the various courts of the country, and that the law is only in process of settlement, and must continue in that condition for years. In endeavoring to draw the line between the public right of passage, upon the one side, and the rights of the private owner, on the other, great care is manifestly needful that neither be sacrificed nor unduly magnified at the expense of the other. We held in the case of Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Milwaukee, R. & K. Electric R. Co. 95 Wis. 561, 37 L. R. A. 856, that an electric railway for the carriage of passengers, freight, and express matter between cities constitutes an additional burden upon the highway in a country town through which it passes. We hold in this case that an electric passenger railroad upon a country highway falls under the same rule. Both holdings seem to us to be founded upon good reason as well as authority, and we believe them to be salutary and just.

Orders affirmed.

M. Y. DUNCAN, Appt.

(.....Mo.....)

1. One who writes on the back of a note an assignment with a guaranty of payment is an indorser.
2. Payments by the maker of a note will not interrupt the running of the statute of limitations as to an indorser, under Rev. Stat. § 6786, which provides that nothing contained in the two preceding sections (which require an acknowledgment or promise to be in writing, subscribed by the party to be charged, and that a person shall not be bound by an acknowledgment or promise of a joint obligor) "shall alter, take away, or lessen the effect of the payment of any principal or interest made by any person."

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the St. Louis Court of Appeals affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Audrain County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce defendant's liability as indorser of a promissory note. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George Robertson, for appellant:

The contract of indorsement is a new contract, and is independent of the note, and it is not an engagement with the maker.

Hagerman v. Sutton, 91 Mo. 519; 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 834.

Burgess, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On June 1, 1877, James T. Carter executed his note to the defendant for the sum of $2,000, due three years after date, with interest at the rate of 10 per cent per annum, compounded annually. Thereafter defendant, by the following indorsement, assigned said note to Samuel Grant:

Waiving notice and protest and demand, I assign the within note to Samuel Grant, for value received, and I guarantee the payment of it.

August 8, 1877.

M. G. Duncan.

Grant assigned the note to plaintiff about June 1, 1891. The petition was in two counts. The first count was an action against the defendant as indorser, and the second count was against him as indorser and surety. The answer was a plea of the ten years' statute of limitations. Numerous payments were made upon the note by the maker Carter. The last payment made by him was $150, paid January 27, 1891. The note, however, was secured by deed of trust on a tract of land in Audrain county, which was sold thereunder by J. N. Stephens, sheriff and acting trustee, and $1,915.93 realized from the sale, which was applied as a credit on said note on March 16, 1894. No payment was ever made upon the note by defendant. At the September term, 1895, of the circuit court of Audrain county, the case was tried to the court without the aid of a jury, and judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff for $2,680.24, from which defendant appealed.

It is a rule of universal application in commercial law that every indorsement of a promissory note, whether for accommodation or otherwise, is essentially a new contract, independent of any contract obligations of the maker. Edwards, Bills & Notes, 3d ed. § 863; Beach, Modern Law Contr. § 605; Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 256; Dunnigan v. Stetens, 122 Ill. 896; Trabus v. Short, 18 La. Ann. 257; Trimble v. Thorne, 16 Johns. 152, 8 Am. Dec. 302; Aymar v. Sheldon, 12 Wend. 439, 27 Am. Dec. 187; Hunt v. Standart, 15 Ind. 85, 77 Am. Dec. 79. In Ferguson v. Staples, 82 Me. 159, it is said: "The indorsement of a note is a new contract. The indorser engages that the note shall be paid according to its tenor; that is upon proper presentment, demand and notice. He engages that it is genuine, and the legal obligation that it purports to be, and that he has title to it, and a right to indorse it. Story, Prom. Notes, § 185; 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 669; State Bank v. Fearing, 16 Pick. 533, 28 Am. Dec. 265; Prescott Bank v. Caverly, 7 Gray, 217, 66 Am. Dec. 473. All engagements of the indorser, except payment, conditioned upon demand and notice, and possibly the validity of the note when it is voidable only, are absolute warranties, and not dependent upon any condition whatever. If the note transferred by indorsement be a forgery, or absolutely void for any other reason, the indorser may be sued for the original consideration paid him, or may be held as a party without demand and notice. 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 669, 675; 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1113; 2 Parsons, Notes & Bills, p. 444; Copp v. M'Dugall, 9 Mass. 1; Burrill v. Smith, 7 Pick. 291." The indorser's liability, as such, becomes fixed when demand of payment of the note is made of the principal on the day that it falls due, is refused, and he is notified thereof. These conditions were expressly waived by the indorser in this case, so that the liability of Duncan became fixed when the note became due, and default was made in the payment.

The question to be determined is with respect to the relation that defendant bore to the holder of the note,—whether that of indorser or surety. It is perfectly clear that he was not a surety; so that, whether he be indorser or guarantor, he could not, in the absence of statutory enactment, be joined in the same action with the maker. Ross v. Jones, 22 Wall. 576, 22 L. ed. 730; Graham v. Ringo, 67 Mo. 324. But by § 1995, Rev. Stat. 1889, it is provided that "every person who shall have a cause of action against several persons, including parties to bills of exchange and promissory notes, and who shall be entitled by law to one satisfaction therefor, may bring suit thereon jointly against all or as many of the persons liable as he may think proper;" so that plaintiff, had he desired to do so, might have maintained an action against Duncan and the maker of the note jointly. In Vanant v. Arnold, 81 Ga. 210, the defendant negotiated notes with the following indorsement on the back: "For value received, we assign the within notes to A. J. & H. and H. E. D. & Co., waiving demand and notice, and guarantee the payment of the same." And it was held that the defendants were liable on said notes as indorsers. In Weitz v. Wolfe, 28 Neb. 500, the payee of a negotiable promissory note sold the same with the following written on the back: "I guarantee the payment of the within note, waiving demand and notice of protest,"—which was signed by the payee, and it was ruled that he was indorser. By guaranteeing the payment of the note, the position of the indorser and payee was not changed from that of indorser to that of guarantor. It will be observed that the indorsement on the note here sued on is in almost the exact words of the indorsements on the notes sued on in those cases, and seems to settle the question that the defendant herein occupies the relation towards the notes in question of indorser.

What effect, then, did the payments on the note by the maker, which stayed the statute of limitations, and kept the note alive as to him, have upon the defendant as indorser? This depends upon the proper construction to be given to our statute of limitations. The sections bearing upon the subject now under consideration are as follows:

"Sec. 6798. In actions founded on any contract, no acknowledgment or promise hereafter made shall be evidence of a new or continuing contract, whereby to take any case out of the operation of the provisions of this article, or deprive any party of the benefit thereof, unless such acknowledgment or promise be made or contained by or in some writing subscribed by the party chargeable thereby.

"Sec. 6794. If there be two or more joint contractors or joint executors or administrators of any contractor, no such joint contractor or executor or administrator shall lose the benefit of the provisions of this article, so as to be chargeable by reason only of any acknowledgment or promise made or subscribed by any other or others of them.

"Sec. 6795. Nothing contained in the two preceding sections shall alter, take away, or lessen the effect of the payment of any principal or interest made by any person."

In Craig v. Callaway County Ct. 12 Mo. 94, it was ruled that the payment of interest by one of several joint obligors in a bond, before the statute of limitations attaches, takes it out of the statute of limitations as to the others. So, it was held in Vernon County School Fund v. Stewart, 64 Mo. 408, 27 Am. Rep. 250, that part payment made upon a bond by the administrator of one of the joint makers within the statutory period would prevent the running of the statute of limitations in favor of the other makers of the bond. And in Bennett v. McCane, 65 Mo. 194, it was intimated that part payment of a note by a comaker will arrest the running of the statute as against all the parties to the note. The same rule was announced in Bender v. Markle, 37 Mo. App. 284. When this case was before the St. Louis court of appeals (Maddox v. Duncan, 62 Mo. App. 474), Rombauer, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "In Leach v. Asher, 20 Mo. App. 656, and Zervis v. Unnerstall, 29 Mo. App. 474, we reviewed the decisions in this state on that subject, and were forced to conclude that the rule as stated in Craig v. Callaway County Ct. 12 Mo. 94, was the rule prevailing in this state, whatever the rule may be in other jurisdictions." Duncan was neither joint maker of, nor co-obligor on, the note in question. His position was that of indorser, and his contract as such was separate from and independent of the note, and so entirely independent from that of maker or co-obligor that he could not at common law have been sued jointly with the maker, but a separate action was indispensable. 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. 4th ed. § 689; Ross v. Jones, 23 Wall. 576, 23 L. ed. 730. An indorser's contract is governed by the laws of the state where the indorsement is made, and not necessarily by the laws of the state where the note is made. They may be and often are made in different states. The position of indorser is so at variance with that of surety and co obligor that the adjudications to the effect that payment made on a note by one joint maker or co obligor within the statutory period takes it out of the statute of limitations as to the other makers or co obligors have no bearing upon this case. Nor does the fact that, under the statute, the maker and indorser may be sued jointly, change the relation of the parties. The statute which provides (§ 6795, supra) that "nothing contained in the two preceding sections shall alter, take away, or lessen the effect of a payment of any principal or interest made by any person," means that such payment, in order to arrest the statute of limitations, must be made by some co surety or co-obligor, or the legal representative of such person, and does not mean that such a payment by a maker or surety on the note or a stranger thereto will arrest the statute as to an indorser. Our conclusion is that the payments on the note by the maker, Carter, did not arrest the running of the statute of limitations as to the indorser, Duncan, and that, more than ten years having elapsed after plaintiff's cause of action accrued against him as indorser, the action was barred at the time of the commencement of the suit.

We therefore reverse the judgment, without remanding the cause.

which the check is drawn, but has an account there as administrator, or in some other trust capacity, it is wrong for the bank to pay the check and charge it to the trust account.

7. The bank of Belmont purchased a check drawn on the bank of Barnesville, from the payee thereof, who was known to the cashier, and at his request the cashier wrote the payee's name on the back of the check as a blank indorsement. The cashier then indorsed the check "For collection" and forwarded it to its correspondent, which also indorsed it "For collection," and presented it to the drawee bank, which paid it, and charged it to the account of the drawer as administrator, as he had no individual account with the bank. About three months thereafter, the check was found to be a forgery, and the drawee bank caused it to be duly protested, and gave notice to the Belmont bank, and demanded repayment of the money. Held, that the drawee bank was bound to know the signature of its depositor, and was negligent in charging the check to his account as administrator, and that it had no right to recover the money.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Belmont County to review a judgment reversing a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in favor of defendant in an action brought to hold defendant liable as indorser on a bank check. Reversed.

Statement by Burket, J.:

A jury was waived, and the case submitted to the court upon the amended petition and answer thereto in the court of common pleas. Disregarding technicalities, the amended petition and answer concede the facts to be as follows: On the 19th day of June, 1893, during banking hours, Elwood Horner presented to the First National Bank of Belmont a check for $105, purporting to be drawn by J. W. Horner on the First National Bank of Barnesville. At the request of Elwood Horner, the payee, the cashier of the Belmont bank wrote Mr. Horner's name on the back of the check, and, in the usual course of business, gave him $105 in cash for the check. The Belmont bank then, and in the usual course of business, indorsed the check "For collection," and sent it to the People's National Bank of Barnesville; and that bank also, in the usual course of business, indorsed it "For collection," and presented it to the drawee, the First National Bank of Barnesville, and received payment during banking hours, in full, on June 21, 1893. The following is a copy of the check, with all indorsements:

No. ——— Barnesville, June 19, 1893.

First National Bank, pay to the order of Elwood Horner one hundred and five dollars. $105.00.

J. W. Horner.

Indorsed: Elwood Horner.

For collection account of First National Bank, Belmont, Ohio.

William Kinney, Cashier.

For collection for account of People's National Bank of Barnesville, Ohio.

A. E. Dent, Cashier.

J. W. Horner, individually, had no account with the First National Bank of Barnesville, but had an account there as administrator, and the bank charged the check to his administrator account. Upon settlement and balancing his pass book, on October 6, 1893, J. W. Horner pronounced the check a forgery, and refused to allow it in his settlement with the bank. Thereupon the First National Bank of Barnesville caused the check to be duly protested on the 9th day of October, 1893, and caused notice to be served by due course of mail on the Belmont bank that the check was a forgery, and demanded payment of the check from that bank. About the 1st of October, 1893, said Elwood Horner died, leaving an estate wholly insolvent, of which facts the Belmont bank had knowledge when it received the notice of protest. None of the banks had any knowledge that the check was a forgery, and all believed it to be genuine. Upon these facts, the common pleas court rendered judgment in favor of the Belmont bank, defendant below. The circuit court reversed the judgment, and rendered judgment against the Belmont bank, and in favor of the First National Bank of Barnesville, for the full amount of the check, with interest and costs. Thereupon the Belmont bank filed its petition in error in this court, seeking to reverse the judgment of the circuit court, and asking an affirmance of the judgment of the common pleas.

Messrs. John Pollock and N. N. Kenyon, for plaintiff in error:

J. W. Horner was the customer of the 41 L. R. A.

The Belmont bank placed a restrictive indorsement on the check, namely: "For collection." Such restrictive indorsement does not guarantee the signature of the drawer as between indorser and drawee, so as to relieve the latter of its obligation to know such signature.

See Third Nat. Bank v. Merchant's Nat. Bank, 76 Hun. 475; Indiana Nat. Bank v. First Nat. Bank, 9 Ind. App. 185.

Burket, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Since the case of Price v. Neale, 8 Burr. 1854, decided by Lord Mansfield in 1762, the general rule has been, and is, that, when the drawee of a check or bill pays the same to a bona fide holder, such drawee cannot recover the money back upon discovering such check or bill to be a forgery. The drawee is presumed to know the signature of the drawer, and if, when the check or bill is presented to the drawee for payment, he pays the same, and it afterwards turns out to be a forgery, he cannot recover the money back from the person to whom he paid it. When the drawee is a bank, there is a much stronger reason for holding it to know the signature of its depositors and customers than in the case of a private individual, because banks keep a book in which are preserved the genuine signatures of their depositors, customers, and correspondents. That the general rule is as above stated is shown by the following authorities. National Park Bank v. Ninth Nat. Bank, 46 N. Y. 77; Smith v. Mercer, 6 Taunt. 76; Wilkinson v. Johnson, 3 Barn. & C. 428; National Bank of Commerce v. National Mechanics' Bkg. Asso. 55 N. Y. 211, 14 Am. Rep. 232; Frank v. Chemical Nat. Bank, 84 N. Y. 209, 88 Am. Rep. 501; Levy v. Bank, 4 Dall. 284, 1 L. ed. 814; Morse, Banks & Banking, 3d ed. § 468; 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. 3d ed. §§ 1859, 1855; Northwestern Nat. Bank v. Bank of Commerce, 107 Mo. 402, 15 L. R. A. 102; Commercial & F. Nat. Bank v. First Nat. Bank, 80 Md. 11, 96 Am. Dec. 554; Deposit Bank v. Fayette Nat. Bank, 90 Ky. 10, 7 L. R. A. 49; First Nat. Bank v. First Nat. Bank, 151 Mass. 280; National Park Bank v. Seaboard Bank, 114 N. Y. 28; 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1071; Ellis v. Ohio Life Ins. & T. Co. 4 Ohio St. 628, 64 Am. Dec. 610. This last case fully recognizes the general rule, but the majority of the court, two judges dissenting, held that as there was a local custom among banks at Cincinnati to the effect that, before purchasing bills or checks drawn upon other banks in that city, the purchasing bank should have the identity of the person offering to dispose of the paper fully shown, and make careful inquiry as to his right to the paper, and as to its being genuine, and that the purchasing bank in that case, having neglected the customary precautions, was guilty of such negligence as to make it liable to pay back the money received on the forged bills. The court was careful to say that it was dealing only with the case then under consideration; and the right to recover back the money in that case is founded upon the local custom, and the general rule is not modified further than to hold that in view of the local custom, known to both banks, the purchasing bank was guilty of such negligence in taking the bills from an unidentified stranger as to render it liable to pay back the money when the bills turned out to be forgeries.

It is urged that, as the check was presented for payment to the drawee bank by another bank in good standing, the drawee bank had a right to presume that the check was all right, and, relying upon such presumption, it was thereby thrown off its guard, and was less careful in scrutinizing the signature to the check than if the same had been presented at its counter for payment by an individual. A holding to this effect has been made in a few cases wherein the indorsements were unrestricted, but, when the indorsement is "for collection" or "for account of," it is notice to the drawee that the bank presenting the check or bill for payment is not the owner, but only the agent of the owner, and that the money is to be remitted to the owner, back through the same channel through which the check or bill was received by the collecting bank. In such cases the collecting bank acts as the agent or servant of the owner, and the drawee bank is not justified in relaxing its vigilance. Some years ago the practice of indorsing checks "for collection" or "for account of" had become almost universal; and when it was decided in the above cases of National Park Bank v. Seaboard Bank and Northwestern Nat. Bank v. Bank of Commerce, that the drawee bank could not recover back the money, in the one case from the collecting bank, or in the other from the bank owing the draft, it startled the banks located in large cities, and awakened them to the dangers attending the payment of such drafts or bills; and the result was that in the year 1896 the clearing house in the city of New York adopted a rule to the effect that its members should not send through the exchanges any paper having any qualified or restrictive indorsements, such as "for collection" or "for account of," unless all indorsements were guaranteed by the bank sending such paper. This action was soon followed by the clearing houses in other cities, and in some of them all indorsements are required to be either in blank, or "pay to ——— or order." By this action of the clearing houses, indorsements "for collection" or "for account of" have fallen into disuse, and the banking business of the country is now done almost universally upon unrestricted indorsements. The decisions of the courts as to the rights and liabilities of the parties to paper with unrestricted indorsements thereon vary somewhat in different states; but in this state the general rule that the drawee bank is bound to know the signature of the drawer has not been modified further than as permitted by local custom, as in Ohio Life Ins. & T. Co.'s Case, above cited.

It is urged that the Belmont bank, having indorsed the check, thereby guaranteed that the signatures of the drawer and indorsers were genuine, and some cases are cited to that effect. People's Bank v. Franklin Bank, 88 Tenn. 299, 6 L. R. A. 724; First Nat. Bank v. First Nat. Bank, 151 Mass. 280. Other cases hold that an indorser does not guarantee that the name of the drawer is genuine, but that the drawee must determine that for himself, and at his own peril. Germania Nat. Bank v. Boutell, 60 Minn. 189, 27 L. R. A. 635, and cases there cited. In the cases in which it has been held that the indorsement is a guaranty, to the effect that the name of the drawer is genuine, the indorsements were unrestricted, and therefore indicated an absolute transfer and sale of the paper. But when the indorsement is for collection only, as in this case, it indicates on its face that the indorser remains the owner of the paper, and that his successive indorsees are only his agents for the sole purpose of collecting the paper and remitting the proceeds to him. Such a restricted indorsement does not authorize a subsequent indorsee to negotiate the paper. His only power is to collect it, and the drawee bank is bound by the notice in the indorsement. Such an indorsement is not a guaranty that the name of the drawer is genuine, but only that the names of the indorsers then on the paper are genuine. Mechanics' Bank v. Valley Pucking Co. 70 Mo. 643, 4 Mo. App. 200; Northwestern Nat. Bank v. Bank of Commerce, 107 Mo. 402, 15 L. R. A. 102. In the case now under consideration the drawer's name was a forgery, but the name of the payee indorsed on the check was genuine, having been written by the cashier at the request of the payee.

It has been urged that, if the payee had been required by the cashier to write his name upon the check, it might have shown that his name in the body of the check had been written by himself, and thus lead to a detection of the forgery. But in the above case of First Nat. Bank v. First Nat. Bank, the payee indorsed the check, and the handwriting was the same in both names, payee and indorser; and yet the forgery was not thereby detected, and the court attaches no importance to the fact in its decision of the case. In that case, and in the above case in 4 Ohio St. 628, 64 Am. Dec. 610, and in nearly all the cases in which the money has been recovered back, the bank purchasing the check or bill took it from an unidentified stranger; and this has often, though not always, been held to be such negligence as would authorize a recovery of the money. But in the case at bar the facts do not show Elwood Horner to have been a stranger to the cashier of the Belmont bank, because, as soon as he was notified of the forgery, he pointed out that Mr. Horner had died only a few days before, and that his estate was wholly insolvent. He was therefore known, and required no identification, and the cases which turn upon the unidentified stranger have no application to this case.

Again, it is conceded that J. W. Horner had no individual account with the First National Bank of Barnesville, the drawee, and that the bank charged the check to his account as administrator. This was not only irregular, but wrong. The bank should have refused payment, and allowed the check to go to protest; or, if it desired to favor Mr. Horner, it should have notified him that his check was at the bank, and no funds with which to pay the same. Had this been done, the forgery would have been discovered at once, and notice would have been given to the Belmont bank, and that bank would then have had recourse on Elwood Horner, who indorsed and sold the check. Whether he was then solvent or not does not appear, and is of no importance. The bank would have had its recourse against him within three or four days after it parted with its money, and such recourse is regarded in commercial transactions as a valuable right; and of this right the Belmont bank was deprived by the acts of the Barnesville bank in not detecting that the name of its depositor was forged to the check, and in negligently charging it to his account as administrator. It is therefore clear that the Belmont bank was guilty of no negligence, and that the loss occurred by reason of the acts of the First National Bank of Barnesville, and that it would be unconscionable to permit it to recover the money back from the Belmont bank.

The judgment of the circuit court is therefore reversed, and that of the common pleas affirmed. Judgment accordingly.

NORTHWESTERN MUTUAL RELIEF ASSOCIATION, Appt.

(90 Wis. 322.)

1. Judicial notice will be taken of the fact that no ordinary man could go through a hole 15x20 inches unless he went head first, or with both feet first, and that to do so by mere accident would be very improbable if not impossible.
2. The presumption against suicide is not sufficient to sustain a cause of action under an insurance policy against death brought about by "some external cause or accident, and not by disease or any voluntary act," where the insured, who went to bed as usual, was found next morning in a cistern underground back of the house, with underclothes, pants, and stockings on, but no coat, and the opening to the cistern was 15x20 inches.

NOTE.—As to the presumption in respect to suicide of an insured person, see Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Wiswell (Kan.) 35 L. R. A. 253, and note on page 252. 41 L. R. A.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Waukesha County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to enforce payment of the amount alleged to be due on a policy of life insurance. Reversed.

Statement by Cassoday, J.:

Hubert Johns entered into a contract of insurance with the defendant in 1885. Said contract continued in force until October 1, 1890, when, by agreement of the parties, the old certificate of insurance was surrendered, and a new one issued, dated on that day to the effect that in consideration of the payment of assessments therein mentioned upon maturity of said certificate, and within ninety days after due proof and allowance of such claim upon presentation and surrender thereof, the defendant would pay the said Hubert Johns, or in case of his death, the beneficiaries therein named, if living, as therein mentioned, provided that said disability benefit should only apply and be paid in cases where the injury therein provided and contemplated should result from and be brought about by some external cause of accident, and not by disease, or any voluntary act of the member. That the same was to mature by limitation March 14, 1914, and then be paid as therein prescribed. That in case of maturity by death, there should be paid 80 per cent of an assessment of one table rate from each member, levied and collected therefor and applicable thereto, not exceeding $4,000, less any payment before made on account of maturity by disability or limitation, or any indebtedness due or accrued to the association from such member, and that the certificate was issued, and accepted subject to the conditions, rules, and regulations printed on the back thereof. Among the rules and regulations so indorsed thereon is the following, to wit: "Suicide, or self destruction of the member herein named, whether voluntary or involuntary, sane or insane at the time thereof, is not a risk assumed by this association; provided, however, that in case of self destruction the association, within ninety days after due proof and allowance of such claim, and upon presentation of this certificate, shall return to the beneficiaries herein named, 80 per cent of all assessments paid by such member; provided, also, that the amount so returned shall not exceed 80 per cent of an assessment levied and collected therefor and applicable to the payment thereof." On June 1, 1893, the said Hubert Johns came to his death by drowning in a cistern. On September 25, 1893, this action was commenced in equity to enforce an assessment to pay such loss. The complaint alleges full performance on the part of said assured. The answer alleges in effect, the rule relieving the defendant from liability in case of suicide or self destruction, and that Hubert Johns came to his death by suicide or self destruction. At the close of the trial the court found, in effect, the facts stated, and that Hubert Johns got into the cistern in which he was found dead, accidentally, and did not commit suicide, and did not take his own life, either voluntarily or involuntarily. As conclusions of law the court found that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment, ordering and directing the defendant to levy, assess, and collect and pay to the beneficiaries above named (the plaintiffs herein) 80 per cent of the assessment so made, not to exceed the sum of $4,000, with interest thereon from September 20, 1893, and ordered judgment accordingly. From the judgment entered accordingly the defendant brings this appeal.

Messrs. T. W. Haight and Chynoweth & Fliegler for appellant.

Messrs. Ryan & Merton for respondents.

Cassoday, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It appears that at the time of his death Hubert was a tailor by trade, and was living with his second wife; that he had two children by his former wife,—a daughter, who had been absent from home for a long time; and a son, thirteen or fourteen years of age, who had left home a few months before Hubert's death; that he felt bad about the son leaving as he did; that he had lived with the plaintiff, Elizabeth, his second wife, about eleven years; that they had six children, the oldest being about ten years of age, and the youngest a few months of age; that Hubert and his second wife had always apparently lived happily together; that Hubert was always reserved, and during a few months immediately before his death was more or less melancholy; that he had a home with no liens thereon; that he was out of debt, and had $235 in the bank, evidenced by certificates of deposit; that on the day prior to his death he worked as usual, his wife and some of his children being on a visit at Pewaukee; that they returned about 6 o'clock in the evening; that he then started a fire in the kitchen, and told his wife he would go down town, return a coat, pay his insurance, and when he got back would eat his supper; that he spent the evening with his family; that he went to bed with his wife, as usual; that she woke up early the next morning,—about daylight or before,—and missed him; that, after failing to find him, she went out the back door; that there was a beaten path on the earth leading from that door to the pump, and another branching off from it to the right, leading to the privy; that in going in that path from the house to the pump, and 8 or 4 feet to the left of that path, and 6 or 8 feet from the house, was a cistern, under ground; that the ground back of the house and up to the cistern curb was level; that the curb was of boards, and rose about 4 inches above the ground, and surrounded the opening to the cistern, which was 15 by 20 inches; that the board cover to the cistern was not fastened to the curb, but was loose; that upon discovering that the cover was off the cistern, she looked in, and there saw and felt of her husband in the water; that she at once gave the alarm, and the neighbors assembled, and took him out, and an inquest upon his body was held; that when so found he had his underclothes, pants, and stockings on, but no coat. The evidence is that he came to his death by drowning.

Counsel for the plaintiff is undoubtedly correct in contending that "when the dead body of the insured is found under such circumstances, and with such injuries, that the death may have resulted from [negligence], accident, or suicide, the presumption is against suicide, as contrary to the general conduct of mankind." May, Ins. § 325. Whether the death was accidental or intentional, whenever there is any evidence bearing upon the point, is a question of fact for the jury or court. Ibid. It is only essential that the evidence preponderates against the presumption of accident. Bachmeyer v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. 87 Wis. 337, 338. "A presumption of suicide cannot be indulged in as a mere presumption, without any fact or circumstance upon which it can be logically predicated." Sorenson v. Menasha Paper & Pulp Co. 56 Wis. 333. Counsel for the plaintiff seem to rely in part upon that case, but there were no facts or circumstances in that case from which suicide could be inferred. On the contrary, they were all harmonious with death by accident. The same is true with respect to Cronkhite v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 75 Wis. 116. Under the contract of insurance in the case at bar the plaintiff could only recover by showing that the death was the result of, or brought about by, "some external cause or accident, and not by disease or any voluntary act of the member." The burden of proving such facts, subject to the presumption mentioned, was upon the plaintiff. Travellers' Ins. Co. v. McConkey, 127 U. S. 661, 32 L. R. A. 808. Under the contract of insurance, this defendant did not assume the risk in case Hubert Johns committed "suicide or self-destruction, . . . whether voluntary or involuntary, sane or insane at the time thereof." It is immaterial, therefore, whether at the time of his death he was sane or insane. Bigelow v. Berkshire L. Ins. Co. 93 U. S. 284, 23 L. ed. 918. In the absence of any evidence to the contrary, we must assume that Hubert was like other ordinary men; that he had two legs, and walked upon his feet; that in walking he stepped one foot at a time; that in taking a step with one foot the other necessarily remained upon the ground until the step was completed; that, if he accidentally stepped into the hole, it could only be with one foot, and that that foot would necessarily go down in the hole, while the other foot remained upon the ground, and his body and arms and hands would necessarily fall over and beyond the hole. It is conceded and found that the hole was only 15 by 20 inches square by actual measurement. The size of an ordinary man is of common knowledge, and we take judicial notice that no ordinary man could go through such a hole, unless he went head first, or with both feet first; and that it is very improbable, if not impossible, for such a man, walking upon the ground, to fall into such a hole, either head first or with both feet first, by mere accident, and without any design or purpose of thus going down into the cistern. And if we assume that he intentionally thus went down into the cistern, at the time and under the circumstances mentioned, then the inference of "suicide or self-destruction," within the meaning of the contract, seems to be sufficient to overcome any presumption of accident that might otherwise be indulged. Whether the plaintiffs can, under the peculiar wording of this contract of insurance, recover in this action a percentage of all assessments paid by Hubert Johns was not argued, and is not here determined.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause is remanded for further proceedings according to law.

VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

PEOPLE'S PERPETUAL LOAN & BUILDING ASSOCIATION.

(95 Va. 696.)

A statute relieving from the imputation of usury all contracts made by a building and loan association under a charter of doubtful validity is not unconstitutional as to those contracts because it is retroactive.

(March 17, 1896.)

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Circuit Court for the City of Roanoke in favor of defendant in a suit brought to enjoin defendant from enforcing a loan association contract by proceeding to sell the mortgaged property for payment of dues and fines. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Scott & Staples, for appellant:

A statute is never to be construed as retrospective in its operation, if any other construction can be fairly placed upon it.

There is nothing in the act which enables or justifies any building and loan association, domestic or foreign, to violate the usury laws or any other laws in the commonwealth of Virginia.

An act of legislature authorizing a building and loan association, or any other corporation, to charge premium and interest, and to fix the amount thereof, does not entitle them to fix an amount in excess of the interest allowed by the law of that state, unless there is a provision in the statute expressly suspending the operation of the usury laws as to contracts made by such companies.

All taint of usury has now been removed from it by the passage of two acts of the legislature.

There can be no doubt that the judge of the corporation court for the city of Roanoke, Virginia, had the right to grant a charter to the People's Perpetual Loan & Building Association for the purpose of enabling it to carry on the business of a building association.

Davies v. Creighton, 33 Gratt. 696.

There are unquestionably cases in which the state may grant privileges to specified individuals without violating any constitutional principle, because, from the nature of the case, it is impossible that they should be possessed and enjoyed by all; and if it is important that they should exist, the proper state authority must be left to select the grantees. Of this class are grants of the franchise to a corporation.

Cooley, Const. Lim. chap. 11, p. 894.

Where the charter of a corporation permitted the bank to take interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum, and the general law prohibited anything in excess of 6 per cent, this was a valid contract between the state and corporation, and was inviolable by an act of the legislature or by an ordinance of the constitutional convention.

Keith, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only question to be considered in this case is whether the transactions between Smoot and the People's Perpetual Loan & Building Association were usurious. The circuit court held that they were not.

This association was organized under a charter granted by the judge of the corporation court of the city of Roanoke in 1887. By it the association was authorized to make loans to its members, or others, and to receive as security for loans thus made their shares, either by way of redemption or hypothecation, and to take deeds of trust or mortgages on any real or personal estate, or collateral security, for the repayment of the loans or advances in such instalments as might be agreed upon. In the case of a redemption, the shares so redeemed were to be canceled, but the members were in no wise relieved from their obligation to perform all the duties they had assumed to the association, and for their failure to discharge them could be subjected to like fines and penalties as though their shares of stock had not been redeemed. It was made lawful for the association to receive in advance interest on its loans, and to charge and deduct upon the redemption of shares such premiums for the privilege of having them redeemed as might from time to time be fixed by the board of directors, or agreed upon between the corporation and the parties so having their shares redeemed.

In the preamble to an act of the legislature approved January 23, 1895 (Acts 1896, p. 170), the charter granted by the court is set out in full, and it then proceeds as follows: "And whereas said charter was duly accepted and has been acted under by said association; and whereas some doubt has arisen as to the authority of the said corporation court of Roanoke to grant said charter upon the terms set forth in said certificate; therefore,

"Be it enacted by the general assembly of Virginia, that said charter be, and the same is hereby declared to be, as to all contracts entered into by said association in accordance with the provisions of the aforesaid certificate, as valid to all intents and purposes as if originally granted by the general assembly of Virginia."

The contention on the part of the appellant is that the dealings between himself and the association were usurious, that they cannot be maintained upon the theory that the relations existing between the company and its members were those pertaining to partnerships, that a charter granted by the court will not relieve transactions entered into under it of the imputation of usury, and that the act approved March 1, 1894 (Acts 1894, p. 560), entitled "An Act to Define the Powers and Limitations of Building and Loan Associations," has no retroactive effect.

All these positions are well taken, in the judgment of this court. In support of them we are content to refer to the cases of Crabtree v. Old Dominion Bldg. & Loan Asso. 95 Va. 670, and Ware v. Bankers' Loan & Invest. Co. 95 Va. 680 (just decided)

It is further contended on behalf of the appellant that the act of January 23, 1896, in the first place, does not undertake to validate the contracts under investigation; and, secondly, that, if such were the purpose of the act, it would be unconstitutional and void.

The charter granted by the corporation court confers power upon the association thereby created to receive in advance interest on loans, and to charge and deduct, upon the redemption of shares, such premiums for the privilege of having them redeemed as may from time to time be fixed by the board of directors, or agreed upon between the corporation and the parties so having their shares redeemed. The association was authorized to pass by-laws and create such fines and forfeitures as might be reasonable and proper to enforce the payment of all instalments and other dues on the part of those subscribing to its stock, or borrowing money from it.

These provisions in the charter seem sufficient to warrant the dealings which took place between Smoot and the association. A doubt was entertained as to the efficacy of the charter granted by a court to protect a transaction which could be questioned upon the ground of its usurious nature, and, in order to put that doubt at rest, resort was had to the legislature. The mischief which it was intended to remedy by the act under consideration is apparent. The purpose of those who sought legislative intervention was to remove the taint of illegality from contracts theretofore made by the People's Perpetual Loan & Building Association. The charter was recited in the preamble of the act. The motive of the act is declared upon its face to have been to quiet doubts that had arisen with respect to the powers conferred upon this association by the charter granted by the court. Therefore it was enacted that "the charter be, and the same is hereby declared to be, as to all contracts entered into by said association in accordance with the provisions of the aforesaid certificate, as valid to all intents and purposes, as if originally granted by the general assembly of Virginia." There are some things so clear that the attempt to elucidate them serves rather to obscure, and we find ourselves confronted by this difficulty in the endeavor to render more plain and certain the meaning and scope of this act. The charter, and all contracts made in accordance with its provisions, are declared to be as valid to all purposes and intents as if originally granted by the general assembly of Virginia. The question therefore resolves itself into one of power upon the part of the legislature, for the intent seems to be too manifest to be a subject of real controversy.

It is claimed by appellant that the construction which we have given to the act renders it unconstitutional, the legislature being without power to confer such privileges.

In support of this position, he relies upon § 6, art. 1, of the Bill of Rights, which declares "that no man, or set of men, are entitled to exclusive or separate emoluments or privileges from the community but in consideration of public services; which, not being descendible, neither ought the offices of magistrate, legislator, or judge to be hereditary."

This commonwealth on the 29th day of June, 1776, adopted a bill of rights and Constitution, and proclaimed herself a sovereign and independent state, five days before the birth of these United States,—a circumstance, it may be observed in passing, which should fix the date of our independence, and be kept in perpetual memory by being embodied in the writs of courts, and the formal acts of the various departments of our state government. In the paragraph quoted from that bill of rights, we have the statement of a general proposition, followed by an illustration which shows beyond peradventure the evil at which the provision under consideration was directed. Our forefathers were wise and practical men. They were neither political speculators nor dreamy enthusiasts. They did not strive for an impossible equality, such as has never existed in any society where men have ceased to be equally savage or equally wretched. They did not seek to establish a government theoretically perfect, but, guided by the light of experience, it was their aim to found institutions under which their descendants, secured in the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property, might be free, prosperous, and happy so long as they possessed the wisdom and virtue essential to the preservation of their glorious heritage. They knew the wrongs by which they had been oppressed, and the evils which they had endured, under a government of hereditary magistrates and rulers; and it was to shield themselves and posterity from their recurrence that the immortal bill of rights was adopted, which was, is, and will remain, the noblest and most comprehensive declaration of the rights of man.

For more than a century we have lived under that great charter of freedom. During that time corporations without number have been created, all of which have enjoyed privileges not conferred on the mass of citizens. Building associations have been formed, under which contracts have been made, obnoxious to the charge of usury, unless warrant for them is found in the statutes under which they were organized. See White v. Mechanics' Bldg. Fund Assn. 22 Gratt. 293; National Mut. Bldg. & L. Assn. v. Ashworth, 91 Va. 706; Nichols v. People's Bldg. Loan & Sav. Assn. 93 Va. 880, and many other cases. During all this period no such question has been raised. It is appalling to contemplate the consequences which might follow from the decision which we are asked to make. If this court ought, in the discharge of its duty, so to decide, then it is safe to say that all the courts of the Union should likewise so declare; for it is believed that there are few state constitutions without provisions similar to, and in many instances even more stringent than, ours. If it be the law, it applies with equal force to foreign and to domestic corporations; for it would scarcely be contended that the legislature of New York could confer upon corporations created under its authority a power to be exercised in Virginia which would be denied to a domestic corporation. If such be the law, however grave the consequences, it would be our duty so to declare. The supreme court of Kentucky so held in the case of Gordon v. Winchester Bldg.

& Accumulating Fund Assn. 12 Bush, 110, 23 Am. Rep. 713, and that decision has since been reaffirmed by that court.

A different view, however, has been taken by other courts. In Montgomery Mut. Bldg. & L. Assn. v. Robinson, 69 Ala. 413, it is said: "The general assembly ordained the statute against usury, and its power to designate the transactions which shall be deemed offensive to, or which shall be excepted from, the influence of the statute, cannot be questioned. When that body lends express sanction to a particular transaction, that transaction is withdrawn and excepted from the operation of the statute."

The court of appeals of Mississippi, in the case of Williams v. Cammack, 27 Miss. 209, 61 Am. Dec. 508, held that "the clause of the Constitution" which declares "that 'no man or set of men are entitled to exclusive separate public emoluments or privileges from the community, but in consideration of public services,' . . . has no reference to the private relations of the citizens, nor to the action of the legislature in passing laws regulating the domestic policy and business affairs of the people, or any portion of them." See also Bibb County Loan Assn. v. Richards, 21 Ga. 592.

In Danville v. Pace, 25 Gratt. 1, 18 Am. Rep. 668, a statute was considered which took away from corporations the right to make the defense of usury. It was retroactive in its operation, but was held to be constitutional by this court, in a luminous and convincing opinion delivered by Judge Staples.

If a corporation may be denied the right to plead usury as to existing contracts, is it a greater stretch of authority upon the part of the legislature to create a corporation to which individuals may by their voluntary contracts bind themselves to pay more than the rate of interest allowed by law? In the one case the legislature was held to have the power to deprive corporations of a right conferred by existing law. In the other case the power of the legislature is invoked to remove a disability to contract which it had imposed.

Statutes which validate contracts otherwise invalid are sustained when "they go no further than to bind a party by a contract which he has attempted to enter into, but which was invalid by reason of some personal inability on his part to make it, or through neglect of some legal formality, or in consequence of some ingredient in the contract forbidden by law." Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 460.

We are of opinion that the act of January 23, 1896, is constitutional, that it suffices to remove any doubt that may have existed as to the authority of the association to contract and deal with its members in the manner disclosed by this record, and that, therefore, the transactions here complained of are not usurious.

The arguments which we have considered, when addressed to courts, call for a decision upon the constitutional powers of the legislature. With the policy or impolicy of an act of the general assembly the courts have no concern. Unless clearly repugnant to the Constitution of the United States or of the state, we have no choice but to construe and enforce them. Nor can we protect the improvident against the consequences of their own folly. And we cannot do better than to close this opinion by a quotation from the opinion of Judge Anderson in the case of White v. Mechanics Bldg. Fund Assn. 23 Gratt. 233: "It is contended on the one hand [that building associations, said he] . . . operate very beneficially to the man who has but small means, and who is destitute of a home that he can call his own, as it will enable him to acquire property in a home for himself and family, and pay for it in the course of six or eight years, at a cost very little exceeding what he would have to pay for a leasehold for the same period. On the other hand, it is contended that the exactions operate as a grinding oppression on those who find themselves unable to meet the requisitions. Which of these opinions is correct, we will not undertake to say. If the transactions and dealings of this association with its members are warranted by statute, and that statute is warranted by the Constitution, though they may operate harshly and oppressively, it is not the province of the courts to relieve. The fault is in the law, which the legislature alone can alter; or in the improvidence of the party, which neither the legislature nor the courts can remedy."

These wise and pregnant observations were delivered more than twenty-five years ago, and during all of the intervening period the legislatures and courts have continued to recognize and to foster building associations.

We find no error in the decree of the circuit court, and it is affirmed.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF CARTERSVILLE, Plff. in Err.,Mrs. John M. PURSE et al.

(101 Ga. 422.)

- *1. A board of education having the charge and control of a system of free schools established by law, and supported by taxation, has the right to suspend from attendance upon school children whose parent, whether father or mother, in undertaking to call in question or interfere with the discipline of a teacher over one of these children, enters the school room of such teacher during school hours, and, in the presence of the scholars there assembled, uses offensive or insulting language to such teacher.
2. This is true, though none of the children so suspended had in fact been guilty of any violation of the rules of school.

NOTE.—Right to exclude, suspend, or expel pupils from school for misconduct of pupil or parent.

- I. Where the parent's action affects the child.
- II. For misconduct of pupil.
- III. For absence and tardiness.
- IV. For connection with secret societies.
- V. For failure to participate in certain studies and exercises.
- VI. For refusal to perform manual labor.
- VII. For failure to pay for injury to school property.
- VIII. Controlling conduct of pupil after the relation of teacher and pupil has ceased.
- IX. Questions of pleading and practice.

I. Where the parent's action affects the child.

IN CARTERSVILLE BOARD OF EDUCATION v. PURSE the suspension of a pupil for the misconduct of the pupil's mother in entering the school room and interfering with the discipline was sustained, although no question was made as to the pupil's conduct. The ground on which the decision is placed is that the parent owes the common-law duty to the child to educate him, and the statute of Georgia does not give the child any new right or remedy, and as at the common law the child is at the mercy of his parents in regard to his education, so the child has no recourse if he is prevented by his parent from obtaining an education. The decision also is upon the ground that the parent interfered in a matter involving the discipline of the school; but the headnotes made by the court put the decision on the ground that the right to expel exists without regard to the child's conduct, and the action of the mother is the same as though done by the father. This appears to be a novel question, and seems to stand alone.

In Bourne v. State, Taylor, 35 Neb. 1, it was held that under Neb. Comp. Stat. chap. 79, subd. 6, au-

Cartersville, have three daughters attending one of the public schools of that city. On October, 1896, Mrs. Purse, went to the school during its regular exercises, and had some conversation with the teacher, the nature and purport of which seem to be in dispute, but as a consequence of which the teacher made a report to the superintendent of schools, who thereupon sent the following communication to Mr. Purse:

Dear Sir:

In consequence of your wife's having entered Miss Hall's room to-day during school hours, and having seriously interfered with the discipline of the school, I am in duty bound to suspend all your children. If this wrong is repaired as far as possible, the suspension will be only temporary; otherwise it will be in force until the end of the present school year.

Mrs. Purse appealed to the grievance committee of the board of education, charging the superintendent with suspending her children without cause and without authority, denying that she had seriously interfered with the discipline of the school or said anything unbecoming a lady, and asserting that the intention of her visit was for good, etc. The committee required that the matter be presented in writing, declining to have any oral hearing. Upon consideration of the charges presented, thorizing the trustees to make such rules and regulations as they may think needful for the government of the schools, a mandamus to require a reinstatement of a pupil was denied the father, where he had refused to sign a monthly report card sent to him by the teacher showing the standing of his child, assigning as the reason that the standing was not as good as on prior reports, although he had on several prior occasions signed such card. In this case the school board had made a rule requiring that the teacher should send to the parent each month for signature a report card showing standing of the pupil, and if returned unsigned, that the pupil was to be sent home to get it signed.

In King v. Jefferson City School Board, 71 Mo. 628, 36 Am. Rep. 499, where a pupil was expelled for absence and tardiness, it was said that such absences without excuse are the fault of the parents, whose business it is to see that the attendance of their child is regular unless prevented by causes that will excuse.

And a suspension was sustained where the parent caused the child to be absent on account of a catholic holy day. Ferriter v. Tyler, 48 Vt. 444, 21 Am. Rep. 133.

Where absence was caused solely by the act of the parent without valid excuse, the suspension of the pupil was sustained, although it was contended that this would be a punishment of the pupil for his parents' offense. Burdick v. Babcock, 31 Iowa, 562.

But in the matter of selection of studies it seems that there is some conflict of authority as to the right to expel where the parent interferes and requests that his child shall be excused from such study, some cases denying the right to expel, as State, Shelby, v. Dixon County School Dist. No. 1, 31 Neb. 552; Trustees of Schools v. People, Van Allen, 87 Ill. 303, 29 Am. Rep. 55; Hulison v. Post, 79 Ill. 567; Morrow v. Wood, 35 Wis. 59, 17 Am. Rep.

a letter from Mrs. Purse, and a statement from the superintendent and from the teacher, the committee reported to the board that the conduct of Mrs. Purse in entering the school room, and unkindly criticising the teacher's conduct and methods in the presence of her pupils, was prejudicial to proper discipline; that it was the duty of the teacher to report the matter to the superintendent; and that the suspension was proper. Further, that Mrs. Purse visited the school the next day after the suspension, just as school was dismissed, and charged the teacher to her face that she was no lady, in consequence of having reported Mrs. Purse's conduct to the superintendent. The committee recommended that, if Mrs. Purse would make to the teacher such apology as would satisfy her on her own behalf and on behalf of her pupils, the suspension would end with November, 1896; otherwise that it would continue as per the order of the superintendent. This report was adopted by the board; whereupon Mrs. Purse, as next friend of her three children, brought her petition against the board of education and the superintendent of schools, praying for mandamus requiring them to receive the children in their former places in the public school, and that they be enjoined from further enforcing the order of suspension, and from doing any act of interference with the attendance of the children and their full enjoyment of the benefits of the school, and for general relief. The grounds of the petition are, in brief, that the children were suspended or expelled without cause, and not on account of any misconduct or violation of rules on their part, but solely on account of the charge made against Mrs. Purse individually; that the finding of the board of education was neither fair nor impartial, for sundry reasons stated; that the suspension is an injury which cannot be estimated in money, and is irreparable; and that under the rules and regulations of the board, the power of suspension is not vested in the superintendent, and his act in the premises is null and void. By amendment, the name of J. M. Purse was added as a party plaintiff. To this amendment defendants demurred, on the ground that it adds a new and distinct party. The demurrer was overruled. Defendants further demurred to the petition on the following grounds: (1) No cause of action is set forth. (2) Defendants are improperly joined, it appearing that the superintendent of schools is merely the servant and agent of the board against whom the real complaint is lodged. (3) The right of action vests alone in the husband of Mrs. Purse. (4) No right to attend the public schools appears in the children, but the right is in J. M. Purse, for him and his wife only. He is not a party, nor is she in her personal capacity. (5) It does not appear that the board of education abused the discretion vested in them by law. (6) Plaintiffs had an adequate and complete remedy by certiorari, and mandamus is not allowable for the correction of an alleged error in the judgment of the board excluding the children from the schools. This demurrer also was overruled, and defendant answered, taking issue with all the material allegations of the petition; denying that the presence of these children at the school would not affect the school injuriously, but asserting, on the contrary, that its discipline had already been seriously affected and injured by the temporary restraining order granted by the court, and, if the same should be continued, the order and discipline of the public school system would be seriously and irreparably impaired; that the pupils, seeing that their parents might at pleasure interfere with and insult the teachers, invade the school room, and, in the presence of her pupils, accuse the teachers of partiality and favoritism, would no longer respect the teachers' authority or that of the board, and inexpressible harm would result, and the blow would be disastrous, if not fatal, to the schools; that the right to the benefit of the schools lies, not in the children, but in the parents, such right being to have the children educated free of tuition, provided the parent so conducts himself or herself as not to interfere with the order and conduct of the schools, or impair their

In Roe v. Deming, 21 Ohio St. 666, it was held that a parent was entitled to maintain an action for damages for wrongfully expelling his child.

But in Spear v. Cummings, 23 Pick. 224, 34 Am. Dec. 53, it was held that the father was not the injured party where his child had been expelled. In Massachusetts since this decision a statute has been passed giving to the pupil wrongfully expelled an action for damages.

II. For misconduct of pupil.

Where a pupil is guilty of such misconduct as to interfere with the discipline and government of the school, he may be suspended or expelled. State, Crain, v. Hamilton, 42 Mo. App. 24; McCormick v. Burt, 95 Ill. 263, 35 Am. Rep. 163; Peck v. Smith, 41 Conn. 442; State v. Williams, 27 Vt. 755; State, Burpee, v. Burton, 45 Wis. 150, 35 Am. Rep. 706; *Watson v. So, under Mo. Rev. Stat. 1879, § 7045, providing that the board shall have the power to suspend or expel a pupil whenever upon due examination they become satisfied that the interest of the school demands such expulsion, a pupil who had been in the habit of swearing and of encouraging fights between other boys and teaching them bad habits was properly expelled, although the board had failed to make a particular rule applying to such a case. It was held that such failure did not deprive them of the authority to enforce rules of conduct prescribed by a common sense of decency and propriety, and where the board failed to exercise its power a teacher might adopt such reasonable rules as were fit and proper. State, Crain, v. Hamilton, 42 Mo. App. 24.

In McCormick v. Burt, 95 Ill. 263, 35 Am. Rep. 163, it was said that under Ill. school laws, § 48, authorizing the directors to suspend or expel pupils for incorrigibly bad conduct, and that no action shall lie against them for such expulsion or suspension, the directors have the power to suspend or expel, and they may exercise that power as a means of efficiency, and such right is forfeited by any parent who thus interferes; and that the practice, custom, and rule of the board, suspending pupils for their parents' interfering with the discipline or order of the schools, is reasonable and just, and is the only means of preventing such interference as would result in unmeasurable evil to the pupils themselves. It was admitted that Mrs. Purse's misconduct was the cause of the suspension of her children; but submitted that, though not entitled to have them restored at all, she was allowed to have them put back if she would make proper apology to the teacher to whom she had used insulting language, which she declined and still declines to do, and that thus it is by her own fault that she deprives her children of the benefit of the schools. Upon motion, the court granted a mandamus absolute, requiring the children be received to their former places in the school, under the rules for the government thereof. To this ruling, and to the others before noted, defendants excepted.

The act, in authorizing the board to prescribe the terms, i. e., the conditions, on which students should be received, enumerated the class which had the right to be received, namely, those who complied with the terms prescribed. This enumeration, therefore, did not include other persons "of a different grade or class," to wit, those who refused to comply with such terms and conditions; notwithstanding the "general expression" in a subsequent clause giving all school children the right of attendance.

discipline for the causes mentioned in the statute.

Where a school committeeman removed a pupil from a school room before the school hour, for profanity, using no more force than was necessary, he was not liable in trespass for so doing. It was further held that the school board and teacher not having taken any action thereon, the pupil had been neither expelled nor excluded from the school privileges. Peck v. Smith, 41 Conn. 443.

So, where a teacher suspended a boy for insubordination and misconduct, and he returned, and one of the prudential committee attempted to eject him but was prevented by the pupil's brother, the latter was convicted of assault and battery, as the teacher had the right, whether the school was public or private, to enforce her discipline and government, and the party assisting her was justified in so doing. State v. Williams, 27 Vt. 755.

And a teacher has, in a proper case, inherent power to suspend a pupil from the privileges of his school for misconduct, unless such teacher has been deprived of the power by the affirmative action of the proper board. State, Burpee, v. Burton, 45 Wis. 150, 35 Am. Rep. 708.

Stat. chap. 44, § 21, providing that the school committee shall have the general charge and superintendence of all the public schools, that if they act honestly in the effort to do their duty in deciding whether certain acts of disorder interfere with the school, a jury composed of men of no special fitness to decide educational questions should not be permitted to say that their answer is wrong. Watson v. Cambridge, 187 Mass. 551.

A school committee properly excluded from a school a pupil guilty of misconduct in whispering, laughing, acts of playfulness and rudeness to other pupils, inattention to study, and conduct tending to cause confusion and distract the attention of other scholars from their duties and recitation, where such conduct was persisted in after repeated admonitions. Hodgkins v. Rockport, 105 Mass. 475.

And a school committee had the power and properly excluded from school a female pupil guilty of gross immorality, manifested by licentious propensities, language, manners, and habits, amounting even to actual prostitution, although not manifested in the school. *Sherman v. So, a pupil was properly expelled because she interfered with a teacher who was punishing a child about five years of age, and because she was charged with making up faces at the teacher and making a noise on a slate. The pupil insisted that she did not scratch the slate but was only ciphering, and on appeal she was reinstated, but was required to say that whatever she had done that was wrong to the school or the teacher she was sorry for, and that she would obey the orders of the school in the future. Stephenson v. Hall, 14 Barb. 222. In this case the father could not recover damages on account of the child having been excluded from instruction in the studies there taught. It was said that if any injury has arisen in consequence of the exclusion of the daughter it was personal to the daughter who had been deprived of the opportunity of improving herself. At that time in New York the statute did not require the parent to educate his children. The court said that the moral duty of a parent to his child is one owing to and for the benefit of the child, the omission or neglect of which is the personal loss of the child.

A parent could not recover expenses of an appeal incurred in having his daughter reinstated in a school from which she had been suspended, where the order of reinstatement imposed the same condition as the order suspending her. Stephenson v. Hall, 14 Barb. 222.

The suspension of a pupil was sustained where he refused to disclose the name given to him by another pupil who had been guilty of misconduct, under Ill. school laws, §§ 49, 53, authorizing the board to suspend or expel a pupil for gross disobedience or misconduct. Board of Education v. Helston, 32 Ill. App. 300.

A teacher was entitled to recover her salary where she was prevented from completing the term by reason of the school committee requiring 41 L. R. A.

her to retain a disobedient pupil whom she had properly expelled. It was held that she was not bound to teach the school without maintaining proper and necessary discipline. Scott v. School Dist. No. 2, 46 Vt. 456.

Although the master of a school has the same authority over a scholar as the parents would have, and therefore may impose reasonable restraint upon their persons either by way of prevention or punishment of disorderly conduct, yet he has not a discretionary power of expulsion but only for reasonable cause. In judging of the cause, however, great regard must be had as to his necessary discretion in enforcing discipline, and a wilful breach of reasonable rules may be sufficient cause, and a repetition of acts of disobedience, each in itself insufficient, may be sufficient as showing a persistent disregard of discipline and a habit of disobedience. But if the expulsion is justified on the ground of some particular act or conduct, not only as likely to be seriously injurious to the peace and good order of the establishment, but as committed with that object, it must appear that it was of that character or the justification would fail. Fitzgerald v. Northcoote, 4 Post. & F. 656.

But an action for damages could be maintained where a pupil was suspended by a teacher because he refused to disclose the name of a pupil who had thrown some gravel against a window of a building and because he was disrespectful. The committee refused to allow him to return to school until he should apply to some one of them for permission to return, and denied to the father a hearing upon the matter of the boy's alleged misconduct. It was said that if a school committee acts in good faith in determining the facts in a particular case, its decision cannot be revised by the court. But the court held that the power of exclusion could not be exercised without ascertaining the facts. Bishop v. Rowley, 165 Mass. 460.

The Federal courts uniformly refuse mandamus to Federal officers as to acts involving the exercise of judgment and discretion, though granting it to compel the performance of

And a teacher could not recover his salary for teaching after he had been discharged, where he was known to have a rule that "pupils must abstain from the common use of tobacco and ardent spirits," and it was understood when he was employed that he would not enforce the rule outside of the school building, and he afterwards suspended two pupils for using tobacco on the school grounds, and was discharged for refusing to modify his rule at the request of the directors. It was held that the power to dismiss a pupil is alone given to the directors, and their decision must control, under Tenn. act 1873, chap. 26, § 20, subsec. 3, making it the duty of the school directors to employ teachers and to dismiss them, and subsec. 4, authorizing them to suspend or dismiss pupils where the prosperity or efficiency of the school requires it, and § 29, providing that any teacher might for sufficient cause suspend pupils until the case was decided by the board of school directors, which should be with as little delay as possible. Parker v. School Dist. No. 33, 5 Lea, 525.

And a teacher could not recover on a contract to take a pupil into his academy and family for a year, where the boy had on his own accord left the academy pending an investigation as to who had been guilty of misconduct, and the principal had refused to receive the pupil back until after the investigation, but made no provision as to the maintenance of the pupil. The court said that in the absence of express stipulation to that effect, the principal could not, as a punishment for a transgression of a rule of his school or the order of his family actually ascertained, expel a pupil from the protection and shelter of his home, and refuse to receive him back at his father's request after he had voluntarily left, and still claim the compensation stipulated in the contract. Starr v. Lift-child, 40 Barb. 541.

Where a child was excluded from a public school in a city by a teacher acting without authority from the school committee for the refusal to receive corporal punishment for an alleged offense, the remedy of such child was an appeal to the committee. It was held that such child could not maintain an action against the city under Mass. Gen. Stat. chap. 41, § 11; Pub. Stat. chap. 47, § 12, providing that a child unlawfully excluded from a public school shall recover damages against the city or town by which such school is supported. Davis v. Boston, 133 Mass. 103.

III. For absence and tardiness.

A rule authorizing expulsion for absence or tardiness where sufficient excuse is not given therefor is reasonable, and its enforcement will be sustained. Russell v. Lynnfield, 116 Mass. 306; King v. Jefferson City School Board, 71 Mo. 623, 36 Am. Rep. 499; Churchill v. Fewkes, 13 Ill. App. 520; Ferriter v. Tyler, 48 Vt. 444, 21 Am. Rep. 138; Burdiack v. Babcock, 31 Iowa, 562.

So, a recovery of damages was denied where a pupil was expelled by a teacher under the direction of one member of the school committee for violation of a rule relating to tardiness. It was held that Mass. Gen. Stat. chap. 38, §§ 16, 22, requiring the school committee to keep a record of their proceedings, did not imply that all rules and orders relating to discipline and good conduct should be a matter of record, or that a formal vote should be a merely ministerial act where the petitioner's right is clear.

Every consideration of public policy demands that all such questions should be determined by the board of education. If they act unwisely and against public interests, the elective power will soon substitute others. Such bodies are generally responsive to public opinion.

Public schools, compelled to receive all who conform to school regulations, having no choice of either pupils or parents, are compelled ex rei necessitate to seek protection in reasonable rules, which must govern both pupils and parent.

taken, and that the teacher reasonably exercised his power. Russell v. Lynnfild, 116 Mass. 306. In this case the committeeman made a rule that, being tardy twice, the scholar should be sent to him, and the scholar, instead of going to him as she was sent, went directly home, and in consequence of disobedience the teacher suspended her until she should conform to the rule.

So, a rule that any pupil absent six half days in four consecutive weeks without a satisfactory excuse shall be suspended from school was reasonable, and was enforced, under Mo. Rev. Stat. 1879, § 7045, providing that the board shall have the power to make all needful rules and regulations for the government of the schools in their district. It was said that such absences, when without excuse, are the fault of the parents whose business it is to see that the attendance of their child is regular unless prevented by causes that constitute a satisfactory excuse. King v. Jefferson City School Board, 71 Mo. 628, 35 Am. Rep. 499.

And where a pupil was absent for two weeks, and on notification to the parents no excuse was given for such absence, and the scholar was suspended, the directors and teachers were not liable in an action on the case in the absence of malice, under rules providing that any pupil who shall be absent six half days without a valid excuse will be liable to suspension, and shall not be restored without permission from the board, and that all pupils will be required to bring written excuses from their parents to teachers for absence. Churchill v. Fewkes, 13 Ill. App. 620. It was held that this rule was not a hard or harsh one.

And a prudential committee of a school district may exclude children from further attendance upon a term of school for absence contrary to the 41 L. R. A.

In Burdick v. Babcock, 81 Iowa, 522, it was held that a rule suspending pupils for absence six half days in four consecutive weeks, two times tardy counting as one absence, was reasonable and should be enforced, although the tardiness or absence was brought about solely through the act of the parent but without valid excuse. It was held that Iowa Acts, 9th Gen. Assem. chap. 172, § 27, authorizing the dismissal of a pupil for gross immorality, or for persistent violations of the regulations of the school, gave the power to establish reasonable rules and to enforce them. It was contended that the power to regulate only extended to the school as it was assembled, and not to conduct outside, and that the regulations could not trench upon the rights of the parent to the services of the child. But it was held that the parent could not interfere with the order of the school by sending his child at such time and in such conditions as to retard others. It was contended that the rules visited punishment upon the child for the parent's offense, but it was held that the good of the whole school required uniformity of prompt attendance, and there was no other way of enforcing it except by such rule.

It was held that advance payments should be liquidated damages under the contract and catalogue, in case of withdrawal or exclusion. Fessman v. Seeley (Tex. Civ. App.) 30 S. W. 268.

But looking out tardy children on a cold day until after the general exercises are over will be held unlawful, unless ample provision is made to keep the children comfortable while the door is barred.

In Fertich v. Michener, 111 Ind. 472, 60 Am. Rep. 709, where a pupil was locked out of the school room, when the thermometer stood at 18 degrees below zero, and returned home one fourth of a mile distant through the snow, causing her feet to become frosted, it was held that a rule requiring tardy pupils to remain in the hall until the opening exercises are concluded is a reasonable rule. But if the weather is unusually severe it would be unreasonable to enforce such rule, unless proper steps have been taken to render the pupil comfortable.

In Thompson v. Beaver, 68 Ill. 353, it was said that a rule that would bar the doors of a school-house against little children who had come a great distance in cold weather for no other reason than that they were a few minutes tardy was unreasonable and unlawful.

IV. For connection with secret societies.

A pupil cannot justly be excluded from school for being connected with a secret society, where it is not shown that the interests or government of the school are affected thereby.

So, a requirement of the board of trustees and the faculty of a state university, that in order to become a student the applicant shall renounce his membership and refuse to be an active member of a Greek fraternity, was held to be ultra vires and unreasonable. State, Stallard, v. White, 32 Ind. 286, 42 Am. Rep. 496.

Even if the board of education had made a rule suspending pupils for the alleged misconduct of another, such a rule would have been unreasonable and void.

Mr. J. W. Harris, Jr., also for defendants in error.

Cobb, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The official report states the facts. When a parent goes to the school room of a lawfully established public school, and, in the presence of his or her children and other pupils, publicly calls in question the justice or correctness of a decision made by the teacher in a matter of discipline relating to such children, uses offensive and insulting language to such teacher, and acts in such a manner as to interrupt the exercise of the school, and conducts himself or herself in such a manner as to bring the teacher and the discipline of the school into contempt in the eyes of the pupils, it is not only lawful, but it is the duty of the authorities of the school, in the protection of the teacher whom they have placed on duty, as well as to sustain the character and discipline of the school, to exclude from the school room the children of such parent, and this, too, although those thus excluded had not been guilty of a violation of any rule of the school. The Constitution of the state provides that "there shall be a thorough system of common schools for the education of children in the elementary branches of an English education only, as nearly uniform as practicable, the expenses of which shall be provided for by taxation or otherwise. The schools shall be

And where a student was taken to a room, and a private memorandum book taken from him supposed to contain a list of students and matters pertaining to a society formed for the purpose of exciting ill feeling between lay and clerical students, and the student was locked in his room for about two hours in order that he might not communicate with others until he should leave through expulsion, it was held in an action for false imprisonment that it was incidental to the authority of a head master to expel from the school over which he presides any scholar or student whose conduct is such that he could no longer be permitted to remain without danger to the school. The court said that this, however, is not a power to be exercised arbitrarily. It may be questioned, and although no doubt a large discretion must be allowed, it must not be exercised wantonly or capriciously. It was found by the verdict of the jury that there had been an assault and imprisonment and that there was no such society as stated, and that the imprisonment was not justified. It was held that while the action was not for expulsion the right to expel entered into the question of false imprisonment and affected it. Mitsgerald v. Northcote, 4 Fost. & F. 656.

V. For failure to participate in certain studies and exercises.

There is some conflict as to the power to suspend or expel pupils for failure to participate in certain required studies or exercises, if the parent of the pupil requests that his child be excused.

Thus, it was held in the following cases that a pupil could not be required to pursue a study that the parent objected to, if the omission did not affect the other scholars: State, Shibley, v. School Dist. No. 1, 31 Neb. 532; Trustees of Schools v. Peo- free to all children of the state, but separate schools shall be provided for the white and colored races." Civil Code, § 5906. The general assembly in the act intended to carry out this mandate of the Constitution, and provide a system of common schools outside of incorporated towns and cities, declared that "admission to all common schools shall be gratuitous to all children between the ages of six and eighteen years, residing in the subdistricts in which the schools are located." Pol. Code, § 1878. It is also provided in the Constitution that "authority may be granted . . . to municipal corporations, upon the recommendation of the corporate authority, to establish and maintain public schools in their respective limits, by local taxation; but no such local law shall take effect until the same shall have been submitted to a vote of the qualified voters in each . . . municipal corporation and approved by a two thirds vote of persons qualified to vote at such election; and the general assembly may prescribe who shall vote on such question." Civil Code, § 5909. By an act approved December 24, 1888, the general assembly, under the authority of the section last quoted, made provision for the establishment of a system of public schools in the city of Cartersville, to be maintained by local taxation. Acts 1888, p. 823. The election which the Constitution required having resulted in favor of the establishment of the schools, the act went into effect, and the schools thus established went into operation. The government of the schools was vested in a board of commissioners, who had authority to establish, and from time to time modify, a system of public schools for said city of Cartersville, to be open "not less than six nor longer than ten scholastic months in each year," and also "to purchase, build, enlarge, and rent buildings, appurtenances, and furniture for school purposes, to employ a superintendent or principal and other teachers, to suspend or discharge them for good causes, to prescribe the terms upon which students are to be received into said schools, and to establish such rules, regulations, and by-laws as they may deem right and proper in maintaining a system of public schools in said city: provided, the same are not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of this state." It was declared that "all children between the ages of six and eighteen years, whose parents, guardians, or natural protectors bona fide reside within the corporate limits of said city, shall be entitled to the benefit of said schools." That municipal schools thus established are a part of the common school system provided for by the Constitution there can be no question, and they must therefore conform in all respects to the requirements of the Constitution. It follows that the act creating the school system for the city of Cartersville must be construed as establishing schools which shall be free to all children who may lawfully enter the same in that municipality. Irrin v. Gregory, 86 Ga. 605.

The board of commissioners of the city of Cartersville (hereafter referred to as the board of education) adopted the following rule in reference to the admission of children into such schools: "All children residing within the limits of the city, who are not otherwise disqualified by these regulations, and who are between the ages of six and eighteen years, shall be entitled to attend the public schools of the city, the parents or guardians furnishing to the principals evidence of their citizenship, giving name and age of pupil and name of street on which they reside." Under such a system as that above outlined, beginning with the constitutional provision for a system

But in other cases it was held that the pupil had been properly suspended, although the parent had requested that such pupil be excused from the particular study in question. State, Andrew, v. Weber, 108 Ind. 81, 58 Am. Rep. 30; Kidder v. Chellis, 59 N. H. 473.

And such a remedy was suggested as proper in State v. Mizner, 50 Iowa, 153, 32 Am. Rep. 123.

And in the following cases an expulsion for failure to participate in certain recitations was upheld where the parent's interference was not shown: Guersey v. Pitkin, 33 Vt. 224, 76 Am. Dec. 171; Sewell v. Defiance Union School Bd. of Edu. 29 Ohio St. 89; People, McHugh, v. School Officers, 18 Abb. Pr. 165, note.

And in the following cases expulsion for not participating in religious exercises was sustained; but in none of them was it shown or discussed that the parent requested that his child be excused. Donahoe v. Richards, 38 Me. 376; Spiller v. Woburn, 12 Allen, 127; McCormick v. Burt, 95 Ill. 263, 35 Am. Rep. 163.

The board of trustees were not justified in expelling a pupil from their school for failure to study a prescribed branch against the protest of the parents, that the child should not pursue such study. State, Shelbley, v. School Dist. No. 1, 31 Neb. 552.

And an expulsion for the failure to pursue a particular study where the parent requested that the pupil should be excused, was illegal, under Neb. Comp. Stat. chap. 79, subd. 6, § 3, providing that the trustees shall have power to prescribe courses of study and text-books for the use of said schools, and to make such rules and regulations as they may think needful for the government of the schools. It was held that any rule or regulation that requires a pupil to continue a particular study against the request of the parent is arbitrary and unreasonable. State, Shelbley, v. School Dist. No. 1, 31 Neb. 552.

A refusal to admit a pupil to pursue other branches, omitting grammar, was unreasonable where the father of the pupil requested that grammar be omitted and the pupil was sufficiently proficient in all other studies. It was held that such rule could not be sustained under Ill. Rev. Stat. 1874, pp. 962, 963, § 48, providing that the school directors may adopt and enforce all necessary rules and regulations for the management and government of the schools, to direct what branches of study shall be taught and what text-books shall be used, and to enforce uniformity of text-books. Trustees of Schools v. People, Van Allen, 87 Ill. 303, 29 Am. Rep. 55.

So, an expulsion by force employed by a principal teacher under the direction of the directors of a common-school district, for declining to study bookkeeping, where the parent of the pupil objected to her pursuing that study, was illegal. It was held that Ill. School Laws 1865, and Sess. Laws, p. 119, § 13, providing that the school directors may direct what branches of study shall be taught, and of common schools and ending with the rule of the local school board, is the right to attend school inherent in the child? or is the purpose of the law simply to provide a place where parents may discharge the obligation which they owe to their children to give them an education? At common law it was the duty of parents to give to their children "an education suitable to their station in life,—a duty pointed out by reason, and of far the greatest importance of any." 1 Bl. Com. p. 450. "The education of children in a manner suitable to their station and calling is another branch of parental duty, of imperfect obligation generally in the eye of the municipal law, but of very great importance to the welfare of the state. Without some preparation made in youth for the sequel of life, children of all conditions would probably become idle and vicious when they grow up, either from the want of good instruction and habits and the means of subsistence, or from want of rational and useful occupation. A parent who sends his son into the world uneducated, and without skill in any art or science, does a great injury to mankind as well as to his own family; for he defrauds the community of a useful citizen, and bequeaths to it a nuisance. This parental duty is strongly and persuasively inculcated by the writers on natural law." 2 Kent, Com. pp. 195, 196. In the case of Rulison v. Post, 79 Ill. 567, Mr. Justice Walker in the opinion says: "Parents and guardians are under the responsibility of preparing children intrusted to their care and nurture for the discharge of their duties in after life. Lawgivers in all free countries, and, with few exceptions, in despotic governments, have deemed it wise to leave the education and nurture of the children of the state to the direction of the parent or guardian. This is, and has ever been the spirit of our free institutions. The state has provided the means, and brought them within the reach of all, to acquire the benefits of a common-school education, but leaves it to parents and guardians to determine the extent to which they will render it available to the children under their charge." While the common law recognizes this as a duty of great importance, there was no remedy provided for the child in case this duty was not discharged by the parent. The child, at the will of the parent, could be allowed to grow up in ignorance, and become a more than useless member of society, and for this great wrong, brought about by the neglect of his parents, the common law provided no remedy. Not only no remedy was given to the child, but no punishment was inflicted upon the parent. In attempting to give a reason for this defect in the common law, Sir William Blackstone says: "Perhaps they thought it punishment enough to leave the parent, who neglects the instruction of his family, to labor under those griefs and inconveniences, which his family, so uninstructed, will be sure to bring upon him." 1 Bl. Com. p. 781. While the common law provided for apprenticing poor children, and thereby giving them some of the advantages of an education, "the rich, indeed," says the same writer, "are left at their own option whether they will breed up their children to be ornaments or disgraces to their family." This part of the common law became a part of the law of this state. Civil Code, § 2501. The section cited declares that the father shall provide for the maintenance, protection, and education of his child, but relatively to the matter of education, no provision is made for the punishment of a parent who fails to discharge this duty, or for the relief of the child who is the victim of such failure. It will be seen, from an examination may suspend or expel pupils for disobedience, refractory or incorrigible bad conduct, did not give the right to suspend or expel pupils for any cause not therein enumerated. It was also held that § 19, providing for adopting the common-school branches providing that nothing herein contained shall prevent the teaching of other or higher branches than those enumerated, did not confer the power to compel pupils to pursue such studies without the consent of their parents or guardians, or their own consent. Rulison v. Post, 79 Ill. 567.

In Trustees of Schools v. People, Van Allen, 87 Ill. 303, 29 Am. Rep. 55, the court said: "Whether fortunate or unfortunate to him, however, it is for the parent, not the trustees, to direct the branches of education he shall pursue, so far as they are taught, and he [the pupil] is by necessary preliminary education qualified to pursue them, in the high school."

In Morrow v. Wood, 85 Wis. 59, 17 Am. Rep. 471, where it was held that a parent's right to dictate what studies his child shall pursue was superior to that of the teacher, it was said that "the statute gives the school board power to make all needful rules and regulations for the organization, graduation and government of the school, and power to suspend any pupil from the privileges of the school for noncompliance with the rules established by them or by the teacher with their consent; and it is not proposed to throw any obstacle in the way of the performance of these duties. But these powers and duties can be well fulfilled without denying to the parent all right to control the education of his children."

But a scholar was properly expelled from a district school for failure to comply with a rule requiring that the pupils in grammar shall write English compositions, where the parents made no request that such pupil should be excused from so doing. Guernsey v. Pitkin, 32 Vt. 224, 78 Am. Dec. 171.

And in Sewell v. Defiance Union School Bd. of Edu. 29 Ohio St. 89, it was held that a pupil was properly suspended where he failed to comply with a rule which provided that if any pupil shall fail to be prepared with a rhetorical exercise at the time appointed therefor he or she shall be immediately suspended from such department unless excused for reasonable cause. This rule was held reasonable under an Ohio act authorizing the board of education to make and enforce all the necessary rules and regulations for the government of teachers and pupils therein, and to determine the various studies and parts of studies in which instruction shall be given.

Where a pupil was suspended by a principal of a school for alleged insubordination for refusing to sing the chorus of a school song called "The Battle Hymn of the Republic," a mandamus was refused on the ground that the board of trustees were vested with the power to conduct and manage the schools in their respective wards; that in this conduct and management the discipline of the state schools is exclusively under their control; that to their direction consequently and necessarily is confided the power to decide questions relating to the violation of discipline, and that their judgment was conclusive. People, McHugh, v. School Officers, 18 Abb. Pr. 165, note.

of our statutes in reference to the subject of education at the public expense, that they contain nothing which expressly or impliedly alters the common-law rule, that education is a duty owed by the parent to the child. The Constitution of 1777 provided: "Schools shall be erected in each county and supported at the general expense of the state, as the legislature shall hereafter point out and direct." Article 54, Marbury & C. Dig. p. 12. The Constitution of 1798 provided: "The arts and sciences shall be promoted in one or more seminaries of learning, and the legislature shall, as soon as conveniently may be, give such further donations and privileges, to those already established, as may be necessary to secure the objects of their institution; and it shall be the duty of the general assembly at their next session to provide effectual measures for the improvement and permanent security of the funds and endowments of such institutions." Article 4, § 13. The Code of 1861 provided for an educational fund and officers in whose hands its management should be placed, and the plan of its distribution among the several counties. Code 1861, §§ 1189, 1218. The beneficiaries of this fund were children between the ages of six and eighteen years within the several counties, but "children of parents who are unable to educate them, children discarded by their parents, and indigent orphan children," were to be first provided for. Id. § 1219. A study of the history of the school law in this state from 1785, when the legislature provided for a complete system of state education with a central seat of learning, down to the adoption of the Code of 1861, will disclose occasional efforts to provide a system of free schools which would educate the entire population of the state, without regard to the ability of the parent to furnish the child with education at his own expense. Prince, Dig. pp. 866, 869. While the act of 1785 was primarily for the purpose of establishing "a public seat of learning," and did result in the establishment of the university of the state, the plan of the framers of the act was much broader than this, and it was distinctly provided that "all public schools instituted or to be supported by funds or public moneys, in this state, shall be considered as parts or members of the university, and shall be under the foregoing directions and regulations." An effort was made at a later day to provide a system of county academics and free schools to carry out the intention of the framers of the act of 1785. Prince, Dig. p. 17. In 1819 and 1821 appropriations were made amounting to $675,000, the principal of which was required to be invested in bank stock, and the interest to be used for the support of academics and free schools throughout the state. Hotchkiss' Stat. Law, Ga. p. 178, and note. By the act of 1837 (Acts 1837, p. 94) the academic and poor-school funds were consolidated, and set apart for the support of a general system of education by common schools. It is interesting to notice in this connection that one of the purposes for which this fund was to be expended was to purchase books and stationery for children whose parents were unable to furnish the same. This act, with its amendments, remained in force until 1840, when it was repealed. Acts 1840, p. 61. The common-school system was abandoned, and the fund set apart for that purpose became a poor school fund. These efforts, made from time to time to establish a system of free schools for all the children of the state, were not successful; the result in each instance being either a repeal of the appropriation or a return to the poor-school system.

And the suspension of a pupil was proper where he failed to comply with a rule made by the board of trustees of a high school, requiring that the pupil shall study music and provide a book for that purpose, although the father had arbitrarily requested that his son be excused from that study. It was also held that such rule was authorized under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 4497, providing that the trustees shall provide to have taught in the common schools orthography, reading, arithmetic, geography, English grammar, physiology, United States history, and such other branches of learning and other languages as the advancement of pupils may require and the trustees from time to time direct. State, Andrew, v. Webber, 108 Ind. 31, 58 Am. Rep. 30.

So, where a pupil acting in accordance with the direction of his parent refused to comply with a rule requiring him to take part in declamation, and was suspended by the teacher, an action of trespass could not be maintained for assault and battery. It was held that the power of each parent to decide what studies the scholar shall pursue, and what exercise he shall perform, would be a power of disorganizing the school and practically rendering it substantially useless. Kidder v. Chellis, 59 N. H. 473.

The fact that the teacher in this case had not obtained his certificate until after the pupil had been suspended for failing to comply with a reasonable rule did not give a right of action for damages to the pupil. Kidder v. Chellis, 59 N. H. 473.

In State v. Mizner, 50 Iowa, 152, 32 Am. Rep. 128, where a pupil was cruelly beaten for not having an algebra lesson when the parent and the pupil both had requested that that study be dropped, it was said that the proper remedy would have been expulsion.

In Dunahoe v. Richards, 38 Me. 376, where a pupil was expelled for noncompliance with a rule requiring a scholar to take part in the Bible exercises although the pupil was willing to read from the Douay version, and the parent brought an action on the case for such expulsion, it was held that the parent could not recover as there was no act done by which the ability of the child to render service was diminished; that the school was for the benefit and instruction of the pupil. It was said that if the pupil's rights have been violated she alone is entitled to compensation.

Damages could not be recovered where a pupil was excluded from a public school for refusing to comply with the regulations requiring the pupils to bow their heads in morning prayer exercises, unless the parent of a pupil should request that such pupil be excused therefrom, and the parent declined to make any request and directed his child not to obey the rule. It was held that the regulation was a reasonable one in the interest of quiet and decorum, and did not infringe on the religious liberty of the pupil. Spiller v. Woburn, 13 Allen, 127.

The expulsion of a pupil for nonobedience of a rule requiring pupils to lay aside their books during the opening exercises while the Bible is being read did not authorize an action on the case for damages where there was no allegation that the suspension was either wantonly or maliciously done. In this

The Constitution of 1865 provided that "the general assembly shall have power to appropriate money for the promotion of learning and science, and to provide for the education of the people, and shall provide for the early resumption of the regular exercises of the University of Georgia, by the adequate endowment of the same." Code 1868, § 4937. The Constitution of 1868 provided that "the general assembly, at its first session after the adoption of this Constitution, shall provide a thorough system of general education to be forever free to all children of the state, the expense of which shall be provided for by taxation, or otherwise." Code 1878, § 5132. The various acts of the general assembly, passed from time to time to carry into effect these constitutional provisions, upon examination will be seen to be entirely consistent with the scope of the Constitution, which seems to provide a system of public education which should be free to all the children of the state. The common-law rule being clear and unequivocal, that, while the duty rested upon the parent to educate his child, the law would not attempt to force him to discharge this duty, the child, so far as education is concerned, is completely at the mercy of the parent. Therefore at common law the child had no right to demand an education at the hands of the parent. This being a common-law rule, no law of this state, either constitutional or statutory, will be held to alter or abolish it, unless the terms of such law imperatively demand such construction. Every Constitution that has been of force in this state, and every statute passed thereunder, from the first Constitution adopted in 1777 to the one now in force, adopted 100 years later, will be found to be in all of their varying provisions on the subject of education entirely consistent with the common-law rule which declares that it is the duty of the parent to educate his child, but at the same time leaves the child remediless if the duty is not discharged. The laws now in force only provide means for the parent to discharge the natural and moral duty which is upon him, and do not confer upon the child any right which he did not have at common law. At common law the child's right to an education was dependent, not only upon the will, but upon the pecuniary ability, of the parent. Under the present law in this state, the right of the child to an education is still dependent upon the will of the parent, but no longer dependent upon his pecuniary ability. It would be contrary to the policy of our law, based, as it is, upon the common law, to bestow upon the child, in the matter of its education, any right independent of the parent. It needs no argument to sustain the proposition that the father is, and ought to be, the head of the family, and the public has the right to look to him to control his children. A law which would take from him this control, and deprive the public of the benefits to be derived from such control, would be in conflict with our established institutions. A child, in Georgia, has the same right to an education at the hands of his parent that he had at common law, but no more. He could not at common law require his parent to educate him; he cannot, in Georgia, compel his parent to provide an education for him. At common law, if his parent was willing, but had not the means to carry out this will, the child must go without an education; in Georgia, if the parent is willing, the state provided a fund which is available to him, whether he be pecuniarily able to discharge the expense incident to an education or not. If the parent in Georgia, notwithstanding the fund provided for the purpose of educating his children, is not will-

school no one was required to be present at such exercises unless he chose to do so, but this pupil insisted that the rule interfered with the religious convictions of himself and his father. McCormick v. Burt, 96 Ill. 203, 35 Am. Rep. 163.

VI. For refusal to perform manual labor.

Under Wis. Rev. Stat. § 429, Laws 1883, p. 423, chap. 162, subchap. 15, § 10, authorizing a school board to make all needful rules for the government of schools, and to suspend any pupil from the privileges of the school for noncompliance with the rules established by them or by the teacher with their consent, a school board was not authorized to expel a pupil for refusal to comply with a rule requiring pupils on returning from recess to bring with them a stick of wood to be used in the school stove. It was held that such rule was unreasonable, and especially so in this case where the boy's health made it injurious for him to comply with the rule, of which the teacher had been informed by the parent, and had been requested to excuse the pupil from complying with such rule. State, Bowe, v. Fond du Lac Bd. of Edu. 63 Wis. 234.

VII. For failure to pay for injury to school property.

The suspension of a pupil for failure to pay for property accidentally or negligently injured is illegal.

So, where a pupil accidentally broke a pane of glass and was suspended it was held that the directors of a school district had no power to make or enforce a rule providing that any scholar who shall be guilty of injuring or defacing any school property shall be required to pay for all damages, and that such scholar shall not be allowed to attend until payment of damages shall have been made. Perkins v. Independent School Dist. Bd. of Directors, 56 Iowa, 478.

And in such case it was held that this rule was unreasonable, and could not be enforced in that manner. Perkins v. Independent School Dist. Bd. of Directors, 56 Iowa, 478.

And the suspension of a pupil for accidentally, carelessly, and negligently breaking a window pane under a rule providing that a pupil defacing or injuring the school building or anything else belonging to the school shall be suspended until full satisfaction is made, was unlawful. It was held that a pupil should not be excluded if by negligence property is injured beyond its power or that of its parent to make compensation, which would be the result if carried out, and would be contrary to the statute making education compulsory. It was also held that, under Mich. How. Stat. § 5009, providing that the district board shall make and enforce suitable rules and regulations for the government and management of the school and for the preservation of the property, said board may authorize the suspension or expulsion of any pupil guilty of gross misdemeanor or persistent disobedience. The pupil must be guilty of some wilful or malicious act of detriment to the school, and the misconduct must be gross, or he must be persistent in his disobedience of reasonable and proper rules. Holman v. School Dist. No. 5 Trustees, 77 Mich. 605, 6 L. R. A. 524.

ing to discharge the duty, even at the expense of the state, there is no power, under the law, to compel him to discharge it, and the doors of the courts are closed against the child, whether he comes in his own name, or comes in the name of another as his next friend. The parent in Georgia owes the duty to his child to educate him, and the state has furnished the means for the payment of the expense incident to the discharging of such duty, but the child is as completely at the mercy of the parent as he was at common law.

The law providing for a public school system was not intended to create any new right in, or give any new remedy to, a child. It being settled that the presence of the child in school depends absolutely upon the consent and will of the parent, the school authorities are justifiable in dealing with the child in the light of this fact. As it is the purpose of the state to aid the parent in discharging a duty by furnishing a fund to pay the expenses incident to discharging such duty, it is the right of the state, through its constituted authorities, to require of the parent that he shall do nothing inconsistent with the peace, good order, and authority of the system which is provided for his benefit. While it is hard upon the child to be deprived of the benefit of an education because his parent will not submit himself to the reasonable rules, regulations, practices, and customs incident to the system providing for the education of his child, it is no harder than the rule at common law, which left the child completely at the mercy of the parent's will, so far as obtaining an education was concerned; in fact, the status of the child is the same. At common law he was at the mercy of an arbitrary parent whether he should be placed at school or not; placed at school in Georgia he is still at the mercy of an arbitrary parent, who may so conduct himself as to deprive the child of the benefits to be derived from an education. There is no law which requires a parent to send his children to the public schools. A child who is entered at a public school must be required to conduct himself so as to not interfere with the discipline of the school. If this duty is incumbent upon the child it would seem that, for a stronger reason, a similar duty would rest upon the parent, who is the real beneficiary of the system. Public education which fails to instill in the youthful mind and heart obedience to authority, both private and public, would be more of a curse than a blessing; and the parent who in the school room, or in the vicinity of the school, in the presence of the children, so acts as to create the impression that the true way of life, is lawlessness and utter disregard of the rights of other people, should not only receive the punishment which the penal laws of the state would inflict upon him (Penal Code, § 427), but should also be deprived of the benefit of the fund which is provided to pay an expense which natural and moral duty would otherwise require him to bear. We must not be misunderstood. We do not intend that the argument should go to the length that the school authorities would have the right to exclude the child from the benefits of the school because of improper conduct on the part of the parent as to matters which are entirely disconnected with the school, or the attendance of the child, or the conduct or behavior of the parent with reference thereto. This right, as we have seen, would only arise where the parent interferes in a matter involving the discipline or conduct of such child. That the parent is guilty of acts which are unlawful and immoral would not necessarily have the effect of forfeiting his right to participate in the public school fund, and justify the authorities in excluding the child. The right of the child to attend a public school is dependent upon the good conduct of the parent as well as

And in this case a mandamus was granted in favor of the father requiring the restoration of his son. Holman v. School Dist. No. 5 Trustees, 77 Mich. 606, 6 L. R. A. 534.

VIII. Controlling conduct of pupil after the relation of teacher and pupil has ceased.

A pupil cannot be expelled for violating a rule forbidding pupils to attend social gatherings, where such pupil returns home and attends such gathering with the consent of his parent. A pupil cannot be expelled for newspaper articles reflecting on the school officers where no rule exists forbidding such conduct. After a pupil is expelled he has the same right as the public to enter the buildings at public entertainments.

The faculty of the state normal school had no right to make or enforce a rule suspending a pupil for attending a social gathering, where such pupil had returned to her parent's house and control, and having her father's consent had gone to the party with her brother. It was held that Mo. Rev. Stat. § 7166, authorizing the faculty to suspend or expel a pupil for "contumacy, insubordination, or immoral conduct," and providing the same appeal to the board of regents as is given a teacher, did not prevent a mandamus requiring the faculty to admit the pupil suspended for the violation of an unreasonable rule. State, Clark, v. Osborne, 24 Mo. App. 309, 32 Mo. App. 536.

And the directors of a school district had no right to enforce a rule authorizing the expulsion of a pupil for attending social parties, where such pupil had returned to his home, and his parents approved of his attending such party. But the directors were held not liable in an action by such pupil for damages in the absence of an allegation in the petition that such directors were moved by malice, oppression, and wilfulness. Dritt v. Snodgrass, 68 Mo. 286, 27 Am. Rep. 343.

A pupil expelled from a state normal school has a right thereafter with other members of the public to enter the school grounds and buildings for the purpose of attending a school exhibition given by a literary society in the building. An expulsion by force from the audience room of such person holding a ticket entitled him to damages, where immoral character or anticipated breach of the peace was not the cause of the expulsion. Hughes v. Goodell, 3 Pittsb. 264.

A school board had no right to suspend a pupil for writing a newspaper article holding up the members of the board to ridicule, where there was no regulation of the school made in regard to such matters. This right was claimed under Iowa Rev. Stat. § 2054, authorizing the directors to dismiss pupils from school for gross immorality, or for persistent violations of the school regulations. Murphy v. Independent Dist. Bd. of Directors, 30 Iowa, 429.

IX. Questions of pleading and practice.

"The father of a child entitled to the benefits of the public school of the subdistrict of his residence of the child. Both must submit to the reasonable rules and regulations of the school, and the parent must so conduct himself as not to destroy the influence and authority of the school management over the children whenever he comes in contact with the school authorities, whether commissioners, officers, or teachers, under circumstances where his conduct would be likely to influence the conduct of his children. The schoolmaster has always stood in loco parentis for certain purposes, and, notwithstanding the change from private schools into public schools, the schoolmaster of the present system is, and ought to be, in the place of the parent in a great many particulars. It is therefore a duty which the parent owes, not only to the master, but to the pupil himself,—his child,—that he who stands in the parent's shoes should not be impeded in discharging a duty which the parent has voluntarily placed upon him. Therefore it necessarily follows that when the parent has taken advantage of the school fund to discharge the burden which he would otherwise have to carry himself, and has placed his child under the control of the schoolmaster thus provided, any misconduct on his part which would interfere with the master in discharging the duty which he owes to such child would result, under the present system, as it always did under the old system, in the exclusion of the child from the benefits to be derived through the services of the master.

There was read in the argument of this case a letter written by Ex Chief Justice Bleckley to counsel for plaintiff in error, which contained an expression of his opinion upon the subject now under consideration. The words used by him so aptly express our views that we embody them herein as a part of our opinion: "Without having studied the question thoroughly, I have a strong impression that you are right in the fundamental merits of the case. If we had a compulsory school system, the right of the child would probably not be affected by the conduct of the parent; but our system looks to voluntary co-operation by the parent in carrying out the system, and, where that is withheld in a matter vital to some discipline, the child has no more right to remain in the school than it would have if the parent objected to its remaining. Neither the school authorities nor any court could compel the child for its own interest to enter the school, or remain in it, without the parent's consent, and, where that consent is not given on the terms rightly prescribed by the school board, it is the same as withheld, or not given at all. It is certain that parental discretion can be exercised in keeping the child out of school. Can it also be exercised in keeping it in, irrespective of the considerations of sound discipline, though the invasion of discipline may be by the parent, and not by the child? If so, the whole field of discretion is covered by the parent's will, and a very limited part of it by public authority. Where a scheme of work contemplates joint effort, if one of the parties refuses to co-operate on reasonable terms the other may decline to continue the work on any other terms. So it seems to me." The reasons which have brought us to the conclusion that the misconduct of the father might be such as to deprive the child of the benefit of the public schools will also apply where the father is dead, and the obligation rests upon the mother, and she is guilty of such misconduct.

The question to be now considered is: What will be the effect of such misconduct by the mother in the lifetime of the father? While the obligation is upon the father to educate the child, and does not, in the lifetime of the father, in any manner rest upon the mother, still there is an obligation growing out of the relation of husband and wife and parent and may maintain an action against the teacher of the school and the local directors of the subdistrict for damages for wrongfully expelling the child from the school." Roe v. Deming, 21 Ohio St. 468.

In an action by a pupil against individuals for damages for expelling and excluding her from a school without cause, it was held that if the defendants were the school committee and had acted by virtue of their authority, the remedy would be under Mass. Gen. Stat. chap. 41, § 11, providing that a child unlawfully excluded from any public school shall recover damages therefor in an action of tort against "the city or town" by which such school is supported. Learock v. Putnam, 111 Mass. 499.

Where a pupil was refused admission into the grammar department of the school on the ground that he was not qualified, and was also refused admission into the primary department because he had graduated and had been dismissed to make room for others, a mandamus requiring his admission was denied. It was held that his remedy was by appeal from the principal's decision of the board of trustees and from that board to the board of education. People, Ulrich, v. Board of Education, 4 N. Y. Supp. 102.

And an action could not be maintained against a teacher of the public schools by a parent for refusing to receive and instruct his child, as the remedy, if any, was by appeal to the school committee, who could enforce their authority and compel the teacher to accept the pupil if unjustly excluded. L. R. A.

cluded. (The reasons for refusing the pupil are not disclosed in this case.) Spear v. Cummings, 23 Pick. 224, 34 Am. Dec. 52.

In Sherman v. Charlestown, 8 Cush. 160, it was said that one reason why the action failed in Spear v. Cummings, 23 Pick. 224, 34 Am. Dec. 52, which was an action by a father for the failure to receive and instruct his children and for excluding them, was that the father is not the person injured, and was not entitled to recover damages in his own right without consideration of on what grounds, if any, a pupil could be excluded from the school, and that probably the legislature thought that children's rights were not sufficiently guarded, and passed Mass. Stat. 1845, chap. 214, providing for an action by a child against the town or city where he has been unlawfully excluded. And the court says that the act proceeds on the assumption that the pupil wrongfully excluded is the party injured, that the town is the body responsible for affording such instruction.

In an action by two pupils against two persons for forcibly ejecting them from school, it was held that the defendants could not justify by showing their authority where the only plea was the general issue, although plaintiffs had proved that one of the defendants was one of the committee and the other was the teacher. Mack v. Kelsey, 61 Vt. 399.

child, resting upon the wife and mother, demanding her co-operation with the husband in everything that is necessary for the welfare of the child. If the father is, by a good reason, required to abstain from conduct which would injure, and possibly destroy, the entire benefits of the system, the mother, for like reasons, must be required to desist, and her conduct may be a good reason for causing both the child and the father to lose the benefits of the school fund. This is especially true when we take into consideration the provisions of the law of force in this state which declares that the "husband is the head of the family, and the wife is subject to him; her legal civil existence is merged in the husband, except so far as the law recognizes her separately, either for her own protection, or for her benefit, or for the preservation of public order." Civ. Code, § 2478. It is neither for her protection, nor for her benefit, nor for the preservation of public order, that an act of the character above referred to should be declared to be her separate and independent act; but, on the other hand, public policy demands that the husband should be held responsible for her conduct, and be required to submit to the penalty which it would produce. The same reasons which require that there should be thrown around the father a restraining influence to prevent him from interfering with the operation and discipline of schools require that like restraints should be placed upon the mother. In a case where the child is free from fault, and the father is obedient to the law, it does look extremely hard that the wilful misconduct of the mother should thus bring distress upon two innocent persons; but it is better that they should suffer than that an institution in operation for the public good should be entirely subverted and destroyed, as would certainly be the result if the mother of every child in attendance on the schools was permitted, whenever disposed, to enter the school room, and upbraid the teacher in the presence of the pupils.

In the case of Spear v. Cummings, 23 Pick. 224, 84 Am. Dec. 53, Chief Justice Shaw, in referring to the power and authority of the school committee under the law of Massachusetts, which corresponds to the board of education in this case, uses the following language: "The general charge and superintendence, in the absence of express legal provisions, includes the power of determining what pupils shall be received and what pupils rejected. The committee may, for good cause, determine that some shall not be received, as, for instance, if infected with any contagious disease, or if the pupil or parent shall refuse to comply with regulations necessary to the discipline and good management of the school." In the case of Ferriter v. Tyler, 48 Vt. 444, 21 Am. Rep. 133, it was held that children might lawfully be excluded from public schools for absence contrary to the rules of the school, notwithstanding such absence was by the authority and command of the parents, who were Roman Catholics, and by the direction of the priest, and for the purpose of attending religious services on one of the "holy days" of such church. In the case of Sherman v. Charlestown, 8 Cush. 160, it was held 41 L. R. A.

that a child of licentious and immoral character could be excluded from the school, although such character was not manifested by any acts of licentiousness or immorality within the school. In the opinion Chief Justice Shaw says: "On general principles, it would seem strange if, in the establishment of such a great public institution as that of the public schools, in the benefits of which the whole community has so deep and vital an interest, there were no power vested anywhere, sufficient to protect the schools thus established from the noxious influence of anyone whose presence and influence would be injurious to the whole, and subversive of the purposes manifestly contemplated by their establishment. . . . There is no express provision in the law authorizing such exclusion; it results by necessary implication from the provisions of the law requiring good discipline. It proves that the right to attend is not absolute and unqualified, but one to be enjoyed by all under reasonable conditions." In the case of Spiller v. Woburn, 12 Allen, 127, it was ruled that a school committee of a town may lawfully pass an order that the school shall be opened each morning by reading from the Bible and prayer, and that during the prayer each scholar shall bow the head, unless his parents request that he shall be excused from doing so; and may lawfully exclude from the school a scholar who refuses to comply with such order, and whose parents refuse to request that he be excused from so doing. In the case of Bourne v. State, Taylor, 85 Neb. 1, a rule which made it the duty of the teacher to keep a record of the standing of each pupil in the studies pursued by him, his attendance and deportment, and to send each month by the pupil a written report of the same to his parent or guardian, and which required such parent or guardian to sign and return the same to the teacher, was held to be reasonable, and the wilful refusal on the part of the parent to sign and return the same to the teacher was held to be a sufficient reason for excluding the child from school. In the case of Fessman v. Seely (Tex. Civ. App.) 80 S. W. 268, it was held to be a sufficient reason to exclude a child from school that the father refused to permit the teacher to whip him for misconduct, and took no steps himself to correct him. It is true that the school in this case was a private, and not a public, school, and the right of the plaintiff was predicated upon the contract with the teacher; but it would seem that the same reasons which would constrain the courts to hold that such conduct would be a violation of a contract entered into between a parent and a schoolmaster providing for the education of a child would also require them to hold that such conduct would justify the school authorities in refusing to carry out the agreement impliedly made with the patrons of a public school through the medium of the public-school law. In the case of Bissell v. Davison, 65 Conn. 188, 29 L. R. A. 251, it was held that a requirement that all children attending the public school should be properly vaccinated was a reasonable exercise of the public power of the state, and that the validity of the action taken by the school committee did not depend upon the actual existence of small-pox in the town, nor upon a reasonable apprehension of an epidemic of that disease; and that a child who had not been vaccinated was properly excluded from the school, and would not be reinstated by the courts upon the application of the parent. In the opinion, Torrance, J., says: "The duty of providing for the education of the children within its limits through the support and maintenance of public schools has always been regarded in this state in the light of a governmental duty resting upon the sovereign state. It is a duty not imposed by constitutional provision, but has always been assumed by the state; not only because the education of youth is a matter of great public utility, but also, and chiefly, because it is one of great public necessity for the protection and welfare of the state itself. In the performance of this duty the state maintains and supports at great expense, and with an ever watchful solicitude, public schools throughout its territory, and secures to its youth the privilege of attendance therein. This is a privilege or advantage, rather than a right in the strict technical sense of the term. This privilege is granted and is to be enjoyed upon such terms and under such reasonable conditions and restrictions as the lawmaking power, within constitutional limits, may see fit to impose; and within those limits the question what terms, conditions, and restrictions will best subserve the end sought in the establishment and maintenance of public schools is a question solely for the legislature, and not for the courts." In the case of State, Andrew, v. Webber, 108 Ind. 81, 58 Am. Rep. 30, the school authorities of the city of Laporte adopted a rule requiring each pupil of the high school at stated intervals to employ a certain period of time in the study of and practice of music, and for this purpose to provide himself with a prescribed book. The superintendent, notwithstanding a request from the parent that his child might be excused from this exercise, required the pupil to take part in the musical exercises of the school, and, upon his refusal to obey, suspended him from school. The only cause or reason assigned by the parent for requiring his son to disobey the rule was that he did not believe it for the best interest of his son to participate in the musical exercises of the school, and did not wish him to do so. The suspension of the pupil was sustained as lawful and authorized, the court using the following language: "The important question arises, Which should govern the public high school of the city of Laporte, as to the branches of learning to be taught and the course of instruction therein,—the school trustees of such city, to whom the law has confided the direction of these matters, or the mere arbitrary will of the relator, without cause or reason in its support? We are of opinion that only one answer can or ought to be given to this question; the arbitrary wishes of the relator in the premises must yield and be subordinated to the governing authorities of the school of the city of Laporte, and their reasonable rules and regulations of the government of the pupils of its high school." In the case of Duffield v. Williamsport School Dist. 162 Pa. 476, 25 L. R. A. 152, where a rule of the school board required that pupils should undergo vaccination, the exclusion from the school of a pupil whose parents refused to have him vaccinated was held to be lawful, the rule requiring vaccination being enforced during the prevalence of an alarm over the report that there was a case of small-pox in the city. In the case of Guernsey v. Pitkin, 82 Vt. 224, 76 Am. Dec. 171, a requirement by the teacher of a district school that the pupils in grammar should write English compositions was held a reasonable one, and expulsion of a pupil who refused to comply with this requirement and produced no request from his parents asking that he be excused was held to be authorized. In the case of Lander v. Seaver, 82 Vt. 114, 76 Am. Dec. 156, it was held that a schoolmaster has, in general, no right to punish a pupil for misconduct committed after his dismissal from school for the day and return to his home, yet he may, on the pupil's return to school, punish him for any misbehavior, though committed out of school, which has a direct and immediate tendency to injure the school, and to subvert the master's authority. In the case of King v. Jefferson City School Board, 71 Mo. 628, 36 Am. Rep. 490, the court had under consideration the legality of the suspension from the public school of a pupil who had become amenable to a rule which required that "any pupil absent six half days in four consecutive weeks without satisfactory excuse shall be suspended from school." In the opinion, Napton, J., says: "It is said that occasional absences from school on the part of the pupil, or truency, as it is familiarly termed, is of no importance to anyone except the pupil, or his parents, and its indulgence is, therefore, not to be attended with such punishment as suspension or expulsion from the school entirely; that every child has a right to the public school, and that right cannot be taken away by a rule of the board; that such rule is subversive of the object of our system of common schools, which was designed to throw open . . . the doors of the school to all children of the proper age, and give them an opportunity of acquiring such education as will fit them for the after-duties of life. This is true, but this right of attending school necessarily requires, when the school is joined, and whilst such attendance continues, a submission to the regulations of the school. . . . The pupil, it is urged, is at liberty to be absent when he pleases, and such absence is a matter solely between him and his parents. . . . Such absences when without excuse are the fault of the parents, whose business it is to see that the attendance of their child is regular, unless prevented by causes which will, of course, be an excuse under the rule now in question."

It is true that in all of the cases cited some act was done by the child himself, and therefore they are not exactly identical in their facts with the case under consideration. But the act of the child was generally in obedience to a command of the parent, and the exclusion or suspension of the child from school was brought about by the wrongful conduct of the parent in commanding the child to do the act which was illegal, or directing the child to refrain from doing that which was lawfully required. So that it may be fairly said that in the cases cited the child was deprived of the benefit of the school by the act of the parent. It will be also gathered from these cases that it is not absolutely essential that there should be a rule which has been in terms violated either by the child or by the parent. If the act complained of is such that in itself it would be subversive of the good order and discipline in the school, then the mere failure of the board of education to declare that unauthorized which every intelligent man knew could not be authorized would not prevent the school authorities from dealing with a person who was guilty of such an act. If, however, the act in itself be harmless, but may be harmful on account of the peculiar conditions surrounding the school and its authorities, then there should be a prescribed rule before the act could be complained of as one which would forfeit the right to patronize the school. It would seem to require no argument to sustain the proposition that an act of disorder in the school room, calculated to bring into contempt the authority of the school as well as the individual in charge for the time being, should be met with such punishment as would be calculated to impress the pupils with the importance of obedience and respect to constituted authority. Children are too much disposed naturally to look with contempt upon authority, especially when represented by a schoolmaster; and parents should be restrained from encouraging this tendency, so dangerous in its nature to private and public welfare. It is admitted by all that in such a case prosecution under the criminal laws of the state would be justified and proper. This would satisfy the public wrong growing out of the violation of the penal laws, but another, and it may not be unwise to say, a greater, wrong has been done than the mere infraction of the criminal law. The only adequate remedy for such a wrong is one which will cause the parents of the state to understand that that which is given to them for their benefit primarily, and for the benefit of their children secondarily, will be withdrawn from them and their children whenever they do an act which, in its effect, will be prejudicial to the system which is maintained for their benefit. We are aware that it has been held that where a child is excluded unlawfully from a public school, he has, in some cases, a right of action against the public officers, and that the right of action is not in the parent. Donahoe v. Richards, 38 Me. 376 and 379, 61 Am. Dec. 256; Stephenson v. Hall, 14 Barb. 222. The right to recover in such action is limited to cases where the public officials acted wantonly or maliciously. McCormick v. Burt, 95 Ill. 263, 35 Am. Rep. 163, Dritt v. Snodgrass, 66 Mo. 286, 27 Am. Rep. 343. In cases, however, where application was made for reinstatement of the child in the school, it will be generally found that the application was made in the name and in behalf of the parent or guardian. Rutison v. Post, 79 Ill. 567; State, Bowe, v. Fond du Lac Bd of Education, 63 Wis. 234; Holman v. School Dist. No. 5 Trustees, 77 Mich. 605, 6 L. R. A. 584; Binde v. Klinge, 30 Mo. App. 285; Trustees of Schools v. People, Van Allen, 87 Ill. 303, 29 Am. Rep. 55. That the child should have a right of action for being maliciously and wantonly deprived of an education after the parent has entered him in the school is not in conflict with the principle which we contend for in this case. If the child is wantonly and maliciously excluded from the school, his right of action is entirely consistent with the right which exists in the parent to compel his reinstatement. That the child is damaged, there can be no question. His parent is under a duty to educate him. His parent has lawfully placed him at the place provided by law for this education. The parent, therefore, and no one but the parent, will be considered by the law when the question of entering the school, and being kept therein, is under consideration. The state will not allow anyone except the parent to decide the question as to whether the child shall be educated. If the parent decides that the child shall be educated, and the school authorities refuse to admit, or wrongfully exclude him from the benefits of the system provided, the courts will entertain an application to compel admission or reinstatement from no one except the parent or guardian, or some other person occupying a like relation to the child. While it is the act of the parent or guardian which places the child in the school, and puts him in a position where he can obtain the benefits of the system, this does not prevent a duty from arising on the part of the school authorities towards the child to abstain from unlawful conduct which would deprive the child of the benefit which the act of the parent has secured to it. The moment the child is placed in the school, this duty arises. A breach of this duty will be a tort for which the child can recover in a proper action against the person wantonly and maliciously depriving him of the benefits which he would receive from the school. Civil Code, 3807. The authorities of the public schools under the law owe a duty to the public to admit and keep within the schools all children who come within the lawfully prescribed rules, and whose parents or guardians see fit to enter them. When, therefore, such school authorities willfully, wantonly, and maliciously refuse to admit such children, a public wrong is committed, which may be remedied, so far as the public is concerned, by indictment for malpractice, or other appropriate remedy. Out of this breach of duty damage arises to the parent as well as to the child. The parent therefore has the right to appeal to the courts to compel the child to be admitted or reinstated, as the case may be, and also to appeal to the courts by his action for damages for the amount which he would be required to expend in the education of this child. The child would also have a right against the individuals thus wantonly and maliciously depriving him of the benefit which is secured to him by the law in the event the parent sees proper to enter him in the school. Broom, Com. Law, 19th London ed. pp. 757-759. When the law requires one to do an act for the benefit of another, or to forbear the doing of that which may injure another, though no action be given in express terms, upon the accrual of damages the party may recover. Civil Code, § 3809. It follows, therefore, that when a parent enters his child in the public schools, the law requires that the authorities of the school shall do each and every act required by the law which will be for the benefit of the child, and also that the authorities shall refrain from doing any act which will injure the child. If the school authorities wantonly and maliciously refuse to discharge the duty thus imposed upon them, the child will have a right of action against the individuals who commit the wrongful act. Our conclusion is that the board of education, either in the absence of a rule or in furtherance of a prescribed rule, had the right to exclude from the schools under its control any child whose parent, in the school room, or its vicinity, in the presence of such child and other pupils, conducted himself or herself in such manner that their acts were calculated to produce disorder in the school, and break down and destroy its discipline. Under the facts set up in the answer of the board of education in this case, it was not only authorized, but it was its duty, to suspend the children of the defendants in error from the school. The trial judge erred in granting the mandamus and reinstating the children.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SEVENTH CIRCUIT.

DENNEHY & COMPANY et al., Appts.,
v.

John McNULTA et al.

(86 Fed. Rep. 825.)

1. The facts that a corporation as one of the contracting parties may constitute an unjust monopoly, and that its general business is illegal, cannot serve ipso facto to create default or liability on its contracts generally; nor can such facts be invoked collaterally to affect in any manner its independent contract obligations or rights.

2. An agreement by a manufacturing corporation that, subject to conditions named and for the purpose of securing the continuous patronage of a purchaser, the company will, in six months, pay to the purchaser a certain amount, being a rebate on a purchase that day made, to be valid and payable only on condition that the purchaser, his successors and assigns, shall have bought their supply of such goods as are produced by the company exclusively from one or more dealers named,—cannot be enforced, even in equity, without the performance of the condition, unless waived or excused upon the ground that the condition is affixed as a means of carrying out the illegal purposes of a monopoly, as the condition is the sole consideration of the promise, and if illegal the promise falls with it.

3. One who voluntarily and knowingly deals with parties combined to monopolize trade and arbitrarily control prices cannot accept and retain the goods and have a right of action against the seller for the money paid or any part of it, either upon the ground that the combination was illegal, or that its prices were unreasonable, however urgent the need of dealing with such combination may have seemed for preservation of business interests, as such need cannot change the payment made from its voluntary character.

APPPEAL by claimants from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois disallowing their claims against funds in the hands of the court in the case of Empire Distilling Company v. McNulta. Affirmed.

Before Woods and Jenkins, Circuit Judges, and Seaman, District Judge.

Statement by Seaman, District Judge:

The appellants filed claims for allowance against the funds in court in the consolidated causes against the Distilling & Cattle Feeding Company, of which sufficient description appears in the case of Empire Distilling Co. v. McNulta (decided by this court January 4, 1897), 46 U. S. App. 578, 77 Fed. Rep. 700, and 23 C. C. A. 415.

(1) The claims of Dennehy & Co. were presented by petition in their name, and consisted of ninety-one written instruments, called rebate certificates or vouchers, issued by the Distilling & Cattle Feeding Company to Charles Dennehy & Co., aggregating the sum of $5,238.28. The instruments are of various dates, numbers, and amounts, and in form as follows, with appropriate insertions in the blank spaces, respectively:

Peoria, Ill., ———, 189—. No. ———

Subject to the conditions named herein, and for the purpose of securing the continuous patronage of the within-named purchaser, the successors and assigns of the same, for its products, the ——— Distilling & Cattle Feeding Co., six months from the date of this purchase voucher, will pay to Charles Dennehy & Co., of Chicago, purchaser, ——— dollars ($——), being a rebate of seven cents per proof gallon on ——— proof gallons of the Distilling and Cattle-Feeding Company's product purchased this day. This voucher will be valid and payable only upon condition that the above-named purchaser, the successors and assigns of the same, from the date of this voucher to the time of its payment, shall have bought their supply of such kinds of goods as are produced by the Distilling and Cattle-Feeding Company, and all compounds thereof, exclusively of one or more of the dealers named on the back thereof, until further notified, and shall also have subscribed to the certificate on the back hereof.

Distilling and Cattle-Feeding Co.,

By J. B. Greenhut, President.

Not transferable nor negotiable.

When due, forward to the German American National Bank of Peoria, Ill., where this voucher is payable without exchange or other charge.

Printed upon the back is the following indorsement: "It is hereby certified that from the date of this voucher to the maturity thereof the within-named purchaser, and the successors and assigns of the same, have purchased all of their supply of such kind of goods, and their compounds, as are produced by the Distilling and Cattle-Feeding Co., exclusively from one or more of the dealers named hereon." Appended thereto is a list of sixty-one dealers or distillers referred to, variously located throughout the United States.

(2) The petition of Moses Salomon sets up that he is the assignee of sundry judgments rendered in justices' courts against the Distilling & Cattle-Feeding Company, and also the holder of vouchers on which said judgments were rendered; but it appeared, and was undisputed, that appeals from the judgments were perfected and pending, whereby the judgments became ineffective; and thereupon the petitioner introduced forty-seven certificates or vouchers issued to Stein Bros., of various dates, numbers, and amounts, aggregating the sum of $3,604.64, and similar in form and tenor to the instrument above described, except that in a portion thereof the rebate was named at "5 cents per proof gallon," instead of 7 cents, as recited in the sample form, and the words, "Not transferable nor negotiable," do not appear, from the record, to have been printed or stamped thereon.

It is not claimed that the payees or holders in either case complied in any respect with the conditions named in the voucher. On the contrary, it appears, and is conceded, that there was neither compliance nor attempt to perform the condition. It further appears that no interest is in fact asserted by either of the payees named in the vouchers; but that (1) the Dennehy & Co. vouchers were indorsed in blank, without recourse, by that corporation, delivered to the United States Distilling Company, and were subsequently delivered to one G. E. Jones, for whose benefit, as finally divulged, the claim was filed in the name of the original payees; and (2) that the vouchers issued to Stein Bros. were by them indorsed payable to the order of one Joseph Wolf, without recourse, and by the latter indorsed in blank, and delivered to the petitioner, Salomon, an attorney at law, under an arrangement that Salomon should bear all expenses, and receive one half of any amount realized.

The hearing upon the claims was before a special master, who reported to the circuit court "the testimony and evidence, with his conclusions thereon." Aside from the matters above recited, voluminous testimony was introduced on behalf of the claimants, directed to showing that the Distilling & Cattle-Feeding Company, as organized and conducted, was a combination of a large percentage of the distillers of the country,—asserted to be 85 per cent thereof,—constituting an illegal trust, monopolizing and controlling the product of the country in that line to the extent of nearly 90 per cent; that the system of rebate vouchers in evidence was entered into and designed to carry out and secure the purposes of the monopoly; that, through this control of the major share of distillery products, it was deemed a business necessity on the part of Dennehy & Co., Stein Bros, and other dealers throughout the country, to make all their purchases in that line from the distributors of the combination; or, as stated in the argument of their counsel, it became "impracticable and detrimental to their trade to buy liquors elsewhere," in the face of the monopoly; but it also appears that an independent and accessible supply existed in fact. The conclusions of the special master were against the allowance of the claims in both cases. Exceptions filed by each claimant were subsequently heard and overruled in the circuit court, the report of the special master in each case was confirmed, and final decree entered accordingly. The opinion thereon, by Showalter, Circuit Judge, is reported in 77 Fed. Rep. 265.

Mr. Moses Salomon for appellants.

Mr. Levy Mayer for appellees.

Seaman, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Passing technical objections to consider this controversy upon the merits, it is manifest that no liability is chargeable against the Distilling & Cattle Feeding Company, except upon one or the other of the following propositions: (1) That the conditions contained in the vouchers may either be ignored or set aside for illegality, and the promise thus segregated may be enforced without performance of the conditions; or (2) that in the original transactions money was paid to this corporation under circumstances from which the law raises an implied promise of repayment, within the doctrine of money had and received, which ex æquo et bono, belongs to the party by whom it was so paid. Under either head, the mere fact that the corporation, as one of the contracting parties, may constitute an unjust monopoly, and that its general business is illegal,—a status apparently held in Distilling & Cattle Feeding Co. v. People, Moloney, 156 Ill. 448, cannot serve, speo facto, to create default or liability on its contracts generally; nor can such fact be invoked collaterally to affect in any manner its independent contract obligations or rights. National Distilling Co. v. Cream City Importing Co. 86 Wis. 852, 855.

1. Can a cause of action be predicated upon the written agreement? In substance, the instrument promises that, "subject to the conditions named," and "for the purpose of securing the continuous patronage" of the purchaser as payee thereof, the Distilling & Cattle-Feeding Company will, in six months after date, pay to the purchaser the amount named, "being a rebate of 7 [or 5] cents per proof gallon" on a purchase that day made, and to be "valid and payable only on condition" that the purchaser named, his successors and assigns, from date of the voucher to the time of payment, "shall have bought their supply of such goods as are produced" by the promisor corporation "exclusively from one or more of the dealers named on the back," and "shall also have subscribed to the certificate on the back." The terms are unequivocal that the promise was not to bind the corporation unless the promisee performed the acts stated. In other words, the obligations of the contract are dependent upon a condition precedent; and there can be no default by the promisor without performance of the condition, unless waived or excused by acts or conduct on the part of the promisor. Under the contract in question, compliance with the conditions was neither obstructed on the one side, nor attempted on the other, and it is manifest that no right of action at law has accrued in favor of the promisees. In view of this status, the appellants contend that the claims are entitled to equitable consideration, because (1) they are presented in the course of a proceeding in equity; and (2) this condition is affixed to the contract as a means by which to carry out the illegal purposes of a monopoly operating in restraint of trade, and for that reason a court of equity should either disregard the condition or strike it out. But assuming, for the argument, that both promises are well taken, no relief can then be granted for enforcement of the contract, as no consideration is left to support the promise. The condition is the sole consideration for the promise, and, if that is illegal, the promise falls with it. Even if the consideration were invalid only in part, the same result would follow, the promise being indivisible. Bishop, Contr. §§ 74, 497; 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 886; Greenwood, Pub. Pol. rule 24. No element of the contract as actually made between the parties remains to be enforced. A court of equity cannot make a new contract for them, nor can it destroy the substance of the one which they have entered into, and at the same time preserve the contract obligation. Recovery upon the vouchers in question, with the conditions unfulfilled, would have that effect, and it must be denied in equity as well as in law. Klein v. New York L. Ins. Co. 104 U. S. 88, 91, 26 L. ed. 662, 668.

2. The second and final proposition calls for the application of the equitable doctrine on which assumpsit may be maintained as for money had and received, and the right to this remedy must be found in the original transactions and circumstances under which the payments were made to the Distilling & Cattle-Feeding Company. These were, on their face, simple contracts of bargain and sale, and the only payments referred to were made upon distinct purchases of supplies at stipulated prices. The goods were legitimate subjects of trade, and there was no illegality in the nature of the contract of purchase. There is no pretense that the purchaser was either deceived or mistaken. On the contrary, his purchase, so far as appears, was in exact compliance both with his expectations and his bargain. It is not asserted that fraud entered directly into any of these transactions; nor is there impeachment for any cause, except upon the hypothesis for which the appellants contend, by way of collateral attack, namely: (1) That an unlawful combination enabled the seller to control and arbitrarily fix prices upon nine tenths of the distillery products of the country; (2) that the exigencies of business on the part of the purchasers constrained them to deal with this combination; (3) that the amount named in the vouchers as rebate was beyond the fair price, and a distinct addition to the price which was imposed and withheld to secure continuance of the trade. And upon the line of testimony introduced as tending in some measure to show this state of facts the appellants rest their right to recover the alleged excess in the prices paid, as money paid under constraint or duress. Without considering whether the testimony referred to was either admissible under the issues, or of the effect alleged, and conceding, for the purposes of the case, the truth of each of the above propositions of fact, there can be no recovery of the money so paid, for the reason that no actual duress is shown, and no element exists to make the payment involuntary or compulsory. Radich v. Hutchins, 95 U. S. 210, 218, 24 L. ed. 409, 410; Loneragan v. Buford, 148 U. S. 581, 590, 37 L. ed. 569, 572; 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 57, title Duress, and cases cited. In Radich v. Hutchins, 95 U. S. 210, 218, 24 L. ed. 409, 410, it is said:

"To constitute the coercion or duress which will be regarded as sufficient to make a payment involuntary, . . . there must be some actual or threatened exercise of power possessed, or believed to be possessed, by the party exacting or receiving the payment, over the person or property of another, from which the latter has no other means of immediate relief than by making the payment. As stated by the court of appeals of Maryland, the doctrine established by the authorities is that 'a payment is not to be regarded as compulsory, unless made to emancipate the person or property from an actual and existing duress imposed upon it by the party to whom the money is paid.' Baltimore v. Lefferman, 4 Gill, 425, 45 Am. Dec. 145; Brumagim v. Tillinghast, 18 Cal. 265, 79 Am. Dec. 176; Mays v. Cincinnati, 1 Ohio St. 268."

In the case at bar neither the persons nor the property of the purchasers were within the physical control of the sellers when the contracts of purchase were entered into, or when the payments were made thereupon, and in the eye of the law the transactions were voluntary. At the utmost, the circumstances here assumed show an urgent need for the goods to keep up their stock, and continue in trade, and to that end a business necessity to make their purchases from the illegal combination, because it so far controlled the market that they had reason to fear disastrous results if supplies were sought elsewhere. However urgent this need may have seemed for preservation of business interests, it cannot operate to change the payment made upon such purchases from the voluntary character impressed by the contract into the involuntary payment which may be reclaimed. Emery v. Lowell, 127 Mass. 138, 140; Oustin v. Viroqua, 67 Wis. 314, 320, and cases cited; 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 71. As the purchaser elected to take the goods upon the terms fixed, and with all the circumstances in mind, his rights must be measured by the contract, and not by the motives which influenced either party to enter into it. If the seller took advantage of his necessities, and made the price excessive, it would be subversive of the well-established rules which govern contract rights to receive testimony of such circumstances, to so modify the terms agreed upon, and allow recovery of the excess in price. In the case of an injurious combination of the nature asserted here, the remedy is by well-recognized and direct proceedings; but one who voluntarily and knowingly deals with the parties so combined cannot, on the one hand, take the benefit of his bargain, and, on the other, have a right of action against the seller for the money paid, or any part of it, either upon the ground that the combination was illegal, or that its prices were unreasonable.

We are of opinion that no foundation is established for either set of claims, and the decrees thereupon is affirmed.

Moses M. ROSS et al.

1. A partial payment by a principal debtor will not suspend the running of the statute of limitations in favor of his surety.
2. The absence from the state of a principal debtor does not suspend the running of the statute of limitations in favor of his surety.

(June 17, 1898.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Hamilton County in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce payment of a promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Fippen & Purvis for appellant.

Messrs. Fertig & Alexander for appellees.

Jordan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was commenced by appellant on March 2, 1897, to recover a judgment on a promissory note, and also to set aside an alleged fraudulent conveyance of land by the appellee Moses M. Ross, to his coappellee Martha Price, and to subject the lands so conveyed to the payment of the judgment sought to be recovered upon the note. The note in suit appears to have been executed on December 20, 1882, by one Francis M. Ross, together with the appellee Moses M. Ross, to appellant, for the sum of $150, due in twelve months after the date thereof. The following partial payments seem to have been made on the note, and indorsed thereon, as shown by a copy filed as an exhibit with the complaint, to wit: September 26, 1888, §13; January 6, 1887, §20, as interest; December 24, 1887, §15; November 27, 1889, §57.57; December 18, 1889, §20. Among other defenses interposed by the appellee Moses M. Ross, under his separate answer, against a recovery upon the note, was the statute of limitations of ten years. Appellant replied to this answer in three paragraphs, but subsequently dismissed the first and second. The third paragraph of the reply, in avoidance of the defense of the statute of limitations set up by the appellee Moses M. Ross, averred that said Ross had executed the note in suit as the surety for one Francis M. Ross, and alleged the truth to be that said Francis M., the principal, had made the various partial payments on the note, as set out in the exhibit filed with the complaint, and that long before ten years had elapsed after the execution of the note, to wit, within six years after its execution, said principal, Francis M., with the knowledge and consent of the defendant Moses M. Ross, his surety, but without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff, removed from the state of Indiana, and became a nonresident of said state, and has so remained and continued to be a nonresident up to the present time; and, by reason of his being such nonresident, it is alleged that the plaintiff could not proceed against him as the principal for a judgment on the note. A demurrer was sustained to this paragraph, and, appellant refusing to further plead, judgment was rendered that she take nothing by her action, and that the defendants recover of her their costs. The sustaining of the demurrer to the third paragraph of reply is the only error assigned. Appellant insists that the facts alleged in the reply were sufficient to avoid the defense of the statute of limitations set up in the answer. The questions presented for decision are: First. Will a partial payment of a principal debtor suspend the running of the statute of limitations in favor of his surety? Second. Will the absence of the principal debtor from the state suspend the statute in favor of such surety? Passing the consideration of the infirmities that are urged against the pleading in controversy, to the effect that it pleads evidence instead of facts, and that it is deficient in not setting out the partial payments made, instead of referring to them only, as shown by the exhibit filed with the complaint, we proceed to determine the real questions discussed by the counsel of both parties to this appeal.

Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, § 302 (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 301, Horner's Rev. Stat. 1897, § 301), relative to the statute of limitation, provides: "No acknowledgment or promise shall be evidence of a new or continuing contract, whereby to take the case out of the operation of the provisions of this act, unless the same be contained in some writing signed by the party to be charged thereby." Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, § 303 (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 302; Horner's Rev. Stat. 1897, § 302), provides that "the acknowledgment or promise of one joint contractor or executor or administrator shall not render any other joint contractor, executor, or administrator liable under the provisions of this act." The next section—304 (303)—declares that

"nothing contained in the preceding sections shall take away or lessen the effect of any payment made by any person," etc. It is the settled rule that an admission of continued indebtedness may be inferred from the fact of part payment by a debtor. Such inference, however, is not one of law, but of fact. The payment is only prima facie evidence of the acknowledgment or admission of the debtor, and is subject to be rebutted by other evidence and the circumstances under which it was made. Carlisle v. Morris, 8 Ind. 421; Willey v. State, Brown, 105 Ind. 453. The statute, as we have seen, declares that no acknowledgment or promise shall be evidence of a continuing contract to take the case out of the operation of the statute, unless it be in writing signed by the party to be charged thereby. It is further provided that the promise or acknowledgment of a joint contractor shall not have the effect to render any other joint contractor liable. It is expressly declared, however, that these provisions of the law shall not take away or lessen the effect of any payment made by any person; consequently, they leave the effect of a partial payment untouched. The rule applicable to a payment, in taking a case out of the provisions of the statute of limitations, or, rather, extending the time during which the action may be commenced, does not depend on any provisions of the statute of limitations, but is the result of judicial decisions, and the reason of the rule depends wholly upon such decisions. The reason upon which the rule is said to rest is that a partial payment, voluntarily made by a debtor, upon a claim or debt, is in the nature of an acknowledgment or admission by him of his liability for the whole demand; and from the fact that he made the payment a new promise on his part to pay the remainder of the debt may be implied, and, under this legal inference, such new promise arises at the time the partial payment is made. The origin of the rule is fully considered and set forth in Van Keuren v. Parmelee, 2 N. Y. 523, 51 Am. Dec. 322. It must be evident, we think, that, to bring the case within the reason of the rule, the payment should be made by the party to be charged with its effect, or by his agent duly authorized to so charge him. A partial payment being treated by the law as nothing more than prima facie evidence of an admission or acknowledgment that the debt is due, it would seem in reason, that it could and should only affect the party that makes it, unless he has authority to speak for others as well as himself. This doctrine finds support in the well-affirmed rule that the acknowledgment of a debt made by one partner after the dissolution of a partnership is not sufficient to take the case out of the operation of the statute of limitations as to the other partners. Yandes v. Lafavour, 2 Blackf. 371; Kirk v. Hiatt, 2 Ind. 322. In the case of Bottles v. Miller, 112 Ind. 584, it is held that a payment upon a promissory note by one joint and several maker will not defeat the operation of the statute of limitations as to any other maker, nor deprive the latter of his right to avail himself of the statute as a defense. While the question in that case does not appear to have been fully considered, the decision thereof seemingly being controlled by the construction which the learned judge, speaking for the court, placed upon the statute of limitations, we are, however, satisfied, in view of the authorities, that the conclusion reached by the court upon the question in that appeal was correct.

The statute, as heretofore said, in effect declaring that the acknowledgment or promise of one joint contractor will not take the case out of its operation as to any other joint contractor, no sufficient reason can be given, nor would any seem to exist, that would make a partial payment more potent in its effect than an express acknowledgment or promise by a debtor. Especially ought this to be true in view of the fact that such payment is treated by the law as evidence only of a new promise to pay the remainder of the debt. We are of the opinion, and so hold, that the correct and better rule is that a partial payment can serve only to suspend the running of the statute of limitations as against the party making the payment, by himself or duly authorized agent; and the fact that the one making the payment is the principal debtor does not alter nor change the rule as to other debtors who executed the note or obligation as his sureties. We are aware that there are decisions of the higher courts of sister states which hold that the payment by one or more parties jointly and severally liable upon a note or other obligation made before the limitation attaches, will suspend the running of the statute in favor of the others; but the great trend of the decisions of courts of other states sustains the conclusion we have reached, among which are the following: Van Keuren v. Parmerlee, 2 N. Y. 523, 51 Am. Dec. 322; Shoemaker v. Benedict, 11 N. Y. 176, 62 Am. Dec. 95; Winchell v. Hicks, 18 N. Y. 538; McLaren v. McMartin, 36 N. Y. 88; Harper v. Fairley, 53 N. Y. 442; Graham v. Selover, 59 Barb. 813; Voorhies's Succession, 21 La. Ann. 659; Hunter v. Robertson, 30 Ga. 479; Smith v. Coon, 22 La. Ann. 445; Marienthal v. Mosler, 16 Ohio St. 586; Hance v. Hair, 25 Ohio St. 849; Steele v. Souder, 20 Kan. 89; Davis v. Clark, 58 Kan. 454.

The absence from the state of the principal debtor in this case did not suspend the running of the statute in favor of the appellee, his surety. Bottles v. Miller, 112 Ind. 584; Davis v. Clark, 58 Kan. 454; 2 Wood, Limitation of Actions, § 246.

It follows that the court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the reply, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

The effect of contributory negligence to defeat or limit a right of action for an injury received in another state is to be determined by the law of the place of the injury, and not by the law of the forum.

(December 10, 1907.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Warren County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. W. Bruce and William Lindsay, with Mr. J. A. Mitchell, for appellant:

In matters ex contractu the lex loci contractus, or the place where the contract was made, governs the construction and validity of the contract, and the lex fori, or the place where the contract is sought to be enforced, governs the remedy and all matters pertaining thereto.

Story, Conf. Laws, § 571; Whart. Conf. Laws, §§ 747-749; 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 575 et seq.; Scudder v. Union Nat. Bank, 91 U. S. 406, 28 L. ed. 245.

NOTE.—On the question whether the law of the forum or that of the place in which the injury occurred is to govern in respect to the defense of contributory negligence, there does not seem to be any authority except what is referred to in the above case.

On principle there is no reason why the doctrine of the lex fori should not be applied to actions ex delicto as well as to actions ex contractu.

Nonce v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 33 Fed. Rep. 434; Herrick v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 81 Minn. 11, 47 Am. Rep. 771; Northern P. R. Co. v. Babcock, 154 U. S. 190, 38 L. ed. 968.

The right to plead and rely upon a counterclaim or set-off is governed by the lex fori.

3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 579; Davis v. Morton, 5 Bush, 161, 96 Am. Dec. 345.

Contributory negligence is purely a matter of defense in the nature of a plea of confession and avoidance, and must be affirmatively pleaded.

Depp v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 12 Ky. L. Rep. 366; Owen & McKinney v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 10 Ky. L. Rep. 56; Faure v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 91 Ky. 541.

The doctrine of comparative negligence prevailing in the state of Tennessee is not a creature of statute, but is the common law as expounded by the courts of that state, and is chiefly distinguished from the common-law rule of this state in that in the former state contributory negligence of the plaintiff can only be taken in mitigation of damages, whereas in Kentucky the plaintiff's contributory negligence is a complete defense to the action and bars the right of recovery for any sum without regard to quantum of negligence of the respective parties to the action.

The plea of limitation pertains to the remedy, and must be governed by the lex fori, except only in those cases where the time within which the action must be brought forms apart of the statute giving the right of action.

Munos v. Southern P. Co. 2 U. S. App. 222, 51 Fed. Rep. 188; Theroux v. Northern P. R. Co. 27 U. S. App. 508, 64 Fed. Rep. 84, 12 C. C. A. 52.

The defensive plea of contributory negligence is no part or element of the right of action, but pertains exclusively to the remedy, and must be governed by the law of the Kentucky forum.

To establish a contrary doctrine would result in a discrimination against a citizen of this state in the bestowal of a favor upon citizens of other states, thereby violating the spirit, if not the letter, of that constitutional provision which declares that "no state shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

Story, Conf. Laws, § 57; Williams v. Haines, 27 Iowa, 251, 1 Am. Rep. 268; Johnson v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 91 Iowa, 249; 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 579; Bank of Gallipolis v. Trimble, 6 B. Mon. 601; Davis v. Morton, 5 Bush, 161, 96 Am. Dec. 345; Parsons, Notes & Bills, p. 876; 2 Kent, Com. p. 462.

The supreme court of Tennessee in the case of East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Hull, 28 Tenn. 38, decided October 13, 1889, a few weeks before the action at bar arose, expressly and emphatically held that the doctrine of "comparative negligence" has never prevailed in that state.

Messrs. B. F. Procter, Edward W. Hines, and W. S. Pryor for appellee.

Paynter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

While T. P. Whitlow was in the service of the appellant as brakeman on one of its trains he is alleged to have been killed by gross and wilful negligence of the servants and employees of the appellant in charge of the train. At the time of his death he was a resident of this state, and his father qualified as his personal representative in the Warren county court. That the personal representative had the right to maintain the action, if the liability existed under the laws of Tennessee, cannot be questioned. Bruce v. Cincinnati R. Co. 83 Ky. 174; Wintuska v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 14 Ky. L. Rep. 579. He seeks to recover by virtue of the statute of Tennessee authorizing a recovery when death results from the wrongful act, fault, or commission of another, and the law as settled in that state in the administration of the statute. It is a well settled principle in all civilized countries, so far as we are aware, that in matters ex contractu the lex loci contractus governs the construction and the validity of the contract, and that the lex fori governs the remedy. This principle is so familiar it would be waste of time to cite elementary authorities or adjudged cases in support of it. As an amplification of the doctrine, it may not be inappropriate to quote from Scudder v. Union Nat. Bank, 91 U. S. 406, 23 L. ed. 245; wherein it is said: "Matters bearing upon the execution, the interpretation, and the validity of a contract are determined by the law of the place where the contract is made." 41 L. R. A.

Matters connected with its performance are regulated by the law prevailing at the place of performance. Matters respecting the remedy, such as the bringing of suits, admissibility of evidence, statutes of limitation, depend upon the law of the place where the suit is brought. A careful examination of the well considered decisions of this country and of England will sustain these positions." We can see no reason why the doctrine as established as to actions ex contractu may not be applied to actions ex delicto. There seem to be but few decisions on the question. In the case of Nonce v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 33 Fed. Rep. 431, it was held that there is no distinction on the subject between actions ex contractu and ex delicto. Herrick v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 31 Minn. 11, 47 Am. Rep. 771, was an action ex delicto, and the court held that the law of the place where the right was acquired or the liability incurred governs as to the right of action, while all that pertains merely to the remedy is controlled by the law of the state where the action is brought, thus recognizing the principle as the same where the right of action is ex contractu or ex delicto. The question presented to the court is whether the Kentucky or Tennessee law as to contributory negligence applies. Under the Tennessee law, if the intestate was himself guilty of negligence that contributed to his injury and death, yet if the defendant was guilty of negligence which was the direct and proximate cause of the intestate's injuries and death, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover, but the damages recoverable should be reduced or mitigated by reason of the intestate's contributory negligence. Under our law, if the intestate was guilty of such contributory negligence except for which his injuries and death would not have occurred then there can be no recovery. Contributory negligence, under our rule, is never applied to the mitigation of damages. The question is whether the contributory neglect relates to the right or to the remedy. The right to plead a counterclaim or a set-off relates to the remedy. In Davis v. Morton, 5 Bush, 160, 96 Am. Dec. 345, it was held that the defendant was allowed to plead a set-off to a note, although not allowed by the laws of Tennessee, where the note was executed. Under our system of pleading, counterclaims in certain cases are allowed. A counterclaim, under our system of pleading, is a cause of action against the plaintiff, or against him and another, which arises out of the contract or transaction stated in the petition. A set-off is a cause of action upon a contract, judgment, or award in favor of the defendant against plaintiff, or against him and another, and it cannot be pleaded except in an action upon a contract, judgment, or award. The defendant who pleads a counterclaim admits the contract or transaction, and seeks a recovery on his counterclaim growing out of it. The defendant who pleads a set-off admits his liability on the cause of action stated in the petition, but claims he is entitled to a credit by way of set-off. The plea of the statute of limitations generally relates to the remedy. In pleading the statute of limitations, the defendant admits that the cause of action or liability existed, but says that the plaintiff has slept too long on his rights, and his right to recover is barred. This is a defense which arises after the liability is incurred. The existence of the right to plead a counterclaim, a set-off, or the statute of limitations does not show that the cause of action did not exist, but, on the contrary, admits its existence. When we say that a counterclaim or a set-off is a matter relating to the remedy, we mean that if they exist they may be relied upon as a defense to the action. Suppose, however, that, under the lex loci contractus, they did not exist, we could not say that, had the transaction occurred in the state, the liability therefor would have existed. Therefore they are available as defenses in this state. To do this would be to utterly disregard the lex loci. It would be creating a liability or cause of action when none existed in the place where the transaction or contract took place. To make our meaning clear, suppose that the set-off pleaded was a note which was void under the laws of the place where executed, or for some cause did not impose any liability on the plaintiff; the court would not adjudge that it was binding on the payor because it would have been so had it been executed in this state.

From all the facts attending the injury, it must be determined whether the defendant has incurred a liability for damages and the extent of it. The law of Tennessee must govern in fixing the liability and the quantum of recovery. It would be strange to apply the law of Tennessee in determining the question of liability, and take the law of the forum to fix the measure of recovery. It would be stranger still for the court to hold that the law of Tennessee should govern in fixing the liability; then apply the law of Kentucky, which would prevent a recovery, although a recovery is authorized by the law of Tennessee. It would be in one breath declaring the Tennessee law should determine the liability, and in the next instant adjudging that Kentucky law shall determine the liability and defeat a recovery. Suppose that, under the laws of this state, contributory negligence was not available in an action for the negligent killing of a human being, but in Tennessee it was. Could it be said, in an action brought in this jurisdiction for the negligent killing in Tennessee, that the law in that state allowing such a plea was not available as a defense because it related, not to the right of action, but to the remedy? It could not be said it pertained to the remedy. It would be a fact that would in part determine the question of liability or of the right of action. The conduct of the intestate is part of the facts from which the liability of the defendant is fixed, and measures the relief to which the personal representative is entitled. Bruce v. Cincinnati R. Co. was an action under the Tennessee statute. The court said: "We are of the opinion the action can be maintained and recovery had in this state in the same manner, for the same cause, and to the same extent as if the action had been brought and prosecuted in the state of Tennessee, where the cause of action arose." If contributory negligence is available to defeat a recovery in this case, then the plaintiff cannot recover in the same manner and to the same extent as if the action had been brought in Tennessee. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Graham, 41 L. R. A.

98 Ky. 688, was an action under the statute of Alabama for negligent killing. The court held that the measure of damages, as determined by the decisions of the Alabama supreme court, should be applied in the case. The case of Johnson v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 91 Iowa, 248, is cited by counsel for appellant to sustain his contention that the Kentucky law of contributory negligence should prevail. The injury in that case occurred in Illinois, and the action was brought in Iowa. The doctrine of comparative negligence prevailed in Illinois, and the Iowa court refused to follow the rule. The court disposed of the question in a few lines as to whether the doctrine of comparative negligence which had been established by the decisions of the courts of Illinois should prevail in that case. Kinne, J., took no part in the decision. Robinson, J., expressed no opinion on the question, but said that it was not necessarily involved in a determination of the case. Knight v. West Jersey R. Co. 103 Pa. 250, 56 Am. Rep. 200, and Herrick v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 81 Minn. 11, 47 Am. Rep. 771, are cited by the court to sustain its conclusion. In neither of these cases cited was the same question involved which the Iowa court adjudged, nor was there a similar question involved in them. The question in Knight v. West Jersey R. Co. presents the right to maintain an action against a foreign corporation to recover damages in an action ex delicto for negligence causing the death in another state. The court held that such an action could be maintained. The Pennsylvania court recognized the correctness of the doctrine of Herrick v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co.; and the court in the latter case said: "Whenever, by either common law or statute, a right of action has become fixed and a legal liability incurred, that liability, if the action be transitory, may be enforced, and the right of action pursued, in the courts of any state which can obtain jurisdiction of the defendant, provided it is not against the public policy of the laws of the state where it is sought to be enforced. . . . The statute of another state has, of course, no extraterritorial force, but rights acquired under it will always, in comity, be enforced, if not against the public policy of the laws of the former. In such cases the law of the place where the right was acquired, or the liability was incurred, will govern as to the right of action; while all that pertains merely to the remedy will be controlled by the law of the state where the action is brought. And we think the principle is the same, whether the right of action be ex contractu or ex delicto." Of course, there is no question of public policy involved in the case, because we have a statute of the same general import of the statute of Tennessee. Dennick v. Central R. Co. 103 U. S. 11, 26 L. ed. 439, was an action for injuries resulting in death, and the court held it was transitory. The court said: "It is difficult to understand how the nature of the remedy, or the jurisdiction of the courts to enforce it, is in any manner dependent on the question whether it is a statutory right or a common-law right. Wherever, by either the common law or the statute law of a state, a right of action has become fixed, and a legal liability incurred, that liability may be enforced, and the right of action pursued, in any court which has jurisdiction of such matters and can obtain jurisdiction of the parties." At the time the injury was inflicted the right of action became fixed, and a legal liability was incurred. The liability which the plaintiff seeks to enforce was incurred by virtue of the law of Tennessee. The law of contributory negligence, as adjudged in this state, cannot be applied so as to alter or affect the right of action which arose in Tennessee.

For these reasons the judgment is affirmed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

SHEPARD & MORSE LUMBER COMPANY

v.

Albert R. ELDRIDGE.

(.....Mass.....)

1. Negligence of the holder of an undorsed check payable to his own order, in intrusting it to a clerk who, he might have known by the exercise of due care, was dishonest, and who put it in circulation by forging an indorsement thereon, does not deprive the holder of his remedy against the drawer.
2. The fact that checks are taken in absolute extinguishment of debts does not relieve the drawer from his legal obligations to the payee as drawer, when the checks have been stolen from the payee and collected upon a forged indorsement.
3. A payee of checks is not charged with knowledge that they have been stolen or embezzled and collected upon forged indorsements by his clerk, either because the clerk had that knowledge, or because the means of such knowledge were in books of account from which the discovery would have been made if monthly trial balances had been made by an honest clerk.
4. Notice of the loss of a check which has been stolen and collected upon a forged indorsement is not required to be given by the payee to the drawer and drawee or to the public, if he is honestly ignorant of the facts, and incorrectly, but honestly, assumes that the check has been collected in the regular course of business.
5. The receipting of subsequent bills without mention of previous checks does not estop the payee, who took the checks as payment, from setting up the forgery of indorsements thereon and collecting them, if it was not done with the intent to mislead, or with any expectation or reason to believe that the drawer would in consequence thereof do or omit to do anything with reference to the checks.
6. A payee of a check which is stolen from him and put in circulation by forgery is estopped from collecting the check, if, with knowledge of these facts, he misleads the drawer to his prejudice, and thereby places him in a worse position than he otherwise would be in with reference to the assertion or protection of his rights, resulting from what has been done with the check.
7. The situation of the drawer of checks who has paid them on forged indorse- ments of the payee's name, and holds them as vouchers, is changed to his prejudice so as to estop the payee from collecting them, when the latter has procured them as paid checks without giving notice of his intent to collect them, though stating that the indorsements are forged,—especially when in consequence of this the drawer does not give immediate notice to the drawee of the forgery.

(June 20, 1896.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of an action to enforce the drawer's liability on a check, which resulted in a verdict in plaintiff's favor. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. L. S. Dabney and H. P. Harriman, for defendant:

If the plaintiff had actual knowledge in February, 1895, that the check mentioned in the first count had been taken from it, indorsed and collected by Fowle without authority and with this knowledge remained silent until February, 1896, such conduct would either have amounted to an adoption or ratification of the indorsement, or would have estopped the plaintiff from disputing the payment made by the Wareham Bank; and the same is true if it had actual knowledge in August, 1895, of the appropriation by Fowle of the check described in the second count, and with that knowledge remained silent until February 10, 1896.

Foster v. Rockwell, 104 Mass. 167; Leather Mfrs. Bank v. Morgan, 117 U. S. 96, 29 L. ed. 811; Metcalf v. Williams, 144 Mass. 452.

The plaintiff was the payee of the checks of which the defendant was the maker; and these checks came to the possession of Fowle, and he was thereby enabled to perpetrate the fraud, which he did perpetrate if the indorsement and collection of them was unauthorized, by the act of the plaintiff in intrusting him with the possession of the checks.

Putnam v. Sullivan, 4 Mass. 45, 3 Am. Dec. 206; Wade v. Wilmington, 1 Allen, 561; Belknap v. National Bank, 100 Mass. 376, 97 Am. Dec. 105.

The defendant had a right to believe and to rely upon the belief that the plaintiff's business would be conducted with ordinary prudence and under ordinary safeguards; and that if so conducted checks which had duly come to its possession and had been by it intrusted to its clerks, could not be lost or stolen from it and the loss remain undiscovered for many months.

Leather Mfrs. Bank v. Morgan, 117 U. S. 96, 29 L. ed. 811.

The plaintiff owed a duty to one who was its regular customer, and was the drawer of the checks of which it was payee,—one to whom its authorized receipts had been thus sent,—to so conduct its business, and to use ordinary care in availing itself of the means and information in its possession, to ascertain whether said checks were duly collected for its account, and was bound to know it at any time when, by the use of ordinary care, it had the means of knowledge in its possession.

Heaven v. Pender, L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. 503; Ingham v. Primrose, 7 C. B. N. S. 82.

If actual knowledge of the appropriation of the checks would have cast upon the plaintiff the obligation of promptly repudiating the indorsements if unauthorized, it is difficult to see upon what principle means of knowledge shall not have the same effect. Means of knowledge where knowledge is material is ordinarily regarded by the law as the equivalent of actual knowledge.

Dana v. National Bank of the Republic, 132 Mass. 156; Leather Mfrs. Bank v. Morgan, 117 U. S. 96, 29 L. ed. 811; Coles v. Bank of England, 10 Ad. & El. 487; Phosphate of Lime Co. v. Green, L. R. 7 C. P. 43; Combs v. Scott, 12 Allen, 493; Murray v. C. N. Nelson Lumber Co. 143 Mass. 250; Dole Bros. Co. v. Cosmopolitan Preserving Co. 167 Mass. 481.

Taken in connection with the evidence, which the court rejected, of the means of knowledge all the time in the plaintiff's possession, and of the warnings to its treasurer, the extent and amount of Fowle's takings would be evidence from which the plaintiff's knowledge can be inferred.

Bragg v. Boston & W. R. Corp. 9 Allen, 54; Harrod v. McDaniels, 126 Mass. 418.

Delay in giving notice to the defendant is a conclusive adoption and ratification, so far as he is concerned, of Fowle's indorsements in the name of the plaintiff, and constitutes a complete estoppel.

Charles River Nat. Bank v. Davis, 100 Mass. 418; Harrod v. McDaniels, 126 Mass. 418; Traders' Nat. Bank v. Rogers, 167 Mass. 315, 36 L. R. A. 589.

Where one of two innocent parties is to bear a loss it must fall on him who employed a dishonest agent and carelessly furnished him with the means of committing the fraud.

The defendant has been deceived and defrauded by an abuse of the confidence which the plaintiff reposed in Fowle, when it allowed the check to come into his possession without precautions to see that it was not diverted from the plaintiff's use; to see that it was restored to the treasurer for proper indorsement; or to see that it was duly deposited to the plaintiff's credit, or collected for the plaintiff's benefit. It was not delivered over to Fowle unaccompanied by any trust or confidence.

Messrs. W. C. Loring and Clapp & Glover for plaintiff.

Barker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff sues upon two checks drawn by the defendant upon his banker,—one for $446.24, dated January 25, 1895; the other for $561.97, dated July 20, 1895. Both were written to the plaintiff's order, and were mailed by the defendant to the plaintiff, in payment of bills for goods bought by the defendant of the plaintiff. Each check was duly received by the plaintiff, and the bills for which the checks were sent in payment were duly receipted by the plaintiff, and returned to the defendant,—one on January 26, 1895, and the other on July 24, 1895. The check of January 25, 1895, was presented at the bank on which it was drawn on January 30, 1895. It then purported to bear the indorsement of the plaintiff and other indorsements, one of which was that of the cashier of the Merchants' National Bank of New Bedford, by which it was presented; and on that day the amount of the check was paid by the National Bank of Wareham, on which it was drawn, to the Merchants' National Bank of New Bedford, and the same amount was charged to the defendant's account by the National Bank of Wareham. This check was returned to the defendant by his bank on June 25, 1895, and remained in his possession until January 30, 1896. The check of July 20, 1895, was drawn upon the National Bank of Wareham, and was presented to that bank on July 29, 1895, purporting to bear the plaintiff's indorsement and other indorsements, one of which was that of the cashier of the Merchants' National Bank of New Bedford; and on that day the amount of the check was paid by the National Bank of Wareham to the Merchants' National Bank of New Bedford, and was charged to the defendant's account by the National Bank of Wareham, and this check was returned by that bank to the defendant on November 29, 1895, and remained in this possession until January 30, 1896. The evidence tended to show that the indorsements purporting to be those of the plaintiff upon these checks when they were paid by the Wareham National Bank were forgeries, made by a clerk in the employment of the plaintiff, which clerk had feloniously converted the checks to his own use, had forged upon them the plaintiff's indorsements, and had deposited the checks with the forged indorsements to his own credit in the Old Colony Trust Company, by which they were collected of the Wareham National Bank through the Merchants' National Bank of New Bedford. It appeared that the plaintiff, on January 29, 1896, was informed of these forgeries, and of the misappropriation by its clerk of these checks. Thereupon the plaintiff sent one Gray to the defendant to procure the checks, and the defendant handed them to Gray on January 30, 1896, under circumstances which the defendant offered to show, but evidence of which was excluded. On the same day or the next day, the plaintiff notified the indors-

ers of the checks that the plaintiff's indorsements upon them were forgeries. The plaintiff gave no such notice to the National Bank of Wareham, and no other notice except the oral statements of Gray made in obtaining the checks from the defendant on January 30, 1896, was given by the plaintiff to the defendant until February 10, 1896, when the plaintiff wrote to the defendant a letter which stated that the checks bore forged indorsements of the plaintiff. On February 12, 1896, the plaintiff indorsed the checks upon allonges, and forwarded them to its bankers for collection from the Wareham National Bank. Payment was refused by that bank, and the checks were protested by a notary public for nonpayment on February 14, 1896, after which his suit was brought upon them by the plaintiff, the payee, against the defendant, the drawer of the checks. The National Bank of Wareham is solvent. The case was tried by a judge of the superior court without a jury, and, after a finding for the plaintiff, the defendant's exceptions are before us for consideration. It appears from the bill of exceptions that at the trial much evidence was admitted de bene which was afterwards stricken out at the plaintiff's request, and also that much evidence offered by the defendant was excluded. Two findings of specific facts were made in connection with the refusal of the court to give rulings asked by the defendant at the close of the evidence. The questions for decision will be better understood after a statement of the facts which the evidence introduced or offered tended to prove in addition to those already recited.

The plaintiff is a dealer in lumber, with its place of business in Boston. The defendant is a dealer in lumber, with his place of business in Bourne. The defendant had been dealing with the plaintiff for some ten years, buying lumber of the plaintiff once in three or four months. When he bought lumber, the plaintiff sent him a bill, and he usually paid it by mailing back the bill with a check for the amount. A receipted bill was then returned to him, in which payment was usually acknowledged for the plaintiff by Harry M. Fowle, who had authority so to do, and who was the clerk who forged the plaintiff's indorsements upon the checks in suit, and converted them to his own use. Fowle entered the plaintiff's employment in January, 1889, at the age of seventeen or eighteen in answer to an advertisement, and was set to do office boy's work. In 1893, when twenty-one years old, he became the ledger clerk, and so continued until his arrest, in January, 1896. There were ten or more persons in the plaintiff's office, including its president, treasurer, and directors. Its treasurer was H. B. Shepard, and its cashier was H. S. Shepard, who took care of the money, kept the cash accounts, and made entries on the cash books. Fowle's duties were to receive and open letters, look over checks, statements, and settlements of accounts as they came in, and see that they were proper and in accordance with the ledger, to receipt and return to customers their paid bills, to post the ledger, and to take off trial balances. Accounts of the plaintiff's business were kept in ledgers, cash book, bill books, journals, and check books, and a trial balance which was taken by Fowle each month of the business of the last preceding month. The treasurer had his desk in the office, and at his pleasure had access to all the books, and he occasionally examined the books and the trial balances. The letters received were often opened by Fowle, and, when not opened by him, those which contained checks in payment for merchandise were placed with the bills upon his desk, for him to examine the bills and the ledger with the checks, and see if the proper settlement had been made, and to receipt the bills, and return them receipted to the customers. It was Fowle's duty after the examination to pass the checks to the cashier, and at the close of the day to give him a list of the payments; and this course of business was known to the treasurer, and was pursued with the authority and assent of the plaintiff.

The checks sued upon, with the accompanying bills, were received by mail at the office, each within a day or two after its date, and, in the usual course of business, were placed upon Fowle's desk, and intrusted to him for the usual examinations, and to be thereafter handed to the cashier as usual. A receipted bill for the payment by each of these checks was sent to the defendant, the acknowledgment of payment being stamped upon the bill with a stamp furnished for that purpose by the plaintiff, and which Fowle had authority to use in receipting bills. The plaintiff's name, as it appears in the forged indorsements, was stamped upon the backs of the checks with a stamp which the plaintiff provided to be used in making indorsements, and which was kept with other stamps in the office in the cashier's desk. The words, "H. B. Shepard, Treas.," following the plaintiff's name in the indorsements, were written by Fowle. He also sometimes stamped the checks which were to be deposited by the plaintiff with a stamp provided by the plaintiff, and to which Fowle had access, and which stamped on them the words, "For deposit only, to the credit of the Shepard & Morse Lumber Company." After the receipt by the plaintiff of the check of January 25, 1895, and the return to the defendant of the receipted bill acknowledging payment, and before the giving of the check of July 20, 1895, the defendant bought of the plaintiff two other invoices of lumber, and paid for them in the same way, with his checks mailed to the plaintiff with the bills which had been sent out by the plaintiff; and neither of these bills contained any reference to any other unpaid bill, and he received in due course receipts acknowledging the payment of both of the intervening bills. The two bills for which the checks sued upon were given appeared by the plaintiff's ledger to have been paid, and in each instance the amount of the check was credited to the defendant in the ledger account in Fowle's handwriting, with a reference in each instance to a page which should have been a page of the cash book, but the cash book had no corresponding item. An examination of the books after the credit of the check of January 25, 1895, to the defendant's account in the ledger, would have shown that no such payment appeared upon the cash book. The trial balance made by Fowle at the end of January, 1895, was forced by him by omitting from the entry of sundries credited to merchandise on January 31, a sum equal to the amount of the check. If this trial balance had been made up by an honest clerk, the loss of the check of January 25, 1895, would have been discovered; and in like manner, if the plaintiff's trial balance for July, 1895, had been made up by an honest clerk, the loss of the check of July 20, 1895, would have been discovered in August, 1895. Fowle had been defrauding the plaintiff for two or three years before January, 1896, by taking checks sent in by its customers in payment, falsely indorsing them as he indorsed the checks in suit, collecting them for his own benefit, and concealing these frauds by crediting the checks upon the ledger to the persons who sent them in payment, deducting the amounts from the monthly credits to merchandise, and forcing the trial balances, so that, if the monthly trial balances made before January, 1895, had been made by an honest clerk, the stealings of Fowle would have been discovered before that time. During the same period he had defrauded the plaintiffs in other ways. The whole amount which he had taken from the plaintiff, by misappropriating about one hundred checks of customers, was more than $40,000. He kept a complete list of all the checks and money which he had taken. From some time in 1893 he had a deposit with the Old Colony Trust Company, and he deposited to his credit in that account the checks in suit, and also most of the other checks belonging to the plaintiff, and payable to its order, on which he forged its indorsement, and which he converted to his own use in a similar way. He also deposited to his own credit, in the same account, from time to time, other funds; and from time to time he drew checks upon the Old Colony Trust Company against this account. Through February and March and August and September, 1895, he had money to his credit on deposit in the Old Colony Trust Company, and also in January, 1896.

In December, 1895, and two or three times before that, the plaintiff's treasurer had its attention called to the fact that Fowle was spending more than his salary; and, in consequence, the treasurer, in December, 1895, looked over the journal and the ledger to some extent, but he made no other examination of the books, and had no one else make any examination. On January 27, 1896, the plaintiff's treasurer was told by one of the plaintiff's clerks that Fowle had deposited to his own credit in the Old Colony Trust Company checks payable to the plaintiff's order. The treasurer thereupon ascertained from the trust company that Fowle had deposited with it such checks, and requested the trust company to have the banks upon which the checks were drawn return to them, so that he could see the indorsements. He then consulted an attorney. Fowle owed the plaintiff a bill for lumber; and on January 28, 1896, the plaintiff, through its treasurer, took from Fowle a check for $193.20, upon the Old Colony Trust Company, in payment of the lumber bill, which was for lumber used in building a house of Fowle, in Clifton. This check was paid by the trust company on January 29, 1896. On that day, Fowle was arrested at the instance of the plaintiff; and upon that day he gave to the plaintiff's treasurer a complete list of all the plaintiff's checks which he had misappropriated by forgery, including the checks now in suit. On the same day, the plaintiff brought suit against Fowle in an action of tort or contract, in which the damages were laid at $10,000; and, on the writ, real estate belonging to Fowle was attached. The declaration was for money obtained by false pretenses, or wrongfully taken or embezzled, but did not include the checks now in suit. A judgment for the plaintiff had been entered in the suit, upon which execution has issued. Before Fowle's arrest, and after the plaintiff's treasurer knew that checks payable to the plaintiff's order had been deposited by Fowle to his own credit in the Old Colony Trust Company, another check drawn for $140 by Fowle upon that company was, on January 29, 1896, with the consent of the plaintiff, paid by the Old Colony Trust Company, and charged against Fowle's deposit. On the same day, after obtaining from Fowle the full list of misappropriated checks, including the checks in suit, the plaintiff sent one Gray to the defendant to obtain the checks in suit. Gray got them and brought them to the plaintiff's treasurer, on January 30 or 31. To obtain the checks, Gray told the defendant that the plaintiff wanted the two checks to see whether the indorsements were forgeries. The defendant, after finding the checks among the vouchers returned from his bank, said he did not think they were forgeries, that the signatures looked like Mr. Shepard's; and the defendant got out some letters with Mr. Shepard's signature, and compared them, and thought the indorsements were not forgeries, and so stated. Gray asked to have the checks, telling the defendant that the purpose for which he wanted them was for a prosecution for forgery, and that, if they turned out to be forged, no harm should come to the defendant in letting them go out of his possession. On the faith of these assurances, and on the further statement of Gray that the checks should be returned to the defendant when the prosecution for forgery should be finished, and on the faith of a written receipt, the defendant allowed Gray to take the checks. The receipt was of the following tenor:

Bourne, Mass., Jan. 30, 1896.

Received of A. R. Eldridge paid checks, no number, dated Jan. 25th and July 20, 1895, amounting to $446.24 and $561.97, respectively. To be returned when the case is finished.
Shepard & Morse L. Co., per Geo. F. Gray."

When the plaintiff's treasurer, on January 30 or 31, got these checks from Gray, he immediately saw that the indorsements of his signature thereon were forgeries; and he immediately gave notice to all the indorsers except Fowle that those indorsements were forgeries, but he gave no notice at that time to the National Bank of Wareham, and he gave no notice to the defendant until February 10, 1896, when he sent a letter of the following tenor:

Boston, February 10, 1896.

Mr. A. R. Eldridge, Bourne, Mass. —

Dear Sir: The Shepard & Morse Lumber Company desires to acknowledge the receipt from your concern of the following checks, drawn by you on the National Bank of Wareham, Mass., payable to the order of the Shepard & Morse Lumber Company, and all bearing forged indorsements 'Shepard & Morse Lumber Co., H. B. Shepard, Treas.': Date Jan. 25, 1895, amount $446.24; date July 20, 1895, amount $561.97.

Shepard & Morse Lumber Co.,
by H. B. Shepard, Treas.

The first notice of the forgeries which is shown to have been given to the Wareham National Bank is that which was contained in the plaintiff's indorsements upon the allonges, stating that the checks were for the first time indorsed by the Shepard & Morse Lumber Company by those indorsements, dated February 12, 1896, and that no prior indorsements were recognized, which allonges annexed to the checks were presented to the Wareham Bank on February 14, 1896, when payment of the checks was demanded and refused. Besides his pay from the plaintiff, which was $20 a week, and his deposit in the Old Colony Trust Company, Fowle had other property. Soon after he became the ledger clerk, he told the plaintiff's treasurer that he had inherited considerable property from his father, who had been a partner in Fowle, Torrey & Co., carpet dealers in Boston, and that he was not obliged to work. In December, 1895, the treasurer, after hearing that Fowle was spending more than his salary, inquired of a gentleman who might be supposed to know how much Fowle had inherited from his father. The reply was that Fowle did inherit, but that the gentleman did not know how much; that he judged from his style of living that he had inherited considerable property, but did not know or have any means of knowing how much; and the treasurer made no further inquiry. On February 10, 1896, Fowle was absolutely insolvent, and has been so ever since.

The evidence offered by the defendant to prove many of the facts above recited was excluded at the trial, and, at the close of the evidence, so much of it as had been admitted de bene, and tended to prove lavish expenditure on the part of Fowle, and to show the extent of the plaintiff's losses by Fowle's depredations, was stricken out. The defendant's requests for rulings, however, were framed as if all the evidence were in; and, in refusing them, the judge made two special findings of fact, which were, in substance, that the defendant's position had not been changed to his prejudice after the misappropriation of the checks by Fowle, and that Fowle was not permitted by the plaintiff's negligence to obtain payment of either check. The requests for rulings were, in substance, that the plaintiff could not maintain the action; that the plaintiff's neglect, after the discovery of the forgery of the indorsements, to give notice of the same to the defendant until February 10, was an unreasonable delay, which of itself discharged the defendant; that it was an unreasonable delay, which discharged the defendant if his position had in the meantime been changed to his prejudice; that the assurances given by the plaintiff through Gray on January 30, 1896, to induce the defendant to give up the checks then in his possession, and the receipt then given by Gray, are an adoption and ratification of the indorsements and of the payment of the checks thereon, so that the defendant cannot be held liable on the checks; also, that those assurances and the receipt estop the plaintiff from maintaining the action if the defendant's position was changed to his prejudice by giving up the checks; and that his position was so changed. There were also requests with reference to the trial balances for February and July, 1896, to the effect that if the examination of the books for making up the trial balances would have disclosed to an honest clerk the loss of the checks, and brought to the plaintiff's knowledge facts which, by the exercise of due care and diligence, would have disclosed the forgeries, the plaintiff cannot escape the knowledge to be thereby imputed to it, because the examinations and trial balances were made by Fowle; that the plaintiff must be deemed to have had knowledge of the first forgery in February, 1895, and of the second in August, 1895, and cannot recover, because it did not give notice of the forgeries to the defendant at those times, and because of unreasonable delay after those dates in giving notice to the defendant, and because of the delay since those dates, if the defendant's position has been changed to his prejudice. There were also requests to the effect that if Fowle was permitted, by the negligence of the plaintiff, to get possession of the checks, and to obtain payment on them, the plaintiff could not recover, and that if, in the month after each check was given, the plaintiff had means of knowledge that the check had been taken from it, and collected by Fowle, and remained ignorant of those facts by reason of its want of ordinary care, the plaintiff could not recover on the check, and that in those circumstances it could not recover on the check if in the meantime the defendant's position had been altered to his prejudice. There was also a request to the effect that if the plaintiff knew that the defendant was its regular customer, and that he had been buying lumber of it for years, paying for it with his checks sent to the plaintiff by mail, and that Fowle, on the receipt of such checks, was in the habit of receipting the bills, and returning them to the defendant as paid, and that he was authorized so to do; and if the plaintiff knew or had reason to believe that the defendant relied upon the return of the receipts as evidence that his checks had been duly received by the plaintiff, and had been duly honored, and had been collected by it,—it was the plaintiff's duty to take reasonable care of such checks, and to use ordinary care in availing itself of the means of information in its possession to ascertain whether such checks were duly collected for its account, and it was bound to the defendant to know at any time when, by the use of ordinary care, it had the means of knowledge in its possession, that it had lost, without receiving payment, any check so received from the defendant, and at once to inform the defendant thereof, and that a failure so to inform itself and to notify the defendant would discharge him. There were further requests, to the effect that the plaintiff's action in asking for and taking from Fowle the check given by him to the plaintiff on February 28, 1896, after the plaintiff knew that Fowle had deposited to his own credit checks payable to the plaintiff, was a ratification by it of Fowle's appropriation to his own use of the checks, and that the plaintiff's action in requesting the Old Colony Trust Company to pay checks of Fowle's after the plaintiff had such knowledge was such a ratification.

One question for decision is whether the plaintiff can recover if, by its own negligence in the conduct of its business, Fowle was in its employ, and intrusted with the possession of the checks, when ordinary care would have shown the plaintiff that Fowle was dishonest, and had already stolen from it, and collected, by forging the plaintiff's indorsement, many checks previously sent to it by its customers. The finding of fact that Fowle was not permitted by the negligence of the plaintiff to obtain payment of either check does not render this question immaterial, because, if the plaintiff's negligence in this regard was a material consideration, much evidence relevant to it was stricken out or excluded, and the finding made without considering that evidence has no weight. It is apparent that the judge below considered such negligence on the part of the plaintiff wholly immaterial. If it was so, the exclusion of evidence tending to establish it did the defendant no harm; but the finding of fact must be laid one side, and, notwithstanding that finding, we must inquire whether the plaintiff's negligence, if it could be found from the evidence offered, was a defense.

The doctrine of contributory negligence as a defense to actions of tort is now of most frequent application; but we have been referred to no instance in which it has been held applicable to actions upon commercial paper, or even when the holder of such paper sues in tort for its conversion one who has innocently taken it upon a forged indorsement. Nothing could more completely unsettle commercial dealings than to extend that doctrine to suits brought by holders of negotiable paper against other parties thereto. If any change is to be made in the law, looking to the discouragement of negligence on the part of holders of such paper, and to the protection of parties who may be defrauded by the forgery of indorsements, it should be made by the legislature, as in the case of the English statutes as to indorsements of checks and bills upon bankers. See Stat. 16 & 17 Vict. chap. 59, § 19; 45 & 46 Vict. chap. 61, § 60. We are of opinion that the holder of an unindorsed check, payable to his own order, is under no legal obligation to the drawer to exercise care as to how the check shall be kept, or to whom he shall commit its custody, or to see to it that the check shall not be put in circulation by the forgery of his indorsement, so long as he acts honestly, without collusion. Such a holder is not deprived of his remedy against the drawer by merely negligently intrusting such a check to a clerk who, due care would have told him, was dishonest, and thus giving the clerk an opportunity to commit crime. He has the right to assume that his clerk will not commit a crime, and to rest upon the presumption that he has not stolen or forged, and will not do so; and he is under no legal obligation either to the drawer of the check or to the public to see to it that the check is not put in circulation with a forged indorsement. Combs v. Scott, 12 Allen, 493, 497; Belknap v. National Bank, 100 Mass. 376, 97 Am. Dec. 105; Greenfield Sav. Bank v. Stowell, 123 Mass. 196, 25 Am. Rep. 67; Mackintosh v. Elliot Nat. Bank, 123 Mass. 393, 395; Mount Morris Bank v. Gorham, 169 Mass. 519, 521; Patent Safety Gun Cotton Co. v. Wilson, 49 L. J. N. S. 713; Société Générale v. Metropolitan Bank, 27 L. T. N. S. 849, 858; Scholfield v. Lonsborough [1896] A. C. 514; Bank of Ireland v. Evans's Charities, 5 H. L. Cas. 339; Ogden v. Benas, L. R. 9 C. P. 513; Fine Art Society v. Union Bank, L. R. 17 Q. B. Div. 705; Swan v. North British Australasian Co. 2 Hurlst. & C. 175, 189; Arnold v. Cheque Bank, L. R. 1 C. P. Div. 578, 586, 588.

Such a holder of a negotiable check is under no other legal obligations with reference to it than those which rest upon any holder of commercial paper completed and put in circulation by the maker. If the check is stolen from him, and put in circulation, by means of the forgery of his indorsement, he is not answerable, as is one who intrusts to another his signature or indorsement in blank, with authority to use it in making or giving currency to negotiable paper. The doctrine of Putnam v. Sullivan, 4 Mass. 45, 8 Am. Dec. 206; and of Young v. Grote, 4 Bing. 253, does not apply, and it cannot properly be extended to the case of a completed check already in circulation, and intrusted by the holder to a clerk for purposes which neither give nor imply any authority to pass it on to another holder, nor give the clerk any power to do so without the commission of a crime.

It is not necessary now to determine whether the debts for which the checks were given were extinguished. If the checks were taken by the plaintiff in absolute extinguishment of the debts that circumstance could not relieve the drawer from his legal obligations as drawer. While the drawer has done his duty, and it is through no fault of his that the payee does not get his money if the check is stolen from him and collected upon a forged indorsement, that does not furnish a sufficient reason why the loss should remain upon the payee, rather than the drawer. The check was received in payment, and the debt extinguished only in consideration of the drawer's obligation as drawer, and of the payee's rights as holder, which included the right of recourse to the drawer if, upon proper indorsement and due demand, the check should not be paid by the drawee. Although there are intimations in support of the theory that cases like the present are instances in which, as to two innocent parties, losses are to be left where they fall, we think the rights of the present parties must be worked out by considering the usual rights of the drawer and drawee of a check given in a commercial transaction. See Thomson v. Bank of British N. A. 82 N. Y. 8; Morse, Banks & Banking, § 395.

The fact that the defendant had been in the habit of buying goods of the plaintiff for ten years, and of making payment by checks, imposed no liability upon the plaintiff as to the methods in which its own business should be conducted, or as to what clerks it should employ. So far as these checks are concerned, its obligations to the defendant were merely those defined by the law of negotiable paper, and did not include the duty of taking care that the checks should not be stolen or its indorsement forged.

Nor do we think that the plaintiff is to be charged with the knowledge that the checks had been stolen or embezzled and collected upon its forged indorsements, either because Fowle, its clerk, had that knowledge, or because the means of knowledge existed in the plaintiff's books of account, so that the plaintiff would have made the discovery if its monthly trial balances had been made by an honest clerk. The loss of the checks to the plaintiff was not in fact known to it until Fowle's arrest, on January 29, 1896, and, as to all other parties to the checks, they were never lost checks. One was paid in four days, and the other in nine days, after its date; and they were thenceforth in the custody of the drawee or drawer. Assuming that the owner of a check which he knows to be lost is under a duty to give to the public and to the parties to the check immediate notice of the loss, we see no reason for holding that one who has become the holder of a check is under a duty to give notice to the drawer and the drawee or to the public as of a lost check if the check is in fact stolen and collected upon a forged indorsement, and he remains honestly ignorant of those facts, and incorrectly, but honestly, assumes that it has been collected in the regular course of his business. Unless the plaintiff was under a duty to give notice as of a lost check, there was no duty to anyone connected with the checks which required the plaintiff to examine its books of account, or to make trial balances, or to discover by any means what had become of the checks. Assuming that, if such a duty towards other parties had rested upon the plaintiff, it would be chargeable with the knowledge which Fowle had, or which would have been acquired by the making of the trial balances by an honest clerk, or by an examination of the plaintiff's books by its officers, as the depositor was chargeable with the knowledge of his dishonest clerk to whom he intrusted the examination of returned checks in Dana v. National Bank of the Republic, 132 Mass. 156, since no such duty to others rested upon the plaintiff, it is not to be charged with knowledge which it did not in fact have. Fowle was himself defrauding the plaintiff in forging the plaintiff's indorsement and collecting the checks for his own use, and therefore his own knowledge of the fraud acquired in its perpetration is not to be imputed to the plaintiff. Indian Head Nat. Bank v. Clark, 166 Mass. 27, and cases cited. Nor is this contended. And, as the examinations of the books in making the trial balances were not made in the performance of a duty owed by the plaintiff to any other party, the knowledge of the agent who made those examinations is not to be imputed to the plaintiff, nor is it to be charged with the information which its means of knowledge disclosed, it not being wilfully ignorant, nor having purposely neglected to use the means of knowledge within its power. Combs v. Scott, 12 Allen, 493, 497.

As the plaintiff cannot properly be charged with imputed knowledge that Fowle was indorsing with its name these checks or any of the other checks which he stole or embezzled and collected by forging its indorsement, we find nothing in what occurred until the plaintiff obtained actual knowledge of the frauds to work an actual or implied adoption or ratification of Fowle's acts in indorsing the checks with the plaintiff's name, or in collecting them. The want of actual knowledge is fatal. Combs v. Scott, 12 Allen, 493; Murray v. C. N. Nelson Lumber Co. 148 Mass. 250; Dole Bros. Co. v. Cosmopolitan Preserving Co. 167 Mass. 481. The receipting of subsequent bills by the plaintiff without informing the defendant that the debts for which these checks were given had not been extinguished was not an act intended or designed to convey to the defendant any representation as to what had become of the checks in suit, and could not justify the defendant in his inference that the checks had been collected by the plaintiff, so as to estop the plaintiff from showing the truth. The receipting of subsequent bills without mention of the previous checks was not done with the intent to mislead the defendant, nor with any expectation or reason to believe that the defendant would, in consequence of it, do or omit to do anything with reference to the checks now in suit. Stiff v. Ashton, 155 Mass. 180; Lincoln v. Gay, 164 Mass. 537; Traders' Nat. Bank v. Rogers, 167 Mass. 315, 321, 86 L. R. A. 539.

The remaining question is whether what occurred after the actual discovery of the frauds requires us to sustain the defendant's exceptions. It is not necessary for us to consider whether the payee of a check which has been stolen from him, put in circulation by forgery, and paid by the drawee, upon ascertaining those facts should give notice to the maker, and to those who have taken the check as rightfully in circulation, of such facts within the payee's knowledge as are material to the rights and obligations of such persons growing out of their transactions with the check. A majority of the court is of the opinion that a payee who, under such circumstances, misleads the drawer to his prejudice, and thereby places him in a worse position than he would otherwise be in with reference to the assertion or protection of his rights resulting from what has been done with the check, is thereby estopped from maintaining an action against the drawer upon the check, and that for this reason the exceptions should be sustained and the finding for the plaintiff be set aside. It is true that it was found specially that the defendant's position had not been changed to his prejudice; but this finding must be disregarded, because evidence relevant and material to the question was offered by the defendant, and wrongfully excluded, even if the finding was correct upon the evidence admitted, which we do not decide. The evidence offered and excluded to show upon what footing and by what representations and assurances the plaintiff, through Gray, got the checks from the defendant, was material upon the questions whether the plaintiff was estopped, by its own acts done after its discovery of the forgeries, from collecting the checks of the defendant, and whether the plaintiff had adopted as to him the forged indorsements. So, also, the evidence of the plaintiff's acts between its discovery of Fowle's frauds and its demand of the checks from the drawee on February 14, was material in determining whether the defendant had been prejudiced in his rights to recover against the drawee. To say nothing of the plaintiff's omission to notify the defendant of its own purpose to treat the checks as unpaid checks, and to collect them of the defendant, the plaintiff's act in getting the checks from the defendant on January 29 as paid checks was intended by the plaintiff to change the defendant's position, and did change it, by depriving him of the possession of the checks. They had come to the defendant's hands honestly, and as vouchers for charges made against him by the drawee. Even if they had been demanded of him by the plaintiff as its property, the defendant could honestly refuse to give them up, and could honestly at once return them to the drawee, with notice of the facts, and thus save himself from loss by perfecting his right to recover from the drawee the amount of the unauthorized payments which the drawee had charged against him in account. See Northampton Nat. Bank v. Smith, 160 Mass. 281. The enforcement of the defendant's rights against the drawee was not so plain and easy for him without as with the possession of the checks, and the loss of possession itself might have been found a change in his position to his prejudice. Besides this, the plaintiff's act in getting the checks from the defendant as paid checks, without notifying him that the plaintiff claimed them as its own property, and intended to collect them, while at the same time giving the defendant information that the plaintiff's indorsements were forged, would naturally induce the defendant to omit to give information of the forgery to the drawee; and it does not appear that any information was given to the drawee until the checks were demanded again of it, on February 14. The fact that the drawee has always been solvent, and remains solvent, is not the only factor in determining whether the defendant has lost his right against the drawee. See Dana v. National Bank of the Republic, 132 Mass. 156; Leather Mfrs. Bank v. Morgan, 117 U. S. 96, 29 L. ed. 811; Leather Mfrs. Bank v. Merchants' Bank, 128 U. S. 26, 32 L. ed. 842. Without discussing that question, we think the evidence as to what was done by the plaintiff after it knew of the forgeries should have been admitted, and that if it appeared that the plaintiff got the checks from the defendant as paid checks, to be returned to him, and did not properly notify the defendant that the plaintiff claimed the checks as unpaid and as its own property, and that it intended to assert that ownership and collect the checks, a finding for the defendant would be warranted.

Exceptions sustained.

STATE of Nebraska, ex rel. Constantine J. SMYTH, Attorney General, vs.

Frank E. MOORES et al.

(.....Neb.....)

*1. To justify the courts in declaring a statute invalid, it is not essential that it should contravene some express provision of the Constitution. If the act is inhibited by the general scope and purpose of the fundamental law, it is invalid, as though forbidden by the letter of that instrument.

2. The bill of rights of our Constitution is not an enumeration of all the powers reserved to the people of this state. A statute is unconstitutional and void which is repugnant to the rights, expressed or implied, retained by the people.

3. The right of local self-government in cities and towns (i. e. the power of the citizens thereof to govern themselves, as to matters purely local in their nature, through officers of their own selection) existed in this state at the time the present Constitution was framed, and was not surrendered upon the adoption of that instrument, but is vested in the people of the respective municipalities, and the legislature is powerless to take it away.

NOTE.—In respect to the constitutional right of local self-government, the above case goes as far as any that has yet been decided. On this question, 41 L. R. A.

4. The right to maintain a fire department in a city or town is one of the rights vested in the people of municipalities, and is to be exercised by them without legislative interference, except to the extent the lawmaking body may prescribe rules to aid the people of the municipalities in the exercise of such right.

5. The act of the legislature of 1897 (Laws 1897, chap. 10, Comp. The facts sufficiently appear in the opinions.

The people of Omaha have the right by election by themselves, or by appointments by their own locally elected agents, to choose their fire and police commissioners.

Guizot, History of Civilization, Henry's ed. 1877, 153, 167-169.

The whole civil policy is based upon two grand ideas as its foundations and supports; the idea of local self government, and the idea of centralization. The first was borrowed from the tribal customs of the Saxons and other Germanic tribes who invaded western Europe; the second is a heritage from Rome. The one is the safeguard of liberty; the other the source of power—liberty and power, two elements which should enter into every political society.

Judge Dillon (Mun. Corp. vol. 1. 3d ed. pp. 1-72) gives a very learned account of the origin and history of municipal governments.

He says (pp. 26, 27): The power of local government is the distinctive purpose and the distinguishing feature of a municipal corporation proper. A municipal corporation is an investing the people of a place with the local government thereof.

The legislature has the right to delegate legislative powers to municipalities, because that is the common law.

Magna Charta provided: "The city of London shall have all the old liberties and customs, which it hath been used to have. Moreover we will and grant, that all other cities, boroughs, towns, and the barons of the five ports, and all other ports, shall have all their liberties and free customs."

By act of 25 Edw. I. Magna Charta became a part of the common law of England.

The elective franchise or right of liberty or self-government was called by Blackstone, not a part of the natural "right of personal liberty," but a right auxiliary and subordinate to it, although by the English law they were absolutely entitled to it.

Our natural rights under the Declaration of Independence are life, liberty, and property; of which liberty, the right of the people, the electors, to choose their own agents in all national, state, or municipal or local, governments, whether legislative, executive, or judicial, is a part, and of which liberty the people cannot be deprived without due process of law.

Liberty is broad enough in its meaning to include all our political rights.

As respect population and property conditions, there is little difference between each of the colonies at the time of the Declaration of Independence and Omaha of to-day. So that, if self-government was necessary to our fathers of the colonies, it is likewise essential to our happiness.

1 Foster, U. S. Const. 1895, p. 100, says: "The very first thing the settlers did anywhere was to betake themselves to the task of governing themselves. The colonists were of a people whose whole career has been characterized by an insatiable craving after local self-government."

If it be conceded that the legislature has the power to create and the power to abolish local offices (Von Holst, Const. Law of U. S. 823), yet the fixed principle remains that, to whatever degree and in whatever way the legislature does extend or modify a local government, in the creation, abolishing, or changing of its offices and the functions thereof, such extension or modification of its offices and of the functions thereof must be made in a constitutional way, i. e., subject to the political rights of the people of the locality, or, in other words, in a way so that all offices or agencies that are created in a local government shall be filled by the consent, choice, or election of the people residing within the jurisdictional limits of the local government, and so that the functions of those offices shall be performed by the agents of the people, so selected from their own number.

If the word "liberty" is broad enough to secure to a person the right to appoint an agent in all private concerns (Alleyer v. Louisiana, 165 U. S. 578, 589, 41 L. ed. 832, 835; *Ritchie v. The admission by Congress of the people of any territory or foreign state as a state into the Union was and is a direct and positive declaration by Congress that the government created by the new state's Constitution was republican in form, and that its Constitution was not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States, and such decision of Congress is binding on all the national and state courts.

The principle is one that runs through our entire system of government from the road and school district up to the Federal government. The right of cities to govern themselves has been the subject of attack by arbitrary power from a very early period. It appears to have been in one of the abuses complained of by the barons in England prior to the granting of the Great Charter."

The right of local self-government existed prior to the adoption of the Constitution, and was not expressly yielded up (if indeed it could be) or granted to any of the departments of the state government by that Constitution, which, on the contrary, was framed with reference to the then existing local governments, and the right of self government still belongs to the people of the municipalities of the state.

Messrs. W. J. Connell and M. B. Reese for the mayor and city council of Omaha.

Messrs. George A. Day, E. R. Duffe, and J. J. Dunn for Bullard et al.

Norval, J., and Ragan, C., formulated the opinion of the court:

The legislature of this state at its session held in 1897 passed an act incorporating metropolitan cities, and defining, prescribing, and regulating their duties, powers, and government. Laws 1897, chap. 10, Comp. Stat. chap. 12a. Sections 166, 167, of said act follow:

"Sec. 166. In each city of the metropolitan class, there shall be a board of fire and police commissioners, to consist of the mayor, who shall be ex officio chairman of the board, and four electors of the city who shall be appointed by the governor.

"Sec. 167. Immediately on the taking effect of this act, the governor shall appoint for each city governed by this act four commissioners, not more than two of whom shall be of the same political faith or party allegiance, one of whom shall be designated to serve until the first Monday of April, 1898, and one to serve until the first Monday of April, 1899, and one to serve until the first Monday of April, 1900, and one to serve until the first Monday of April, 1901, and on the last Tuesday in March in 1898, and on the same day in each year thereafter, the governor shall appoint one commissioner in each city governed by this act, to take the place of the commissioner whose term of office expires on the first Monday in April following such appointment, and those so appointed to succeed others shall serve for the term of four years following the first Monday in April after their appointment, except where appointments are made to fill vacancies, in which cases those appointed shall serve the remainder of term of the persons whose vacancies they are appointed to fill. Wherever a vacancy shall occur in any board of fire and police commissioners, either by death, resignation, removal from the city, or any other cause, the governor shall appoint a commissioner to fill such vacancy."

Section 168 provides, inter alia: "No person shall be appointed a police commissioner who is engaged in the sale of malt, spirituous, or vinous liquors, or who is engaged in the business of dealing in tobacco or articles manufactured therefrom, or who is an agent for any fire insurance company or companies or interested therein, or in the business of soliciting fire insurance, or who shall have been engaged in any of such callings or business within one year previous to the date of appointment." Section 169 confers upon such board "all powers and duties connected with and incident to the appointment, removal, government, and discipline of the officers and members of the fire and police departments of the city." The board is empowered and required to appoint a chief of the fire department, and such other officers of said department as may be deemed necessary, and to remove such officers, or any of them, whenever the board shall consider and declare such removal necessary for the proper management or discipline, or for the more effective working or service, of said department. The board is given power to employ all necessary firemen and assistants, and it is made its duty to appoint a chief of police, police matron, and such other officers and policemen as may be necessary, to the extent that funds may be provided therefor by the mayor and council. All officers and police of the police department are subject to removal by the board of fire and police commissioners, under such rules and regulations as may be adopted by said board, whenever such removal becomes necessary for the proper management or discipline, or for the more effective working or service, of the police department.

The respondents J. H. Peabody, D. D. Gregory, William C. Bullard, and R. E. L. Herdman were appointed by the governor, under the provisions of said §§ 166 and 167, as members of the board of fire and police commissioners for the city of Omaha; and the respondent Frank E. Moores is the mayor of said city, and by virtue of said act is made a member of said board, and its chairman. The mayor and a majority of the councilmen of the city of Omaha, having assumed to exercise, control, and manage the fire and police departments of said city to the exclusion of any and all acts of the board appointed by the governor, an application by the state, on the relation of the attorney general, was filed in this court for a writ of quo warranto against the respondents named above, and the members of the city council of Omaha, to test the constitutionality of the sections of the said act of 1897 which attempt to confer upon the governor the power to appoint four members of the board of fire and police commissioners for each city of the metropolitan class. To this application the appointees of the executive answered, setting up their respective appointments as members of said board, and their subsequent qualifications; and the mayor and council also filed an answer alleging their right, power, and authority to provide for the appointment of the members of the board of fire and police commissioners of said city of Omaha, to exercise, control, and manage the fire and police departments of said city, and control and direct in all respects said departments, and that Peter W. Birkhouser, Charles J. Kurbach, Mathew H. Collins, and Victor H. Coffman have been, under and in pursuance of an ordinance of the city of Omaha, appointed by the mayor of said city, and confirmed by a majority of the council thereof, as members of said board of fire and police commissioners of said city, and have qualified as such. The said appointees of the mayor and council have intervened, and filed an answer and cross application of information, setting up their respective claims to the office in question, and that the said act of 1897 is unconstitutional and void. The attorney general has filed a general demurrer to the answer of the respondents, as well as to the answer and cross application of the interveners, and the interveners have demurred to the answer of the governor's appointees. The cause has been submitted for judgment on said demurrers.

The validity of the law is assailed on the ground that it is violative of the inherent right of local self-government, by depriving the people of the cities of the metropolitan class from choosing their own officers. There is no express provision in the Constitution of this state which gives municipal corporations the power to select their officers, or to manage their own affairs; nor is there any clause to be found in that instrument which in express terms inhibits the legislature from conferring upon the governor the power to appoint municipal officers to manage and control purely local affairs. If this act is invalid on the ground that the appointing power was placed in the hands of the governor, it is because the law is repugnant to some rights retained by the people at the time of the adoption of the organic law. It is true, the state Constitution is not a grant of legislative power, and the lawmaking body may legislate upon any subject not inhibited by the fundamental law; and it has been so held in Magneau v. Fremont, 80 Neb 848, 9 L. R. A. 786, and numerous other decisions of this court. But it by no means follows from this that the legislature is free to pass laws upon any subject, unless in express terms prohibited by the Constitution. The inhibition on the power of the legislature may be by implication as well as by expression. Laws may be, and have been, declared invalid, although not repugnant to any express restriction contained in fundamental law.

In Von Holst, Const. Law of U. S. p. 271, may be found this apposite language: "Congress has only the powers granted it by the Federal Constitution. The legislative power of the state legislatures, on the contrary, is unlimited, as far as no limits are set to it by the Federal or the state Constitution. This does not mean, however, that these restrictions must always be expressed in explicit words. As it is generally admitted that the factors of the Federal government have certain 'implied powers,' so it has never been disputed that the state legislatures are subject to 'implied restrictions', that is, restrictions which must be deduced from certain provisions of the Federal or state Constitution, or that arise from the political nature of the Union, from the genius of American public institutions," etc.

Judge Cooley, in his valuable work on Constitutional Limitations, 5th ed. p. 208, uses this language: "It does not follow, however, that in every case the courts, before they can set aside a law as invalid, must be able to find in the Constitution some specific inhibition which has been disregarded, or some express command which has been disobeyed. Prohibitions are only important where they are in the nature of exceptions to a general grant of power; and if the authority to do an act has not been granted by the sovereign to its representative, it cannot be necessary to prohibit its being done."

In Mechem, Pub. Off. § 123, it is said: "Indeed, this right of local self government, as it has been briefly termed, is held to be an established feature and incident of our political sys tem, and it is not within the power of the legislature of a state to permanently fill by appointment the local offices established by law for purely local purposes."

In Cincinnati W. & Z. R. Co. v. Clinton County Comrs. 1 Ohio St. 77, the court says: "But, as the general assembly, like the other departments of government, exercises only delegated authority, it cannot be doubted that any act passed by it, not falling fairly within the scope of legislative power, is clearly void, as though expressly prohibited. And we agree, entirely, with the supreme court of Pennsylvania in Parker v. Com. 6 Pa. 511, 47 Am. Dec. 480, that 'it is this species of insidious infraction that is more to be feared and guarded against, than direct attacks upon any particular principle proclaimed as a part of the primordial law; for attempts of the latter description will generally be met by instant reprobation, while the stealthy and frequently seductive character of the former is apt to escape detection until the innovation is made manifest by the infiction of some startling wrong.' It is not my purpose to point out the numerous cases in which a legislative act might be avoided, as transcending the limits of the powers delegated to that body, although not expressly prohibited. The attempted exercise of executive or judicial power, delegated to the other departments, will very readily suggest many instances, while many others may be easily imagined, of encroachments upon reserved rights, not surrendered to any department of the government. From these considerations, it follows that it is always legitimate to insist that any legislative enactment drawn in question is void, either because it does not fall within the general grant of power to that body, or because it is expressly prohibited by some provision of the Constitution."

In People, Bolton, v. Albertain, 55 N. Y. 50, it was said: "A written Constitution must be interpreted, and effect given to it as the paramount law of the land, equally obligatory upon the legislature as upon other departments of government and individual citizens, according to its spirit and the intent of its framers, as indicated by its terms. An act violating the true intent and meaning of the instrument, although not within the letter, is as much within the purview and effect, of a prohibition as if within the strict letter; and an act in evasion of the terms of the Constitution, as properly interpreted and understood, and frustrating its general and clearly expressed or necessarily implied purpose, is as clearly void as if in express terms forbidden. A thing within the intent of a Constitution or statutory enactment is, for all purposes, to be regarded as within the words and terms of the law. A written Constitution would be of little avail as a practical and useful restraint upon the different departments of government if a literal reading only was to be given it, to the exclusion of all necessary implication, and the clear intent ignored, and slight evasions or acts, palpably in evasion of its spirit, should be sustained as not repugnant to it."

Justice O'Brien, in Rathbone v. Wirth, 150 N. Y. 459, 34 L. R. A. 408, uses this language: "When the validity of such legislation is brought in question, it is not necessary to show that it falls appropriately within some express written prohibition contained in the Constitution. The implied restraints of the Constitution upon legislative power may be as effectual for its condemnation as the written words, and such restraints may be found either in the language employed, or in the evident purpose which was in view, and the circumstances and historical events which led to the enactment of the particular provision as a part of the organic law."

In People v. Morris, 18 Wend. 825, Justice Nelson said: "The only limitation to the powers of the legislative department that can exist, must be found either in the Constitution of the United States or of this state, or in the natural and inherent rights of the citizens, which they cannot part with, or be deprived of, by the society to which they belong. The latter qualification is undefined, and perhaps undefinable, by any general code having a just regard to the security of these rights. Some of the Constitutions of the states contain a declaration of these powers, and some also declare (and all are, no doubt, so to be understood) that the enumeration shall not be construed as denying or impairing others retained by the people. We have no bill of rights, though many of the principles usually found in such an instrument are incorporated in the provisions of the Constitution. The enumeration was designedly omitted, because unnecessary, and tending to weaken, if not endanger, those unnoticed. The limitation or qualification in this respect must depend upon the enlightened wisdom and discretion of the legislature, and the decisions of the judicial department."

In Rathbone v. Wirth, 6 App. Div. 277, Judge Herrick, speaking of the legislature, observed: "It has the power, subject to the qualified negative of the governor, to pass any law which it may deem necessary for the public good, not inconsistent with the first principles of government, nor contrary to the provisions of the Constitution of this state or of the United States." Burch v. Neubury, 10 N. Y. 874-892. And, in interpreting the power of the legislature under the Constitution, we are not confined to the strict letter of that instrument, or compelled to point out the exact article, section, clause, or phrase therein which grants or denies the power in question. There are some things so contrary to the entire purpose and spirit of the Constitution that they must be said to be in conflict with it although it cannot be contrasted with any specific portion of it. The object of its adoption, and its purpose and intent, taken as a whole, must be considered. . . . What has been called 'the political tendency of the Constitution' may be considered in interpreting it. People, Townsend, v. Porter, 90 N. Y. 75. The full measure and intent of the instrument is not always to be found in its mere letter. To again quote Justice Cooley: 'If we may suppose, for an illustration, that the legislature shall provide that in Detroit any single person may be chosen, in whom may be vested the whole legislative authority of the city, and all other authority pertaining to local government, of every description and nature, not expressly by the Constitution confided to officers speci-ned, it would require unusual boldness in any one who should undertake to defend such a local dictatorship as something within the competency of legislation under a Constitution avowedly framed to guard, protect, and defend the local powers and local liberties.' People, Dunn, v. Detroit Super. Ct. Judges, 29 Mich. 228. To put another illustration under the last clause of § 2 of article 10 of the Constitution, all offices not in existence at the adoption of the Constitution, but that shall thereafter be created by the legislature, may be filled by officers elected by the people, or appointed, as the legislature may direct. Suppose the legislature should see fit to create a new county office, and should provide that, at the general election for the election of state officers, the person for whom the next highest number of ballots should be cast for such office should thereafter discharge the duties thereof. A new office is created, which the legislature has a right to create, and also to determine the method of filling it. There is nowhere any express prohibition against legislation of that character in the Constitution, and yet what man will say that an act of that kind would stand for a moment, not because it is in conflict with an express provision of the Constitution, but because it is repugnant to its whole spirit and intent. . . . The supreme power of the people does not arise from the Constitution, or exist by virtue of it. It existed prior to it. It makes and unmakes Constitutions, but is not made by them. Consequently we are not to look into the Constitution for any grant of power to the people, or any definition of their powers. They possess all that they have not surrendered by the Constitution. One of the primary purposes for the adoption of a written Constitution is the protection of minorities and individuals from the exercise of absolute power. . . . For that purpose the people have yielded up some of their powers, but they retain all that they have not restricted themselves from exercising by the express words of the Constitution, or by necessary implication therefrom."

The legislature of Ohio enacted that certain cities of that state should have a board of police commissioners, to be elected by the voters of the municipality, but that no elector should vote at an election for more than two persons for such commissioners, and the four persons receiving the highest number of votes cast should be declared elected. In State v. Constantine, 42 Ohio St. 437, 51 Am. Rep. 883, it was held that the provision which denied to an elector the right to vote for all the members of the police board was unconstitutional, although the Constitution merely provided that each elector shall be entitled to vote at all elections. The court says: "This implication fairly arises from the language of the Constitution itself, but is made absolutely certain when viewed in the light of circumstances existing at the time of its adoption. No such thing as 'minority representation' or 'cumulative voting' was known in the policy of this state at the time of the adoption of this Constitution in 1851. The right of each elector to vote for a candidate for each office to be filled at an election has never been doubted. No effort was made by the framers of the Constitution to modify this right, and we think it was intended to continue and guarantee such right by the provision that each elector 'shall be entitled to vote at all elections.' See Maynard v. First Presby. Dist. of Kent County Canvassers, 84 Mich. 228, 11 L. R. A. 383. This court, in Low v. Rees Printing Co. 41 Neb. 127, 24 L. R. A. 703, held the act known as the "Eight Hour Law," invalid, on the ground that it denied the right of parties to contract with reference to compensation for services, although no express constitutional provision guaranteed to the individual the right to contract as he pleased. The law was also held bad as class legislation, but the decision was placed as squarely upon the other ground. In West Point Water Power & Land Improv. Co. v. State, Moodie, 49 Neb. 218, it was ruled that the reserved powers of the state are inalienable, and cannot be surrendered or taken away by the legislature.

The first article of our state Constitution expressly enumerates certain rights which the people have reserved to themselves, and manifestly any law passed in violation of such reserved rights would be declared by the courts unconstitutional. It cannot be successfully asserted that the only rights reserved to the people are those enumerated in said article of the Constitution, since § 26 thereof declares: "This enumeration of rights shall not be construed to impair or deny others, retained by the people, and all powers not herein delegated, remain with the people." This language removes all doubt that powers other than those specified in the bill of rights were retained by the people, and any statute enacted in violation of such rights is as clearly invalid as though the same had been expressly forbidden by the fundamental law. Suppose a statute should be enacted providing that a candidate who received the smallest number of votes for a public office shall be declared elected thereto; could it be doubted that such a law would be unconstitutional, notwithstanding it is not in conflict with any express provision of the Constitution? We think not. The right of the majority to govern is as much reserved to the people as though such right had been in apt language expressed in the Constitution. The important question, therefore, is whether the right of the people of municipal corporations to choose their own local officers is one of the powers retained by the people, which the legislature cannot take away. An examination of the various provisions of our Constitution fails to show that the right is not conferred upon the legislature, or any other department of state government, in direct, explicit, and plain language, or impliedly, to deprive municipal corporations of the power to govern themselves by officers of their own selection. On the contrary, it is very evident that the Constitution was framed upon the theory of local self government,—the right of the people to determine for themselves who shall be their officers. It has provided that the state and county officers shall be chosen by the people, and the legislation in this state prior to the adoption of the Constitution invariably recognized the principle of local self-government. The several charters of cities and towns existing when the present Constitution was adopted provided for the selection of municipal officers by the citizens of the municipalities, and it was in 1887 when the legislature of this state first attempted to deprive municipal corporations of the power to choose their local officers. The right of local self-government is not forbidden by the Constitution, while the principle is fully recognized in that instrument, and its framers must have contemplated, that the right, then existing, of municipal corporations to choose their local officers to administer their local affairs, should continue as in the past. This right still exists, and the legislature is powerless to abridge the same or take it away.

In Rathbone v. Wirth, 6 App. Div. 277, we find this discussion of the right of local self-government: "Under our form of government that supreme power is vested in and exercised by the majority, and for all practical purposes the majority are the people. The principle that the majority shall govern lies at the very basis of our government. Among the rights of the majority, as a part of its sovereign power, is the right to select officers, either directly, by election, or indirectly, by authorities or officers whom they have chosen by election.

... This power of the majority to govern, the legislature cannot take from them. The legislature exercises the legislative power of the people; it is their agent for that purpose; but it cannot limit or surrender any of the power or authority of its principals. But it may be said the legislature is composed of the representatives of the people, and that, therefore, their acts are presumed to be the acts of a majority of the people, and that, while this act deprives the majority of the people in one locality of their power, still it is in accordance with the will of the majority of the people of the whole state, and that thereby the principle of majority government is recognized. There would be force in that suggestion if it was not for another principle of our government recognized by our Constitution, and if the people had not by the Constitution limited their power to override the will of a majority in any locality. The principle I refer to is the principle of local self-government.

... Local self-government is the school which fits people for self-government. Local self-government is the result, and also the most efficient preserver, of civil liberty.

... The principle is one that runs through our entire system of government, from the road and school district up to the Federal government.

... Without further continuing this branch of the discussion, suffice it to say that in my opinion the purpose of the bill is obnoxious to the Constitution, as an infringement upon the right of the majority to select their own officers either immediately by election or by their accredited agents, and as destructive of the principle of local self-government."

In Rathbone v. Wirth, 150 N. Y. 459, 84 L. R. A. 408, Mr. Justice Gray, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "I refer to the right of local self-government, a right which inheres in a republican government, and with reference to which our Constitution was framed. The habit of local self-government is something which we took over, or, rather, continued, from the English system of government; and, as Judge Cooley has remarked 41 L. R. A.

with reference to the Constitutions of the states, 'if not expressly recognized, it is still to be understood that all of these instruments are framed with its present existence and anticipated continuance in view.' Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 85. The principle is one which takes but little reflection to convince the mind of being fundamental in our governmental system, and as contributing strength to the national life, in its educational and formative effect upon the citizen. It means that in the local, or political, subdivisions of the state, the people of the locality shall administer their own local affairs, to the extent that that right is not restricted by some constitutional provision. I do not think it can be seriously disputed that the conception of the state is free from the element that it belongs to it to control purely local affairs, and that state interference finds justification only when state policy, or local abuses, demand it. I think that no inference is warranted that other powers have been conferred by the people upon their legislative body than those which are mentioned in the Constitution, or which are necessary to carry into effect those which are expressly given.

... The theory of the Constitution is, that the several counties, cities, towns, and villages are, of right, entitled to choose whom they will have to rule over them; and that this right cannot be taken from them, and the electors and inhabitants disfranchised, by any act of the legislature, or of any or all the departments of the state government combined. This right of self-government lies at the foundation of our institutions, and cannot be disturbed or interfered with, even in respect to the smallest of the divisions into which the state is divided for governmental purposes, without weakening the entire foundation; and hence it is a right, not only to be carefully guarded by every department of the government, but every infraction or evasion of it to be promptly met and condemned, especially by the courts, when such acts become the subject of judicial investigation.' This is strong and significant language. Read in its light, the provision of the act under consideration appears as legislation hostile to that freedom of action which the people of Albany have the right to claim, under the Constitution, in the management of their own affairs."

In People, Le Roy, v. Hurlbut, 24 Mich. 44, 79, 9 Am. Rep. 108, there was involved the validity of an act of the legislature creating a board of public works in the city of Detroit, and providing for the appointment of the officers or members of the board by the legislature. Section 14, art. 15, of the Constitution of Michigan declares: "Judicial officers of cities and villages shall be elected, and all other officers shall be elected or appointed, at such time and in such manner as the legislature shall direct." The law was held invalid, and that permanent appointments for purposes solely municipal can be made alone by municipal authority. Campbell, Ch. J., in his opinion said: "In the litigation now before us there is no acquiescence by the city in the choice of the board of works, or in any part of the legislative action on the subject. We are therefore compelled to consider the plain question whether the state authorities have a right to assume unlimited control of all municipal appointments. Judicial offices the Constitution has distinctly provided for as elective, and they are local in their action, rather than in their nature. But as to other offices the power is plenary, or it does not exist at all. It may as well include every office as any less than all. It may put all the power into the hands of one person, as well as divide it among several, and it may continue it for life as well as for a less period. Life tenure is not rare in municipal offices. The aldermen of London, and probably of many other cities, hold for life. It may create incorporated cities and villages in such numbers as to put the great mass of local administration in the hands of state agents. This is not very likely to happen, but it is just as likely as many other things which it has been thought proper to guard against by constitutional enactment. It is, beyond dispute, directly opposed to the principal design of all our Constitutions; and, if it has not been guarded against, there has been a very great oversight, and the present legislation shows that the danger was not imaginary. But the Constitution is not fairly open to such criticism. We must never forget, in studying its terms, that most of them had a settled meaning before its adoption. Instead of being the source of our laws and liberties, it is, in the main, no more than a recognition and re-enactment of an accepted system. The rights preserved are ancient rights, and the municipal bodies recognized in it, and required to be perpetuated, were already existing, with known elements and functions. They were not towns or counties or cities or villages in the abstract,—or municipalities which had lost all their old liberties by central usurpation, but American and Michigan municipalities of common-law origin, and having no less than common-law franchises. . . . Our Constitution cannot be understood or carried out at all, except on the theory of local self-government, and the intention to preserve it is quite apparent. In every case where provision is made by the Constitution itself for local officers, they are selected by local action. . . . It is impossible to read that document without finding the plainest evidence that every part of the state is to be under some system of localized authority, emanating from the people. This is no mere political theory, but appears in the Constitution as the foundation of all our polity. There is no middle ground. A city has no constitutional safeguards for its people, or it has the right to have all its officers appointed at home. Unless this power is exclusive, the state may manage all city affairs by its own functionaries. The only reasonable meaning of the constitutional clause in question is that, when the legislature has designated the time and manner of appointment or election, the local authority shall fill the offices as so ordained."

Cooley, J., delivered a separate concurring opinion in the same case, so full of sound reason and common sense that we have taken copious excerpts therefrom. He said: "We have before us a legislative act creating for the city of Detroit a new board, which is to exercise a considerable share of the authority usually possessed by officers locally chosen; to have general charge of the city buildings, property, and local conveniences; to make contracts for public works on behalf of the city; and to do many things of a legislative character which generally the common council of cities alone is authorized to do. The legislature has created this board, and it has appointed its members; and both the one and the other have been done under a claim of right which, unless I wholly misunderstand it, would justify that body in taking to itself the entire and exclusive government of the city, and the appointment of all its officers, excepting only the judicial, for which, by the Constitution, other provision is expressly made. And the question, broadly and nakedly stated, can be nothing short of this: Whether local self-government in this state is or is not a mere privilege, conceded by the legislature in its discretion, and which may be withdrawn at any time at pleasure. I state the question thus broadly because, notwithstanding the able arguments made in this case, and after mature deliberation, I can conceive of no argument in support of the legislative authority which will stop short of this plenary and sovereign right. . . . The doctrine that within any general grant of legislative power by the Constitution there can be found authority thus to take from the people the management of their local concerns, and the choice, directly or indirectly, of their local officers, if practically asserted, would be somewhat startling to our people, and would be likely to lead hereafter to a more careful scrutiny of the charters of governments framed by them, lest sometime, by an inadvertent use of words, they might be found to have conferred upon some agency of their own the legal authority to take away their liberties altogether. If we look into the several state Constitutions to see what verbal restrictions have heretofore been placed upon legislative authority in this regard, we shall find them very few and simple. We have taken great pains to surround the life, liberty, and property of the individual with guaranties, but we have not, as a general thing, guarded local government with similar protections. We must assume either an intention that the legislative control should be constant and absolute, or, on the other hand, that there are certain fundamental principles in our general framework of government, which are within the contemplation of the people when they agree upon the written charter, subject to which the delegations of authority to the several departments of government have been made. That this last is the case appears to me too plain for serious controversy. The implied restrictions upon the power of the legislature, as regards local government, though their limits may not be so plainly defined as express provisions might have made them, are nevertheless equally imperative in character; and, whenever we find ourselves clearly within them, we have no alternative but to bow to their authority. The Constitution has been framed with these restrictions in view, and we should fall into the grossest absurdities if we undertook to construe that instrument on a critical examination of the terms employed, while shutting our eyes to all other considerations. The circumstances from which these implications arise are.

First, that the Constitution has been adopted in view of a system of local government, well understood and tolerably uniform in character, existing from the very earliest settlement of the country, never for a moment suspended or displaced, and the continued existence of which is assumed; and, second, that the liberties of the people have generally been supposed to spring from, and be dependent upon, that system. . . . Our traditions, practice, and expectations have all been in one direction. And when we go beyond the general view, to inquire into the details of authority, we find that it has included the power to choose in some form the persons who are to administer the local regulations. Instances to the contrary, except where the power to be administered was properly a state power, have been purely exceptional. . . . In view of these historical facts, and of these general principles, the question recurs whether our state Constitution can be so construed as to confer upon the legislature the power to appoint for the municipalities the officers who are to manage the property, interests, and rights in which their own people alone are concerned. If it can be, it involves these consequences: As there is no provision requiring the legislative interference to be upon any general system, it can and may be partial and purely arbitrary. As there is nothing requiring the persons appointed to be citizens of the locality, they can and may be sent in from abroad; and it is not a remote possibility that self-government of towns may make way for a government by such influences as can force themselves upon the legislative notice at Lansing. As the municipal corporation will have no control, except such as the state may voluntarily give it, as regards the taxes to be levied, the buildings to be constructed, the pavements to be laid, and the conveniences to be supplied, it is inevitable that parties, from mere personal considerations, shall seek the offices, and endeavor to secure from the appointing body, whose members in general are not to feel the burden, a compensation such as would not be awarded by the people who must bear it, though the chief tie binding them to the interests of the people governed might be the salaries paid on the one side and drawn on the other. As the legislature could not be compelled to regard the local political sentiment in its choice, and would, in fact, be most likely to interfere when that sentiment was adverse to its own, the government of cities might be taken to itself by the party for the time being in power; and municipal governments might easily and naturally become the spoils of party, as state and national offices unfortunately are now. All these things are not only possible, but entirely within the range of probability, if the positions assumed on behalf of the state are tenable. It may be said that these would be mere abuses of power, such as may creep in under any system of constitutional freedom; but what is constitutional freedom? Has the administration of equal laws by magistrates freely chosen no necessary place in it? Constitutional freedom certainly does not consist in exemption from governmental interference in the citizen's private affairs; in his being unmolested in his family, suffered to buy, sell, and enjoy property, and generally to seek happiness in his own way. All this might be permitted by the most arbitrary ruler, even though he allowed his subjects no degree of political liberty. The government of an oligarchy may be as just, as respectful of private rights, and as little burdensome, as any other; but, if it were sought to establish such a government over our cities by law, it would hardly do to call upon a protesting people to show where in the Constitution the power to establish it was prohibited. It would be necessary, on the other hand, to point out to them where, and by what unguarded words, the power had been conferred. Some things are too plain to be written. If this charter of state government, which we call a 'constitution,' were all there was of constitutional command; if the usages, the customs, the maxims, that have sprung from the habits of life, modes of thought, methods of trying facts by the neighborhood, and mutual responsibility in neighborhood interests, the precepts which have come from the revolutions which overturned tyrannies, the sentiments of manly independence and self-control which impelled our ancestors to summon the local communities to redress local evils, instead of relying upon King or legislature at a distance to do so,—if a recognition of all these were to be stricken from the body of our constitutional law, a lifeless skeleton might remain; but the living spirit, that which gives it force and attraction, which makes it valuable, and draws to it the affections of the people; that which distinguishes it from the numberless constitutions, so called, which in Europe have been set up and thrown down within the last hundred years, many of which in their expressions, have seemed equally fair and to possess equal promise with ours, and have only been wanting in the support and vitality which these alone can give,—this living and breathing spirit which supplies the interpretation of the words of the written charter, would be utterly lost and gone. . . . The state may mold local institutions according to its views of policy or expediency; but local government is a matter of absolute right, and the state cannot take it away. It would be the boldest mockery to speak of a city as possessing municipal liberty where the state not only shaped its government, but at discretion sent in its own agents to administer it, or to call that system one of constitutional freedom under which it should be equally admissible to allow the people full control in their local affairs, or no control at all. What I say here is with the utmost respect and deference to the legislative department even though the task I am called upon to perform is to give reasons why a blow aimed at the foundation of our structure of liberty should be ward off."

The same doctrine was recognized and applied by the same court in People, Park Comrs., v. Detroit, 28 Mich. 228, 15 Am. Rep. 202. In that case there was under consideration a statute relative to a public park for the city of Detroit, which created a board of park commissioners, and designated six citizens of Detroit as the first members of such board. The act was held invalid because the selection of the park commissioners by the legislature was repugnant to the inherent right of local self-government. The constitutional right of municipal self-government was sustained in People, Atty. Gen. v. Detroit, 29 Mich. 108; People, Park Comrs., v. Detroit, 29 Mich. 843; People, Hubbard, v. Springwells Twp. Board, 25 Mich. 153; Allor v. Wayne County Auditors, 48 Mich. 76; Atty. Gen. v. Detroit, 58 Mich. 213, 55 Am. Rep. 675. By an act of the legislature of Michigan, the governor was empowered to appoint three commissioners to improve a certain highway, and levy the expense on adjacent lands. The law was declared invalid in People, Hubbard, v. Springwells Twp. Board, 25 Mich. 153, as inimical to the fundamental theory of self-government. In Michigan there existed a statute making it the duty of the governor, by appointment, to fill any vacancy in a county office for and during the unexpired portion of the regular term limited to such officer; and in pursuance of said enactment the governor appointed one George C. Lawrence as auditor for the county of Wayne, in the place of William C. Mahoney, deceased. Proceedings in the nature of quo warranto by the attorney general, on the relation of said Lawrence, were instituted in the supreme court to test the right of the latter to said office of county auditor. The validity of the law under which Lawrence was appointed was assailed, and the court said the statute which gave the governor power to fill vacancies in county offices was invalid, since it deprived the electors of the county of the right to choose their own officers. Atty. Gen., Lawrence, v. Trombly, 89 Mich. 50. McGrath, J., speaking for the court, said: "No question is raised as to the legality of his appointment, but respondent insists that the act of 1857 is unconstitutional, as abridging the right of local self-government that the governor's authority under the act of 1878 is limited by implication to provisional appointments, and that the electors of Wayne county had the right to fill the vacancy at the next, or at any subsequent, general election after such vacancy occurred. While the Constitution contains no express verbal restrictions upon the power of the legislature to authorize the governor to make permanent appointments to purely local offices, the principle of local self-government is so deeply imbedded in the groundwork of our system of government that no mere general grant of legislative power can be said to include the authority to take from the people the management of their local concerns, and all delegations of authority to the several departments of government must be deemed to have been made subject to this fundamental principle. This is but a restatement of the doctrine laid down by Justice Cooley, after an able and exhaustive discussion of the question, participated in by all the members of the court in People, Le Roy, v. Hurlbut, 24 Mich. 44, 9 Am. Rep. 103." Judge McGrath, after stating that the correctness of the doctrine enunciated in People, Le Roy, v. Hurlbut, 24 Mich. 44, 9 Am. Rep. 103, has not been since questioned, but approved in numerous cases, which he cites, said: "The act of 1857 is therefore invalid, as the legislature cannot divest the people of the county of Wayne of the right to select their own officers in the usual manner." The Michigan cases referred to in this opinion are in point here, as they were decided under a constitution like our own which contains no express provision limiting the power of the legislature to authorize the governor to appoint purely local officers. The supreme court of Michigan steadfastly denied the power of the legislature to deprive municipal corporations of the right of local self-government, although in People, Drake, v. Mahaney, 18 Mich. 492, that court, in harmony with the principle announced by many courts, approved a law authorizing the selection by the governor of police commissioners for cities; recognizing a distinction between officers whose duties are purely of a local character, and officers, chosen for a particular city or town, whose duties are of a public or general nature, and which concern the state or general public. The former class the legislature may not empower the governor to appoint, while such authority may be conferred upon the executive as to the officers belonging to the latter class.

The legislature of the state of Indiana passed a law (Acts 1889, p. 247) purporting to give control of the streets, alleys, sewers, lights, water supply, etc., in cities containing more than 50,000 inhabitants, to boards of public works appointed by the legislature for residents of the cities affected. This act was under consideration in State, Jameson, v. Denny, 118 Ind. 883, 4 L. R. A. 79, and held to be void, as denying the right of local self-government, although the law contravened no express provision of the Constitution of that state. That decision is planted squarely upon the proposition that the right of the people to govern themselves, as to matters purely local in their nature, through the medium of local municipal officers of their own choosing, was not curtailed by the adoption of the Constitution, but is still vested in them, and the legislature is powerless to take such right away. Coffey, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, observed: "It is perhaps true that the general assembly may at will pass laws regulating the government of towns and cities, taking from them powers which had previously been granted, or adding to those which had previously been given; but we do not think that it can take away from the people of a town or city rights which they possessed, as citizens of the state, before their incorporation. The object of, granting to the people of a city municipal powers is to give them additional rights and powers to better enable them to govern themselves, and not to take away any rights they possessed before such grant was made. It may be true that as to such matters as the state has a peculiar interest in, different from that relating to other communities, it may, by proper legislative action, take control of such interests; but as to such matters as are purely local, and concern only the people of that community, they have the right to control them, subject only to the general laws of the state, which affect all the people of the state alike. The construction of sewers in a city, the supply of gas, water, fire protection, and many other matters that might be mentioned, are matters in which the local community alone is concerned, and in which the state has no special interest, more than it has in the health and prosperity of the people generally; and they are matters over which the people affected thereby have the exclusive control, and it cannot, in our opinion, be taken away from them by the legislature." In the same opinion after speaking of the duties and powers conferred upon the three members of the board provided for by the act, this language is employed: "If the legislature may put these matters in the hands of three men, why not in the hands of one man? And if they may transfer these matters, why may they not transfer others? In other words, the effort is by this act to take from the city all control over the improvements of the city, without the consent of her people, and place it in the hands of the agents of the state chosen by the legislature, and charge the people of the city with the whole expense. We do not think that the people have conferred upon the legislature any such power. It is subversive of all local self-government,—a right that the people did not surrender when they adopted the Constitution. They still retained, after the adoption of that instrument, the right to select their own local officers, and every effort to deprive them of such right must be held to be beyond the power of the legislature. In our opinion the entire act attempting to create a board of public works and affairs for cities having a population of 50,000 or more is in conflict with the Constitution, and is void." Elliott, Ch. J., in a separate concurring opinion in the same case, said: "The right to choose officers is primarily and inherently in the people. Primarily it is neither an executive nor a legislative function. Except as expressly or impliedly delegated to the executive or the legislative department, it resides entirely in the electors of the state. Silence on the subject takes no part of the power from the people, and vests none in their representatives. State, Fowler, v. Johns, 3 Or. 588; People, Whitney, v. Bull, 46 N. Y. 57, 7 Am. Rep. 303; Speed v. Crawford, 3 Met. (Ky.) 207. . . . I do not deny that the legislature has the power to change the form and mode in which municipal corporations shall be governed. On the contrary, I affirm that without the consent of the inhabitants the form of the corporate government may at any time be altered, but I do deny that the legislature has the power to deprive the electors of a municipal corporation of the right to choose their own immediate local officers. . . . By immediate local officers I mean such as are charged with the control of purely local concerns, as the streets, the fire apparatus, and the like matters. In the class of local officers I do not include the peace-keeping officers, or the constabulary, for such officers are in reality officers of the state, as it is the duty of the state to provide for the personal safety of its citizens on the thronged streets of a great city as well as on the secluded rural highways. What I affirm, in short, is this: That because an elector lives in a city he cannot have the right to vote upon purely local affairs taken from him by any statute. The decisions which declare that the state may appoint peace officers in cities can be sustained only upon the ground that such officers are state officers and not local officers. The principle is one not to be extended, but to be limited."

The precise question now before us has been determined by the supreme court of Indiana, in an able and exhaustive opinion, in Evansville v. State, Blend, 118 Ind. 426, 4 L. R. A. 93, and State, Holt, v. Denny, 118 Ind. 449, 4 L. R. A. 65. In both of those cases there was under consideration an act creating a metropolitan police and fire board in cities having a certain population, providing for the appointment of the commissioners or members of said board by the legislature, and giving them full control and power over the police and fire departments of such cities, and property and records belonging to said departments. The act was assailed as being unconstitutional on various grounds,—among others, that it deprived the people of the cities coming within the provisions of the law of the right of local self-government. The invalidity of the law was declared on that ground. Berkshire, J., in delivering the opinion of the court in the first case, uses this language: "The commissioners who compose the board are not the officers or representatives of the city, for it has no part in their selection, and no control over their actions. They are appointed by the legislature, and derive all authority from that high power. They are therefore the officers and representatives of the state, and not of the city. But under the law all expenses, of whatever kind, relating to these departments, the city has to pay. . . . If the act related alone to the management of the police department, and the state was proposing to take upon itself the burden of maintaining the department, as well as its management, or if it were made to appear that the city had failed to furnish a police force, or one that was sufficient for the protection of persons and property, then a very different question would be presented for our consideration. Except so far as an efficient police department goes, which is for the protection of the public at large, the people of the state are not interested in any of the matters to which the said act of the legislature relates, but the citizens of Evansville and Indianapolis, the two cities to which the act applies, are alone interested. It therefore becomes a question whether or not the legislature may take from the people of these two cities the right of local self-government,—the right to manage and control their own purely local affairs in their own way,—and place the management of all such local affairs under state control. We do not believe that the legislature has any such power. Before written Constitutions, the people possessed the power of local self-government. It is conceded that the people of Indiana originally possessed all governmental power, and it will not be questioned but that they still possess such of that power as has not been delegated. All the power which the people have delegated is what has passed from them by the Constitution. Pom. Const. Law, 9th ed. title Centralization and Local Self-Government, §§ 151 et seq.; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 8d ed. § 9; Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. p. 225; People, Le Roy, v. Hurlbut, 24 Mich. 44, 9 Am. Rep. 103; People, Park Comrs., v. Detroit, 28 Mich. 238, 15 Am. Rep. 202; People, McCagg, v. Chicago, 51 Ill. 17, 2 Am. Rep. 278; People v. Lynch, 51 Cal. 15, 21 Am. Rep. 677; People, Bolton, v. Albertson, 55 N. Y. 50; People, Townsend v. Porter, 90 N. Y. 68.

... No provision is found anywhere in the Constitution, which takes from the people the right of local self government."

The third division of the syllabus in State, Holt, v. Denny, 118 Ind. 449, 4 L. R. A. 65, reads thus: "The right of local self government in towns and cities was not surrendered upon the adoption of the Constitution, but is still vested in the people of the respective municipalities; and the legislature cannot appoint officers to administer municipal affairs, its powers ending with the enactment of laws prescribing the manner of selection and duties of the officers." Olds, J., delivered the opinion of the court in that case, and in discussing the question under consideration said: "It is contended by counsel for appellants that, by the Constitution of the state, all power is vested in the legislative department of the government, except such as is expressly granted to the executive and the judiciary, or retained by the people in the Constitution itself. We are not in harmony with counsel's theory of our state government, but we state it this way: At the adoption of the state Constitution, all power was vested in the people of the state. The people still retain all power, except such as they expressly delegated to the several departments of the state government by the adoption of the Constitution. The legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the state have only such powers as are granted to them by the Constitution. In the 1st section and 1st article of the Constitution it is declared 'that all power is inherent in the people.' It is contended by counsel that, as certain rights were granted and certain other rights reserved by the people, therefore all rights were granted, except such as were expressly reserved. The peculiarity of the theory is, that while the people, by the Constitution, made grants of power to three different departments of government, it is contended that all power that was at that time in the grantor, the people, passed to one branch of the government, vis. the political or legislative branch, and that it took all power not mentioned in the instrument, and the executive and judicial took only such as was expressly granted to them, and the people retained such only as was specifically named and reserved. It is certainly a novel method of construction, and contrary to all rules for construing contracts, deeds, wills, and other written instruments; and it seems to us that the proposition need but to be stated, to prove its fallacy. In construing and giving an interpretation to the Constitution, we must take into consideration the situation as it existed at the time of its adoption, the fact expressed in the instrument that all power is inherent in the people, the rights and powers vested in, and then exercised by, the people; the existence of cities and towns, and the right of local self-government exercised by them; and the laws in force, and form of government existing at the time of its adoption. One of the fundamental principles of municipal corporations is the right of local self-government, including the right to choose local officers to administer the affairs of the municipality." Again, in the same opinion, after quoting from various authorities to establish that the inherent right of local self-government lies at the foundations of our institutions, it is stated that "we might quote from numerous other authorities to the same effect as the above, but we have quoted sufficient to show that the right of local self-government, including the right of the people of a municipality to select their own officers, was a sacred, fundamental principle and idea of municipal corporations, well founded, sacredly guarded, and long enjoyed by the people of the state at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. As we interpret the theory of our state government, this right of local self-government, vested in, exercised, and enjoyed by, the people of the municipalities of the state at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, yet remains in them, unless expressly yielded up and granted to one of the branches of the state government by the Constitution. And in the decision of the question presented in this case, it is only necessary to determine whether or not that power is granted to the legislative branch of the government, as it is only it which has attempted to deprive the people of cities of the right to choose their own officers, and administer their local affairs." After reviewing the various provisions of the Constitution of Indiana relating to the legislative department of the state, the opinion continues: "The conclusion we unhesitatingly reach is, that the right of local self-government in towns and cities of this state is vested in the people of the respective municipalities, and that the general assembly has no right to appoint the officers to manage and administer municipal affairs; that the right of the general assembly ends with the enactment of laws prescribing the manner of selection and the duties of the officers. There is a class of officers whose duties are general, but who act for the state in localities, which the general assemblies of some states have exercised the right to appoint, and courts have upheld the right to make such appointments; but this class of officers are constabulary or peace officers, those whose duties are to preserve the peace. In this case we do not deem it necessary to consider that portion of the law relating to peace officers, or to determine the right of the general assembly to appoint officers of that character under our Constitution. The right of the state, however, to exercise such power must rest on the theory that the state owes protection to its citizens wherever they may be, within the borders of the state, alike upon highways in a sparsely-populated territory as upon the streets of a densely populated city, and to discharge such obligation has the right to exercise control over the peace officers of the state; but the law in question provides for taking exclusive control of the fire department within certain cities, appointing the officers and controlling the department, and compelling the cities to pay all of the expenses. . . . It is fair to presume that the people of this state, in the adoption of the Constitution, did not intend to surrender the right of self-government in so far as to allow the legislature to even take charge of the fire department of every town and city of the state, and to appoint officers to take charge of and manage the affairs of such department, and limit the legislative body to sixty-one days in every two years.

We do not believe that such was the intention of the people at that time nor do we believe that such is their understanding of the power of the legislature at the present time; nor is there any word or sentence in the Constitution granting such power. . . . We hold that the right to provide and maintain a fire department in a town or city is one of the rights which are vested in the people of municipalities, is to be exercised by them, and is not subject to legislative interference, except in so far as that body may prescribe rules to aid the people of the municipality in the exercise of such right; that such right is an element of local self-government which was vested in the people of the municipalities at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and was not parted with by them; that so much of the statute under consideration as relates to the management and control of the fire departments of cities is unconstitutional and void." Further along in the opinion it was decided that the provisions of the statute relating to the fire and police departments were so interwoven, connected with, and dependent upon each other as to invalidate the entire law. It is true that the statute was held unconstitutional, also, on other grounds; one of them being that it attempted to confer on the legislature executive functions,—the power to appoint the members of the board. But the right of local self government was not incidentally discussed in the opinion, as has been suggested, but was a prominent feature of the decision; and the law was expressly declared invalid, as infringing the inherent right of the municipalities embraced within the purview of the law to choose their own local officers.

No case has come under the observation of the writer, except State, Sinerai, v. Seurey, 22 Neb. 454, which sustains a law authorizing the appointment, either by the legislature or the executive, of a board of fire and police commissioners for a municipal corporation. The decisions relied upon and cited by Commissioner Ryan, excepting the case above indicated, do not so hold, as a cursory examination discloses. In Daley v. St. Paul, 7 Minn. 890 (Gil. 311), it was ruled that the legislature possessed the power to appoint commissioners to lay out and establish a public street within the corporate limits of the city of St. Paul, and to assess the damages and benefits flowing from the taking of property for that purpose. It is to be observed that only seventeen lines of the official report of the opinion of the court are devoted to a consideration of the question; and the conclusion there reached is predicated entirely upon People, Wood, v. Draper, 15 N. Y. 538, in which last mentioned case the power of the legislature to appoint municipal officers was not involved or decided. In People, Wood, v. Draper, the validity of the act of the state of New York was sustained which established a metropolitan police district, comprising the counties of New York, Kings, Richmond, and Westchester, and provided for the appointment of five commissioners by the governor, with the advice and consent of the senate, who with the mayors of New York and Brooklyn, constituted a board of police for said district. The law under consideration in that case was assailed as being in conflict with § 2, art. 10, of 41 L. R. A.

the Constitution of 1846 of the state of New York, which provided that "all county officers whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution shall be elected by the electors of the respective counties, or appointed by the boards of supervisors or other county authorities, as the legislature shall direct. All city, town, and village officers, whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution, shall be elected by the electors of such cities, towns, and villages, or of some division thereof, or appointed by such authorities thereof as the legislature shall designate for that purpose. All other officers whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution, and all officers whose offices may hereafter be created by law, shall be elected by the people, or appointed as the legislature may direct." The court held, and properly so, that the commissioners provided for by the act there under consideration were not county, city, town or village officers, but mere officers created after the adoption of the Constitution, and therefore the section of the Constitution quoted expressly committed to the legislature the power to provide for election or appointment of such commissioners in any manner it deemed suitable. We have no similar constitutional provision in Nebraska. In Police Comrs. v. Louisville, 3 Bush, 597, there was under consideration an act of the legislature providing for the organization of a police force for the city of Louisville and county of Jefferson. That decision is not in point here, for the very obvious reason the statute there involved provided for the election of the commissioners by the qualified voters of the city and county. Moreover, said commissioners were not municipal officers, nor was the question of the inherent right of the people to local self government involved. By article 133 of the Constitution of the state of Louisiana of 1864, it was provided that the citizens of the city of New Orleans should have the right of appointing the several public officers necessary for the administration of the police of said city, and the said article gave the mayor the power to select the members of the police force of said city. The Constitution of that state of 1868 omitted article 133 of that of 1864 and under the subsequent Constitution the legislature created a board of police commissioners for the city of New Orleans, to be appointed by the governor, which board was given full power to appoint and remove and control the officers and men of the police force of said city. This act was under consideration in Diamond v. Cain, 21 La. Ann. 309, where it was held that the omission in the Constitution of 1868 of article 133 of the Constitution of 1864 left the entire matter of the police regulations of New Orleans under the power and discretion of the legislature, and that the act there under review vested the mayor of the authority to appoint public officers. The right of local self-government was not discussed or adjudicated in that case. In Com. v. Plaisted, 148 Mass. 375, 2 L. R. A. 142, a law was sustained which created a board of police for the city of Boston, to be appointed by the governor and council. The court in the opinion concede the invalidity of the law on the ground that it deprived the city of the power of self government in matters of internal police; but this was little relied on in the argument, and the question was disposed of by the court without much consideration, and without the citation of a single authority in support of the conclusion reached. Moreover, that cases distinguishable from the one at bar, in that the officers provided for by that act had nothing to do with the control or management of the fire department of the city, while the statute before this court commits the whole subject of the appointment of firemen and the selection of the chief and other officers of the fire departments of metropolitan cities, and the removal of such officers and men, to the board of fire and police commissioners created by said law. The authorities quite uniformly agree that the preservation of the public peace is essentially a matter of public concern; that the instrumentalities by which the same is effected, whether appointed by the governor, or elected by a vote of the people, are agencies of the state, and not of the municipalities; and that there exists a well defined distinction between matters which concern the municipality and those which pertain to the state at large. Conceding that the legislature, unless inhibited by the Constitution, may provide the mode of selecting police officers, yet it has no power or authority to deprive the municipalities of the right to select officers whose duties are solely of a local nature, such as officers connected with the fire department. While the police control of cities in some of the states has been confided to boards of police commissioners appointed by some executive state officer or officers, yet the validity of such laws has been sustained solely on the ground that such officers are agencies of the state, and not of the municipalities for which they were appointed. State, Atwood, v. Hunter, 38 Kan. 578, and State, Atty. Gen., v. Covington, 29 Ohio St. 102, are distinguishable on the ground above stated, since the act under consideration in each case provided for the appointment of a board of police commissioners to be appointed by state authority, and no power was given such board concerning the management and control of the fire department. Gillespie v. Lincoln, 35 Neb. 84, 16 L. R. A. 849, is not an authority in favor of the proposition that the state has the power to choose the officers or members of the fire department of a city. It was decided in that case that a municipal corporation was not liable for the negligent act of members of its fire department.

State, Simeral, v. Seavey, 22 Neb. 454, sustained a section of "An Act Incorporating Metropolitan Cities, and Defining, Regulating, and Prescribing Their Duties, Powers, and Government," approved March 30, 1887, which provided for a board of fire and police commissioners for cities governed by that act, and for their appointment by the governor. It was held that the mode designated for the selection of the members of the board did not contravene the Constitution. That decision is diametrically opposed to the conclusion reached by the writer, and is the only one of its kind. It has been asserted, and probably not without foundation, that the section of the law there under consideration was adopted to give the party then in power in the state a supposed partisan advantage in the government of the affairs of the city of Omaha; and it may be that the same motive influenced the adoption of the provision of the law of 1887 under review. However that may be, it affords no ground for declaring a law unconstitutional. The sole question that concerns the court is whether the law is repugnant to any express or implied limitations upon the power of the legislature. The act before us, as well as the one construed in State, Simeral, v. Seavey, 22 Neb. 454, denied to the people of Omaha the power to choose a portion of their own local officers, and, in so far as it did so, is unconstitutional; for the right to provide and maintain a fire department in a city is one of the powers vested in the inhabitants of such municipality, as an element of local self government, and is to be exercised by them without legislative interference, except to the extent that the lawmaking body may create rules to assist in the exercise of such right. It is to be deplored that a different conclusion was reached in the case just mentioned, as it is always embarrassing to a court to overrule one of its own decisions. No member of the court has been more persistent than the writer in following our own adjudications, and he would do so now were he not convinced that the rule announced in State, Simeral, v. Seavey, 22 Neb. 454, is not only wrong, but is far reaching in its consequences. The legislation which that opinion sustains tended to take from the people one of their reserved powers, — the right of local self-government, — one of the principles upon which our state fabric rests. If the legislature may authorize the governor to appoint a fire and police commission for cities of the metropolitan class, then there is nothing to prevent lawmakers from taking from every city and town in the state the power to choose all of the local officers thereof, except police judges which position is made elective by the Constitution, and empower the governor to appoint all municipal officers except the ones just named. The mind revolts when the doctrine of the Seavey Case is carried to its legitimate extent. The denial to the people of the right to govern themselves is undemocratic, and if such doctrine is enforced we could no longer boast of "a government of the people, for the people, and by the people."

The demurrer to the application, as well as the demurrer to the answer and cross petition of the interveners, should be overruled. The demurrer to the answer of the respondents the governor's appointees should be sustained, and a judgment of ouster entered against them. It will be observed that § 168, chap. 12a, Comp. Stat., attempts to make persons engaged in any one of certain enumerated vocations ineligible to the office of police commissioner. The omission to discuss that provision must not be construed as impliedly sustaining its constitutionality. We merely refrain from now expressing an opinion on the subject. Judgment accordingly.

Harrison, Ch. J., concurring.

Ryan, C., dissenting:

We cannot concur in the views of a majority of the court. This action of quo warranto was instituted in this court, upon the relation of the attorney general, to test the rights of J. H. Peabody, D. D. Gregory, William C. Bullard, and R. E. L. Herdman to serve as fire and police commissioners of the city of Omaha, under and by virtue of appointments of the governor of this state. Certain other parties were made defendants, or became such by intervention; but neither their claims nor status need be described, for the sole question presented by the demurrer to the answer asserting the validity of the said appointments is whether the statute under which the above-indicated appointments were made is valid. This statute is embodied in the Compiled Statutes as chapter 12a, of which the sections to be discussed are 166 and 169. By these it is provided that in cities of the class of Omaha there shall be a board of fire and police commissioners, to consist of the mayor and four electors of the city, who shall be appointed by the governor. All powers and duties connected with and incident to the appointment, removal, government, and discipline of the officers and members of the fire and police departments of the city, under such rules and regulations as may be adopted by the board of fire and police commissioners, are vested in that board, to which are delegated certain defined powers, proper to enable it to perform its functions. It is argued against the validity of the above-noted statutory provisions that by them the people of Omaha are deprived of the right of local self-government. It is not claimed that these sections contravene any express provision of the Constitution prescribing how municipal officers must be appointed, but that they deny the right of local self-government, which exists, independently of our Constitution, upon principles which are recognized in the Declaration of Independence and the Federal Constitution, and are illustrated in the evolution of our forms of government, state and national. It is conceded that the case of State, Simeral, v. Seavey, 22 Neb. 454, must be overruled if this contention is sustained; and accordingly we shall consider whether or not there have been advanced arguments of sufficient weight and cogency to justify the course indicated.

It seems to be assumed that, if State, Simeral, v. Seavey is overruled, there will result no confusion or conflict by reason of other decisions of this court. In this assumption we think counsel for plaintiff are mistaken. In Magneau v. Fremont, 30 Neb. 843, 9 L. R. A. 786, it was said: "It has been the uniform holding of this court that the Constitution is not a grant, but a restriction, of legislative power, and that the legislature may legislate upon any subject not inhibited by the Constitution. State, Atchinson & N. R. Co. v. Lancaster County Comrs. 4 Neb. 537; State, Abbott, v. Dodge County Comrs. 8 Neb. 124, 30 Am. Rep. 819; Hanscom v. Omaha, 11 Neb. 37; State, Hamilton County Comrs. v. Ream, 16 Neb. 685; Shaw v. State, 17 Neb. 334. In State, Sayre, v. Moore, 40 Neb. 854, 25 L. R. A. 774, there was under consideration the validity of a specific appropriation made by the legislature for the relief of Scott's Bluff county, and it was said: "The next reason assigned by the auditor for not drawing the warrant to pay the appropriation is 'that the act making the appropriation is contrary to the letter and spirit of the Constitution of the state of Nebraska.' We quote Cooley, Const. Lim. 4th ed. p. 210, as follows: 'When a law of Congress is assailed as void, we look into the national Constitution to see if the grant of specified powers is broad enough to embrace it; but, when a state law is attacked on the same ground, it is presumably valid in any case, and this presumption is a conclusive one, unless in the Constitution of the United States or of the state, we are able to discover that it is prohibited. We look in the Constitution of the United States for grants of legislative powers, but in the Constitution of the state to ascertain if any limitations have been imposed upon the complete powers with which the legislative department of the state is vested in its creation. Congress can pass no laws but such as the Constitution authorizes, either expressly or by clear implication, while the state legislature has jurisdiction of all subjects on which its legislation is not prohibited. The lawmaking power of the state recognizes no restraints, and is bound by none, except such as are imposed by the Constitution. That instrument has been aptly termed a legislative act by the people themselves in their sovereign capacity, and is, therefore, the paramount law. Its object is not to grant legislative power, but to confine and restrain it. Without the constitutional limitations, the power to make laws would be absolute.' Tested by the rule quoted from this eminent jurist, there is nothing in the Constitution of Nebraska that prohibits the legislature of the state, representing, as it does, the sovereignty of the people, from appropriating money to reimburse a county for expenses incurred by it in the prosecution of criminals." To sustain the contention against the right of the four commissioners appointed by the governor, we must therefore not only directly overrule State, Simeral, v. Seavey, 22 Neb. 454, but we must go a step further, and discard the principle just quoted from Magneau v. Fremont, 30 Neb. 843, 9 L. R. A. 786. In the first paragraph of the syllabus of Boyes v. Summers, 46 Neb. 308, it was said that "when this court is asked to declare a statute unconstitutional, the particular section of the Constitution which it is claimed the law infringes should be pointed out in the brief filed;" and by analogy we are led to believe that there should be a like certainty that a statute is void by reason of considerations other than a conflict with a constitutional provision.

In entering upon the discussion of the identical question with which we are now concerned, it was said by Judge Dillon, with a conservatism not always the characteristic of text writers, that "the adjudged cases exhibit some contrariety of opinion respecting the scope of legislative authority over municipal corporations, or rather respecting the question how far such corporations, viewed as legal personalities, and as such representing special rights of the community that is incorporated, are within the operation or protection of the usual constitutional restraints upon legislative power. The present chapter will be devoted to a consideration of this subject. In dealing with questions of this delicate and complex nature we must beware of broad propositions, and avoid general speculations. The only wise and safe course is to keep near the shore, and within the light of actual adjudications, accompanying these with such observations as seem to be required." 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 57. With this cautionary language in mind, the case of State, Holt, v. Denny, 118 Ind. 449, 4 L. R. A. 65, very confidently relied upon by counsel for the relator, may be profitably considered. A statute of the state of Indiana provided that in all cities of the state, of 29,000 or more inhabitants, there should be established within and for such cities a board of metropolitan police and fire department, to consist of three commissioners. The members of the first board or boards were to be elected by the general assembly upon the taking effect of the act, and said board was empowered to select a superintendent of police, captains, sergeants, detectives, and such other officers and patrolmen as the said board might deem advisable. This board was also clothed with power to remove or suspend any member of the police force, and provide rules of discipline, and to make and promulgate general and special orders, through the superintendent, who was constituted the executive head of the force. In the discussion of the provisions of the above act there were used certain expressions with reference to local self-government, and these expressions have been seized upon as material with which to fortify the position of the relator. It may be that the court was influenced in its conclusion adverse to the validity of the act by the fact that the right of local self-government was denied to people resident within cities of the class indicated; but, even if this is true, a careful consideration of the line of argument of the court will disclose that this was not the paramount consideration, but that this action of the legislature in reserving to itself the power of appointment of the three commissioners, provided by the act was a very prominent, if not the controlling, factor. After a statement of the facts, and a discussion of the authentication of the act in question, there is found in the opinion this language: "We next consider whether or not the act and its provisions are within the scope of legislative authority, under the Constitution of the state. It is contended by counsel for appellants that, by the Constitution of the state, all power is vested in the legislative department of the government, except such as is expressly granted to the executive and the judiciary, or retained by the people, in the Constitution itself. We are not in harmony with counsel's theory of our state government, but we state it this way: At the adoption of the state Constitution all power was vested in the people of the state. The people still retain all power, except such as they expressly delegated to the several departments of the state government by the adoption of the Constitution. The legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the state have only such powers as are granted to them by the Constitution. In the 1st section and 1st article of the Constitution it is declared 'that all power is inherent in the people.' It is contended by counsel that as certain rights were granted, and certain other rights reserved by the people, therefore all rights were granted, except such as were expressly reserved. . . . As we interpret the theory of our state government, this right of local self-government vested in, exercised and enjoyed by, the people of the municipalities of the state at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, yet remains in them, unless expressly yielded up and granted to one of the branches of the state government by the Constitution. And in the decision of the question presented in this case, it is only necessary to determine whether or not that power is granted to the legislative branch of the government, as it is only it which has attempted to deprive the people of cities of the right to choose their own officers and administer their local affairs." Following the above quoted language, there was a discussion of the powers of the legislative branch of the state government as defined by the Constitution of the state of Indiana. It would be unprofitable to closely follow this discussion, but from it we shall quote the following language: "Under our system of government, divided into three separate, distinct, co-ordinate branches, the legislative and judicial departments may exercise appointing power to offices peculiarly related to and connected with the exercise of their constitutional functions, and to maintain their independent existence,—that is to say, the general assembly may elect or appoint the officers of their respective branches, and relating to their department of the government; courts may appoint administrators, guardians, master commissioners, and such officers as are necessary to the free and independent exercise of power conferred by the Constitution; but the appointment of officers generally is naturally and properly an executive function. Taylor v. Com. 3 J. J. Marsh. 401; letter of Thomas Jefferson to S. Kerchival, dated July 12, 1816; Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, 2 L. ed. 60; Wood v. United States, 15 Ct. Cl. 151; Perkins v. United States, 20 Ct. Cl. 486; United States v. Perkins, 116 U. S. 488, 29 L. ed. 700; State, Atty. Gen., v. Covington, 29 Ohio St. 102; Achley's Case, 4 Abb. Pr. 35; State, Atty. Gen., v. Kennon, 7 Ohio St. 546; People, Nichols, v. McKee, 68 N. C. 429; State, Howerton, v. Tate, 68 N. C. 546; Pom. Const. Law, § 643; Federalist, Letters 47, 48. The only remaining provision which we think it can possibly be claimed granted any power to the general assembly to fill offices, is § 1, art. 15, which provides: 'All officers whose appointments are not otherwise provided for in this Constitution shall be chosen in such manner as now is, or hereafter may be, prescribed by law.' . . . As applied to town officers, the language used certainly cannot be construed as an intention on the part of the people to surrender their right of local self-government, and as granting the power to the general assembly to elect or appoint local officers in the various towns of the state. . . . Section 3, art. 6, provides that 'such other county and township officers, as may be necessary, shall be elected or appointed in such manner as may be prescribed by law.' We have not placed any new or forced construction on the Constitution, nor have we advanced any new or strange theory of our state government, but are adhering to the well recognized theory of our government, and walking in the same beaten path that all have walked since the adoption of the Constitution. Since its adoption, and before, the people of the counties, townships, cities, and towns have exercised the exclusive right of selecting and choosing their local officers; the legislature has recognized their right to do so, and prescribed the manner of election, and now, for the first time, the general assembly has claimed to itself the power of selecting such officers for two cities of the state. We have quoted and considered all the provisions of the Constitution granting power to the legislative department of the state government, and are clearly of the opinion that the legislature is granted no such power as is exercised in the passage of this act, in providing for the election of and in electing the officers contemplated by the act; but, indeed, it is not earnestly contended by counsel that any such power is by express terms granted, but it is contended, as stated in the outset, that, by the creation of the departments of government by the Constitution, all power vested in the legislature that was not, by express terms, reserved to the people or granted to the executive or judicial departments, and that the burden rests on him who asserts that a law is unconstitutional, to point out the provisions of the Constitution that forbid its passage." After briefly arguing that a statute might be declared unconstitutional, even though it might be impossible to indicate any express provision of the Constitution as being one with which such statute might conflict, the opinion continues as follows: "The conclusion we unhesitatingly reach is, that the right of local self government in towns and cities of this state is vested in the people of the respective municipalities, and that the general assembly has no right to appoint the officers to manage and administer municipal affairs; that the right of the general assembly ends with the enactment of laws prescribing the manner of selection and the duties of the officers. There is a class of officers whose duties are general, but who act for the state in localities, which the general assemblies of some states have exercised the right to appoint, and courts have upheld the right to make such appointments; but this class of officers are constabulary or peace officers,—those whose duties are to preserve the peace. In this case we do not deem it necessary to consider that portion of the law relating to peace officers, or to determine the right of the general assembly to appoint officers of that character under our Constitution. The right of the state, however, to exercise such power, must rest on the theory that the state owes protection to its citizens, wherever they may be within the borders of the state, alike upon highways in a sparsely-populated territory as upon the streets of a densely-populated city, and, to discharge such obligation, has the right to exercise control over the peace officers of the state; but the law in question provides for taking exclusive control of the fire department within certain cities, appointing the officers and controlling the department, and compelling the cities to pay all of the expenses. Although some authority may be found to support such right on the part of the legislature, we think it is in conflict with our system of state government, and derogatory to the rights of the people."

A very full consideration has been given

State, Holt, v. Denny, 118 Ind. 449, 4 L. R. A. 65, because it was, in argument, relied on as distinctly sustaining the contention of relator's counsel that the law which we now have under review must be declared unconstitutional because it deprives the citizens of Omaha of the right of local self-government. It is quite clear that the fact that the legislature had arrogated to itself the right to name the three commissioners by whom the city officers were to be appointed, and might be removed, had great weight with the court; for by that tribunal this was described as an executive, and not a legislative, function. Moreover, even under these circumstances the court very strongly intimated that the appointment by commissioners of the police officers of the city, as part of the constabulary force of the state, might be upheld,—a proposition afterwards sanctioned in State, Terre Haute, v. Kolsen, 130 Ind. 434, 14 L. R. A. 566. It was doubted in State, Holt, v. Denny, 118 Ind. 449, 4 L. R. A. 65, whether the consideration with respect to police officers tended to countenance the control of the fire department by state commissioners, but in this state the relation of the fire departments of cities to the state has been held to be the same as the relation of police forces of cities. Gillespie v. Lincoln, 35 Neb. 34, 16 L. R. A. 849. As we understand the opinion in State, Holt, v. Denny, 118 Ind. 449, 4 L. R. A. 65, the right of local self-government was discussed somewhat incidentally, and alone might not have been sufficient to have brought the court to the conclusion which was reached; and even if we are wrong in this conception of the gist of the argument, the intimation of that court was, very strongly, that appointments of police officers by state authorities could be justified on a ground which in this state would justify like appointments in the fire departments. As these two classes embrace the subject matter herein in controversy, the case of State, Holt, v. Denny 118 Ind. 449, 4 L. R. A. 65, cannot be considered as very satisfactorily supporting the contention of counsel for the relator with respect to the city's right of local self-government.

It was urged that the supreme court of Michigan had repeatedly upheld the right of local self government, in a manner and to an extent which should be followed in the case at bar. The opinion in one of the cases cited (People, Park Comrs., v. Detroit, 28 Mich. 228, 15 Am. Rep. 202) was written by Judge Cooley; and, as he has referred therein to the other cases in that state, we shall accept his description of their scope. In People, Park Comrs., v. Detroit, 28 Mich. 228, 15 Am. Rep. 202, there was under consideration a statute whereby the legislature of Michigan had created a board of park commissioners for the city of Detroit. This board had power and authority to adopt plans for a public park or boulevard, or both, with the necessary avenues or approaches thereto, for the city of Detroit, and for these purposes the board might select the needful lands, either wholly or in part within the city or any of the adjacent townships, and might acquire and purchase lands at a cost of not to exceed $300,000. When the site of a park or boulevard should be selected, the board might lay before the city council estimates of the expenses necessary to carry out its plans, and the said council was thereupon required to provide the money for such expenses by the issue and sale of city bonds. The action was for a mandamus to compel the issue and sale of bonds; the preliminaries thereto having, as alleged, been complied with. On this subject there was in the opinion this language: "The proposition that there rests in this or any other country the authority to compel a municipal body to contract debts for local purposes against its will is one so momentous in its importance, and so pregnant with possible consequences, that we could not fail to be solicitous, when it was presented, that its foundations should be thoroughly canvassed and presented, and that we might have before us, in passing upon it, all the considerations that could be urged it its support. . . . In People, Le Roy, v. Hurlbut, 24 Mich. 44, 9 Am. Rep. 108, we considered at some length the proposition which asserts the amplitude of legislative control over municipal corporations; and we there conceded that when confined, as it should be, to such corporations as agencies of the state in its government, the proposition is entirely sound. In all matters of general concern there is no local right to act independently of the state; and the local authorities cannot be permitted to determine for themselves whether they will contribute, through taxation, to the support of the state government, or assist, when called upon, to suppress insurrections, or aid in the enforcement of the police laws. Upon all such subjects the state may exercise compulsory authority, and may enforce the performance of local duties, either by employing local officers for the purpose, or through agents or officers of its own appointment. The same doctrine was declared in People, Drake, v. Mahaney, 18 Mich. 481, and in People, Bay City, v. State Treasurer, 28 Mich. 503. . . . Whoever insists upon the right of the state to interfere and control by compulsory legislation the action of the local constituency in matters exclusively of local concern should be prepared to defend a like interference in the action of private corporations and of natural persons. It is as easy to justify on principle a law which permits the rest of the community to dictate to an individual what he shall eat, and what he shall drink, and what he shall wear, as to show any constitutional basis for one under which the people of other parts of the state, through their representatives, dictate to the city of Detroit what fountains shall be erected at its expense for the use of its citizens, or at what cost it shall purchase, and how it shall improve and embellish, a park or boulevard for the recreation and enjoyment of its citizens. The one law would rest upon the same fallacy as the other, and the reasons for opposing and contesting it would be the same in each case." There has been sufficient quoted from People, Park Comrs., v. Detroit, 28 Mich. 228, 15 Am. Rep. 202, to disclose how slightly it tends to countenance the principle herein contended for; and the principle on which this case was decided was determinative of the controversy in People v. Lynch, 51 Cal. 15, 21 Am. Rep. 677. Section 2, art. 10, of the Constitution of the state of New York, in force at the time the cited cases from the courts of that state were decided, was in the following language: "All county officers whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution, shall be elected by the electors of the respective counties, or appointed by the boards of supervisors or other county authorities, as the legislature shall direct. All city, town, and village officers, whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution, shall be elected by the electors of such cities, towns, and villages, or of some division thereof, or appointed by such authorities thereof as the legislature shall designate for that purpose. All other officers, whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution, and all officers whose offices may hereafter be created by law, shall be elected by the people, or appointed as the legislature may direct." It is very clear that the above provisions as to the election or appointment of city, town, and village officers, render inapplicable the cases cited to sustain the proposition that there exists a right of local self-government independently of constitutional authority. Indeed, an inference might very plausibly be drawn that the legislature could have provided for the government of cities, towns, and villages in the absence of the constitutional restriction noted, and that the existence of such a constitutional restriction raises a presumption of its necessity. It is probable we may have omitted mention of some cases relied upon in the voluminous briefs of counsel for the relator, but we believe we have noted those most confidently relied upon, and shall now address ourselves to a review of the cases cited by the opposing counsel.

In Com. v. Plaisted, 148 Mass. 875, 2 L. R. A. 142, there was under consideration a statute whereby the governor of the state of Massachusetts, with the advice and consent of the council, was required to appoint from the two principal political parties three citizens of Boston, who should constitute a board of police of said city. The police of the city was to be appointed, and was subject to removal, by this board. Referring to this act of the legislature, the court said: "It is also suggested, though not much insisted on, that the Statute of 1885, chap. 323, is unconstitutional, because it takes from the city the power of self-government in matters of internal police. We find no provision of the Constitution with which it conflicts, and we cannot declare an act of the legislature invalid because it abridges the exercise of the privilege of local self-government in a particular in regard to which such privilege is not guaranteed by any provision of the Constitution. While the Constitution recognizes our system of town-governments as an inherent part of our general system of government, so that the legislature could not abolish the town system without coming in contact with some part of its provisions, yet in most respects it leaves the power and duty of providing laws for the government of the towns and cities in the discretion of the legislature. . . . The several towns and cities are agencies of government largely under the control of the legislature. The powers and duties of all the towns and cities, except so far as they are specifically provided for in the Constitution, are created and defined by the legislature, and we have no doubt that it has the right, in its discretion, to change the powers and duties created by itself, and to vest such powers and duties in officers appointed by the governor, if, in its judgment, the public good requires this, instead of leaving such officers to be elected by the people or appointed by the municipal authorities."

In the year 1860 the legislature of Maryland by statute, provided for a new police system, and to carry it into effect, named certain commissioners, upon whom were conferred the powers necessary for that purpose. Contrary to the views expressed in State, Holt, v. Denny, 118 Ind. 449, 4 L. R. A. 65, the court of appeals of Maryland sustained the exercise of this appointing power by the legislature. Baltimore v. State, Board of Police, 15 Md. 376, 74 Am. Dec. 572. In the opinion there was the following language: "It is conceded that the legislature was not under any obligation to confer the power of appointment on the executive; by this clause of the Constitution the power was placed there, in the event of a different mode not being prescribed in the law. But, it is said, it ought to have been delegated to the people or local authorities of the city of Baltimore. In the absence of any such requirement of the legislature, we do not perceive that they were under a duty to make such delegation of the appointing power. The Constitution surely designed to repose some discretion in the legislature, both over the mode of appointment, and the propriety and necessity of passing any law on the subject to which the exercise of the power might relate. It seems difficult to suppose that the people, through the Constitution, would intrust to that branch of the government nearest to the source of power the right to create an office, and to indicate others to appoint the officers, and be unwilling to place the appointment with the legislature itself. The Constitution must receive an interpretation according to the sense in which the people are supposed to have understood its language; but it ought also to be construed with reference to the previous legislation of the state. State v. Wayman, 2 Gill & J. 285. And when such power has been exercised by the legislature from the earliest period of the government, is it unreasonable to suppose that the people were aware that the same might occur again unless prohibited by the Constitution? If there is no prohibition, express or implied, it would result from this view that the people intended the legislature should continue to exercise the power."

By an act of the legislature of Kentucky there was established a board of police for the city of Louisville and county of Jefferson. This board was elected by the voters and the city, as provided in the aforesaid act, and its right to select police officers pursuant to the provisions of the act in question was denied by the mayor of said city. The question thereby raised was not identical with that presented to us, but in the consideration of the question which was presented there was employed this language: "It is now a well settled and universally recognized American doctrine that the state legislature represents sovereignty of the people of the state in all things not delegated to the Federal government, nor prohibited by the United States Constitution to the states, nor prohibited by the state Constitution." Police Comrs. v. Louisville, 3 Bush, 597.

In Diamond v. Cain, 21 La. Ann. 809, there was under consideration an act of the legislature whereby was created a board of commissioners of the city of New Orleans, empowered to remove and appoint the police force of said city. The mayor, to whom had been intrusted the powers which were superseded by the provisions of said act, insisted that it was unconstitutional, and on that theory appointed a chief of police. The contest was by quo warranto proceedings instituted by the claimant of this office by virtue of the mayor's appointment against the claimant appointed by the aforesaid board of commissioners, and, without the statement of any particular principle applicable to the fact of the case at bar, it was held by the supreme court that the appointee of the board was entitled to hold the office in dispute.

In State, Atwood, v. Hunter, 88 Kan. 578, there was questioned by quo warranto proceedings the validity of an act of the legislature of Kansas by virtue of which the executive council of that state was authorized to appoint a board of police commissioners, by which board there were required to be appointed a police judge, a marshal, a chief of police, and other police officers. The right of the defendant depended upon the validity of his appointment by said board to fill the office of police judge of the city of Leavenworth. In the opinion there was this language: "The point has been made, though not much contended for, that police government by commission is illegal. In effect, it is said to be opposed to the fundamental theory of self government, and denies to the people of the district the right to select their own officers from their own number. Whatever may be said regarding the policy of placing the police administration of cities in a board of police commissioners who are chosen by state officers rather than through the electors of the cities, there can be no doubt that the legislature has the power to do so. The Constitution imposes no limitations upon the legislature in respect to the agencies through which the police power of the state shall be exercised. It may be conferred upon the officers of local municipalities chosen by the people resident therein, or, if deemed expedient, it may be vested in officers or persons otherwise selected. Cities are but agencies of the state, created to aid in the conduct of public affairs. The functions of cities and their officers are prescribed by the legislature, and it rests in the sovereign discretion of that body to say how much of the police power shall be exerted by the municipality."

Daley v. St. Paul, 7 Minn. 390 (Gil. 311), was an action for the recovery of damages for the establishment of a public street or road by commissioners appointed by the legislature of the state; and it was held that in the appointment of such commissioners the legislature had not acted outside the scope of its powers, and accordingly the city was liable for the damages awarded.

In State, Atty. Gen., v. Covington, 29 Ohio St. 102, the rights of the defendants, as members of the board of police commissioners and of the board of health for the city of Cincinnati, were challenged by quo warranto proceedings; and a demurrer to an answer justifying the title of defendants under the provisions of said act was overruled. The review of the authorities would not be complete if there was omitted a quotation from the case last cited of language applicable to certain provisions of our Constitution. Section 26 (the closing section of our bill of rights) is as follows: "This enumeration of rights shall not be construed to impair or deny others retained by the people, and all powers not herein delegated remain with the people." In State, Atty. Gen., v. Covington, 29 Ohio St. 102, McIlvaine, J., said: "The principal objections urged by counsel for relator against the validity of this statute are based on the first clause of § 2, art. 1, of the Constitution, which declares, 'All political power is inherent in the people,' and the 20th section of the article, which is as follows: 'This enumeration of rights shall not be construed to impair or deny others retained by the people; and all powers not herein delegated remain with the people.' The first of these declarations enunciates the foundation principle of our government, to wit, that the people is the source of all political power, but it was not intended as a denial of the power or right of delegation and representation. If this were not otherwise palpable, it would be made so by the second declaration above named, to wit, 'and all powers not herein delegated remain with the people.' This last clause means exactly what its words import, but even from them a plain implication arises that all the powers in and by the Constitution delegated do not remain with the people, but are vested in the agents and officers of the government, to be exercised by them alone. Among the powers delegated by the Constitution is the following (art. 2, § 1): 'The legislative power of the state shall be vested in the general assembly.' Now, whatever limitations upon the power thus delegated to the general assembly may be found in other provisions of the Constitution, it is quite clear that § 20 of the 1st article does not impose any limitation upon it whatever. That section only declares that powers not delegated remain with the people. It does not purport to limit or modify delegated powers. It cannot be doubted that the terms of the Constitution, whereby the legislative power of the state is vested in the general assembly, are comprehensive enough to authorize the enactment in question. Rules and regulations for local municipal government of cities and villages are subjects of, and are as clearly within the scope of, legislation as are those which concern the state at large. Cities and villages are agencies of the state government. Their organization and government are under the control of the state, and every law which affects them must emanate from the general assembly, where the legislative power of the state is vested. Now, it is true that the terms in which this grant of power is made to the general assembly are restrained and limited by many inhibitory provisions contained in the instrument, but we find no express inhibition against such legislation as is contained in this statute. The question therefore is, Is there an implied inhibition against it? It is claimed by counsel for the relator, as we understand their arguments, that such inhibition is implied from the provisions quoted above from the bill of rights, especially when they are considered in connection with the history and practice of the state, at and previous to the adoption of the Constitution. The circumstances referred to by counsel, it is claimed, would show that previous to the adoption of the present Constitution in 1851, the police of the several cities and villages within the state had been elected by the electors resident therein, or appointed by boards or officers elected by the electors. And, therefore, it is to be inferred from the above declaration in the bill of rights, to wit, 'and all powers not herein delegated remain with the people,' that the power to change the mode of election or appointment of the police force of cities and villages was intended to be withheld from the general assembly. To this argument . . . [we] desire to express our unqualified dissent. By such interpretation of the Constitution, the body of laws in force at the time of its adoption would have become as permanent and unchangeable as the Constitution itself, for such argument would apply with equal force to every subject of legislation concerning which no special direction is contained in the Constitution. Indeed, the true rule for ascertaining the powers of the legislature is to assume its power under the general grant ample for any enactment within the scope of legislation, unless restrained by the terms or the reason of some express inhibition."

The persistency with which we have been urged to recede from the views expressed in State, Simeral, v. Seavey, 22 Neb. 454, has induced us to re-examine the grounds upon which that case was decided. The importance of the question involved should be accepted as our sufficient apology for the extended discussion into which we have necessarily been led in the accomplishment of this purpose. We are now more than ever satisfied of the correctness of the proposition laid down in State, Simeral, v. Seavey, 22 Neb. 454, that "the state is the unit of political power, and is responsible, through its legislature and executive, for the preservation of the peace, morals, education, and general welfare of the people, and in the discharge of the duties necessary for these purposes, they are limited only by the supreme Constitution of the government, the laws passed pursuant thereto, and our own Constitution and laws."

For the reason given in State, Atty. Gen., v. Covington, 29 Ohio St. 102, the legislature in the exercise of its powers in the respect challenged in this case, did not violate any provision of our bill of rights.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

PEOPLE of the State of New York, Resp't.,
v.

Frank N. SHELTON, App't.

(156 N. Y. 268.)

1. It is error to suggest to a jury, as a reason for agreeing, that failure to agree is "almost to confess incompetency," as personal considerations should never be permitted to influence their conclusions.
2. An obvious effort of the court to drive the members of the jury into an agreement requires a new trial, if they agree.
3. The old rule permitting coercion of a jury in order to secure a verdict has been swept away, and under our present method the independence of a jury is respected:
4. A jury must be deemed coerced, so that a judgment of conviction based on their verdict will be reversed, when they agreed after they had been out for eighty-four hours without beds or coats, during forty of which they had been confined in a small room, and from the remarks of the court and the treatment they had received they had every reason to believe that a still longer confinement on chairs and hard benches was in store for them, while the judge had also told them, after the foreman had reported that their agreement was impossible, that a failure to agree was "almost to confess incompetency."
